Bonds, the only player to win more than three MVPs, hit .341 with 45 homers and 90 RBIs, leading the major leagues in slugging percentage (.749), on-base percentage (.529) and walks.

The 12-time All-Star received 28 of 32 first-place votes and 426 points in balloting by the Baseball Writers' Association of America.

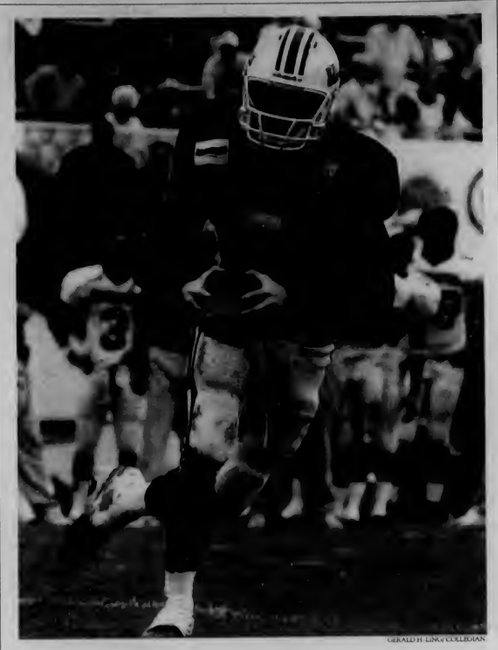
St. Louis outfielder Albert Pujols was second with three first-place votes and 303 points. Atlanta outfielder Gary Sheffield got the other first-place vote and was third with 247 points.

Among the four major North American professional sports, only the NHL's Wayne Gretzky has more MVP awards, with nine. The NBA's Kareem Abdul-Jabbar also won six MVPs.

"To be able to say you've won this award six times, there's no words for it," Bonds said.

If he maintains his home-run pace, Bonds would reach Aaron's record in 2005 or 2006.

"I feel that Hank Aaron's record is the greatest single record in all of sports," Bonds said. "It's going to be a very difficult task to do. I'm prepared for the challenge. I just don't know if it's reachable."



Bonds has reached 45 homers in four straight seasons, hitting a record 73 in 2001.

At 39 years, 3 1/2 months, Bonds became the second-oldest MVP, trailing Pittsburgh's Willie Stargell, who was about 4 1/2 months older when he tied for the award in 1979.

"I feel 29 right now," Bonds said. "But during the season, I feel 49. That day in-and-day-out grind is very difficult."

Bonds, who has set records for walks and intentional walks, hopes the Giants add another slugger to support him in the lineup.

"I'm looking very much forward to next season," he said. "I started training just two weeks after the season. I'm training even harder this year than I did last year. I really want to see if I can put things together without my father for the first time."

the same page, and have connected for 14 touchdowns.

Brandon Jones has also had his fair share of production, with 40 receptions and seven touchdowns.

The rushing game has been as balanced as any team's, with two potential feature backs in Kejuan Jones and Renaldo Works. Each has rushed for over 700 yards on the season, and they have tallied 14 touchdowns between them.

On defense, the Sooners have been equally as impressive. Over the season the Oklahoma 'D' has let up an average of only 12 points per game. It is averaging nearly four sacks per game, and currently has 14 players on the team with one or more sacks.

The Sooners have also held their opposition's passing and rushing attacks to under 100 yards on average.

Oklahoma has been ranked No. 1 for 13 straight weeks. This streak is currently the third-longest in NCAA history. The Sooners received the maximum amount of points last week with 1,625.

Barring any kind of upset, Oklahoma looks to be facing Ohio State — last year's national champion — in the Sugar Bowl. The Buckeyes met a similarly powerful Miami team in the national title game last year, but that was a different story.

Miami had a soft schedule last season and barely pulled off its undefeated record. The Sooners have dominated nearly every game this year and with their balanced attack, could very well finish undefeated.

At season's end there will be no doubt as to who is the best team in the land. The only question that will remain is whether the Sooners are one of the best teams in NCAA football history.

the outside and multiple drives to the basket, the Terriers posed a threat.

The Minutemen were able to get back on track with the leadership and composure of junior captain Anthony Anderson, and the undeniable presence of junior center Gabe Lee.

"Anthony Anderson controlled everything. ... He's a great leader," Lappas said. "And then Gabe Lee, he was everywhere dominating the game defensively."

Anderson showed that he is a true leader as he guided the new players on the team during periods of pressure.

"That's my job," Anderson said. "I have to calm them down and keep them straight-headed."

Lee notched seven blocks and forced multiple turnovers, as his positioning under the basket posed a problem for the St. Francis frontcourt. He also grabbed 11 of the Minutemen's 49 boards.

The Minutemen will travel to Lubbock, Texas, where they will meet Texas Tech in the second round of the preseason NIT. The Red Raiders trounced Davidson last night, 89-58, to advance to the next round.

who doesn't know him off the golf course, it might be a little disconcerting. That's true with any of the top players."

Strange also mentioned the comfort level.

Woods was daunting as an opponent in stroke play during his first five years on the PGA Tour, especially when he started winning majors by double digits.

"As far as personality? He's the easiest guy to pair," Strange said. "Everybody would like to play with him, but you don't want somebody who's intimidated by him."

Woods and Howell flew to South Africa together on Woods' plane and spent a few days together in Cape Town.

They have spent equal amounts of time needling each other and working with each other on club selection off the tee and shots around the green.

"I feel comfortable around him," he said. "I can't fault anything about him. I'm trying to do the things he's done. And the fact he call me 'kid' probably changes the dynamics of the relationship."

Pierce lonely without Walker

By HOWARD ULMAN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WALTHAM (AP) — Paul Pierce took three shots in the last 35 seconds of the game and the Boston Celtics lost.

It's natural for them to look to their remaining star after Antoine Walker was traded, but relying too much on Pierce may not be the best path to success.

"We have to win as a team," Danny Ainge, the team's executive director of basketball operations, said Tuesday. "He shouldn't have to feel that he needs to score the last 10 points of the game."

Until the newcomers and young players develop confidence and adjust to each other, Pierce may continue to carry too much of the load for a team that has just seven players back from last season. And the way he's been shooting lately, that's not good.

In his last four games, Pierce has hit only one-third of his shots, going 23-for-69. And in Monday night's 89-86 to the New York Knicks that dropped Boston to 5-5, he took his team's last three shots and missed them all.

"Paul is playing fine," Ainge said. "We make it harder on Paul than it needs to be. I think that we need to put him in situations where he has a better chance of success."

In the first of his six pro seasons without Walker, traded to Dallas on Oct. 20, Pierce has hit just 38 percent of his shots and is averaging 20.4 points, lower than in any of the past three seasons. But Boston's braintrust isn't worried about him.

"Everybody's got to understand how to make Paul better," coach Jim O'Brien said. "Too much attention is paid to the superstar. Does he make this guy better? Well, I think sometimes you have to look at who makes him better."

That means setting a pick to get him open, pushing the ball upcourt before the defense gets set and having the confidence to take shots at critical moments.

"It's OK for them to miss and it's OK for them to be aggressive," Ainge said of Pierce's teammates.

That feeling may sink in with each practice. Pierce worked out with the team Tuesday but was unavailable for comment afterward because of a Thanksgiving turkey giveaway he attended.

O'Brien thinks Pierce is handling the pressure of being the main man well, despite the extra defensive attention.

"Teams are scouting him and trying to get the ball out of his hands," Celtics forward Eric Williams said. "Everybody knew that was going to happen so it's up to the rest of the guys to try to set him up a little bit better."

That will take time, especially on a 12-man active roster with five new players and a sixth, Vin Baker, who missed most of last season because of alcohol-related problems. Baker is back and playing very well at power forward. The Celtics are trying to run more and it takes time to feel comfortable with that after years of slowdown basketball with Walker usually bringing the ball up.

"Those are habits that I didn't expect at 10 games into the season to have been broken," Ainge said. "As a matter of fact, I don't expect them to be broken at the end of this year. I expect us to be better at it maybe some time next year."

Meanwhile, Pierce is the go-to guy and doesn't shrink from that role. He's actually handling the defensive pressure better, O'Brien said, noting his assist to turnover ratio of 28 to 13 in the last four games.

But the Celtics blew a 16-point halftime lead against the Knicks before he tried, and failed, to tie the game with his shot at the buzzer.

"I thought I had a good look, even though it was a 3-pointer," Pierce said. "What more can you ask for?"

Better defense, for one, and an ability to finish strong. O'Brien was extremely upset with Boston's inability to stop the pick-and-roll by the Knicks. Ainge said the Celtics haven't been a good team down the stretch for several years.

And Pierce can't fix all that by himself.

"I believe he will play better. Great players go through tough stretches," Ainge said. "but I'm more concerned about the rest than I am Paul. I think he's the least of my concerns."

Teams have to open wallets for Rodriguez

ence call, refused to elaborate.

Only a handful of large-market teams, such as the Mets, Yankees, Red Sox, Orioles and Dodgers, could take on the rest of his $252 million, 10-year contract, the richest in baseball history.

Rodriguez hasn't been able to turn around the fortunes of the Rangers, who have finished last in the AL West in all three of his seasons while he led the league in home runs.

This year, A-Rod hit .298 with 47 homers and also led the league in runs (124) and slugging percentage (.600), along with 118 RBIs that were second in the AL to Delgado's 145. The Rangers were 71-91.

Hart said the Rangers will continue the commitment they made to young players midway through manager Buck Showalter's first season. They won't be big spenders in free agency as they work to cut their payroll from more than $100 million last season to the $70 million range.

"With the desire that Alex has to win, the question is does he want to wait for us here or is there something that can provide an opportunity for him to win quicker?" Hart said.

Minutemen tame Terriers

By Becky Horowitz
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's basketball team broke a major 2002-03 trend by outrebounding St. Francis in last night's game.

With their big men stepping up, the Minutemen were able to overpower and intimidate the smaller Terriers, making it next to impossible for them to come up with an inside game.

Largely because of this, the Minutemen advanced to the second round of the Preseason National Invitational Tournament with an 80-58 win, where they will meet Texas Tech in Lubbock, Texas, Friday night.

With four starters taking part in their first-ever regular season game, Massachusetts was able to overcome pockets of turbulence as it dominated a much smaller St. Francis team in almost every aspect of the game.

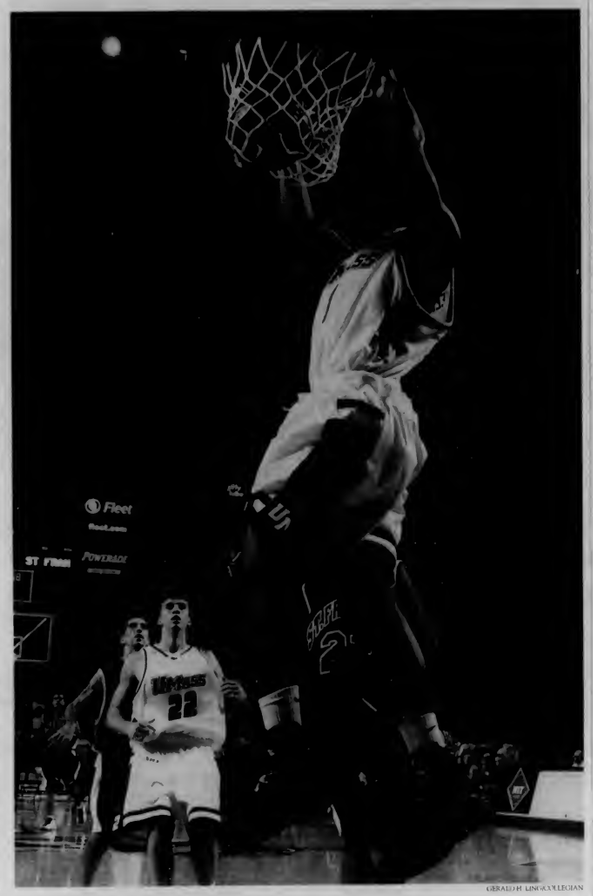
UMass	80
St. Francis	58

Coming into this match with little knowledge of their opponent, the Maroon and White was not only forced to change its game plan minutes before tip-off, but also on the court, mid-play.

"Our team wasn't nearly as well-prepared as they're going to be in later games," Coach Steve Lappas said of his young team. "These guys changed their offense completely. They had some new guys that we didn't know, we had never seen any tape of them. ... I was very happy, our guys adjusted on the fly."

The Minutemen came out running, something they intend to do much more this season than last. However, due to a combination of constant transition and a young team, they produced 25 turnovers (18 coming from freshmen) to the Terriers 16.

Although it got out to an early lead, UMass was inconsistent as it allowed the Terriers back in the game. With the majority of its offense coming from behind the arc, St. Francis netted three quick shots from downtown to come within one and take the eventual lead at 24-22 in the first half.



UMass then held the Terriers to one more shot before the break, and scored 20 points off a combination of free throws and inside shots, giving it a 44-28 lead at the half.

Even though the Terriers lead was short-lived, it gave St. Francis coach Ron Ganulin some hope, as well as put a little more confidence into his young squad.

"I thought, in spurts, we played pretty well, but of course they're bigger and stronger," he said. "I was very proud of the way we came back in the beginning of the second half because we could have dropped our heads and been blown out. We might have been blown out at the end but at least we fought."

The Maroon and White came out flat in the second half, giving St. Francis the chance to catch up. With quick shots from

Sooners are well beyond dominant

Every year in college football there is a team heavily favored by both fans and press alike.

This year is no different, as the Oklahoma Sooners have put together an 11-0 record and an undisputed seat at the top of the I-A rankings.

The only difference is that this team seems too dominant to be challenged — they may be simply unbeatable.

Over the course of this season an opponent has only challenged the Sooners once. The closest competition that Oklahoma has faced is Alabama, but the Sooners downed the Crimson Tide 20-13 in the second week of the season.

Bob McGovern

Sure, Alabama isn't exactly a powerhouse this year, but that game was the last time the Sooners were held below 30 points. The very next week, Oklahoma sent all doubters packing with a 52-28 spanking of Fresno State.

The Sooners have outscored their opponents 524-133 this year, one of the strongest offensive performances in Division I football.

This is not to say that they have had the easiest schedule. Oklahoma has had to trudge through the Big 12, arguably the strongest conference in college football. On the way, it has made believers out of some of the top teams in the country.

In the sixth week of the season, the Sooners went up against then-No. 11 Texas. The game had all the makings of a mid-season classic, until Oklahoma handed Texas an embarrassing 65-13 drubbing. It would have been easier to swallow for the Longhorns had it not taken place in the hostile confines of the Cotton Bowl.

While the hype started to accumulate, the Sooners were set to face off against in-state rival Oklahoma State in a game that the press was making out to be the upset of the year.

The Sooners quickly erased any doubt, and demolished the Cowboys 52-9 in front of a sold out home crowd.

If that wasn't enough, Oklahoma put together arguably the best all-around game this year against Texas A&M. The Sooners simply destroyed the Aggies in every aspect of the game, and came away with a 77-0 victory.

Oklahoma had one punt in the game and only allowed 54 yards of total offense. The Aggies weren't turning the ball over either, as they only had one on the game. Oklahoma just shut them down and forced them to take 12 punts.

Along with their defensive dominance, the Sooners tallied 639 yards on offense and scored on six of seven red zone chances.

Leading the way for the Oklahoma offense has been the steady arm of Jason White, who has 36 touchdown completions on the season against only six interceptions. He and receiver Mark Clayton have been on

A-Rod on the block

By Stephen Hawkins

ARLINGTON, Texas (AP) — Alex Rodriguez won the AL MVP award, even though the Texas Rangers didn't win many games.

Yet, the Rangers are willing to listen to offers from other teams for the All-Star shortstop — not that many could afford the seven seasons and $179 million left on his record contract.

After becoming only the second player from a last-place team to win a Most Valuable Player award, Rodriguez confirmed Monday that the Rangers talked to him about a possible trade.

"They presented me with a situation," Rodriguez said. "Whatever they want to do, I'll want to cross that bridge when the time is right. I'm not closing or opening any doors right now." General manager John Hart said Texas was contacted by several clubs about Rodriguez, but that there was never a specific deal during those conversations several weeks ago.

"We've made it very clear that we think Alex is going to be here," Hart said. "At the same time, we're not going to turn the phones off."

Rodriguez finished second in the MVP ballot twice, to Oakland's Miguel Tejada last year and the Rangers' Juan Gonzalez in 1996. This time, he received 242 points in voting by the Baseball Writers' Association and was the only player listed on every ballot.

"I felt like I was driving myself crazy over this award. It was painful to come in second place," Rodriguez said during a conference call from his vacation in Mexico. "There's nothing like winning it. I couldn't be happier."

The only other player from a last-place team to be MVP was Andre Dawson of the Chicago Cubs in 1987.

The 28 first-place votes were split among 10 players, one short of the record set in the 1977 AL vote and matching the total in the 1947 NL vote. Rodriguez got six, the fewest for an MVP winner since the New York Yankees' Yogi Berra in 1951.

Toronto first baseman Carlos Delgado was second with 213 points, followed by Yankees catcher Jorge Posada with 194. Delgado and Posada both got five first-place votes.

Rodriguez said he thought there had been talks about a possible trade with "three of four teams" but didn't elaborate. Hart, speaking on a separate confer-

Tiger teams with Howell

By Doug Ferguson

GEORGE, South Africa (AP) — Tiger Woods stood off to the side on the 12th tee and studied the stance, the setup and the swing of the junior member on the U.S. team.

The ball shot off the tee, boring through the stiff breeze off the Indian Ocean, splitting two bunkers and landing safely in the middle of the fairway on a hole called "Sheer Murder," reputed to be among the toughest in Africa.

Woods smiled and nodded approvingly.

"This kid can really hit it," Woods said.

Woods is playing on a U.S. team for the sixth time at the Presidents Cup. Charles Howell III is the first teammate he can call "kid."

When the matches begin Thursday on the Links Course at Fancourt, Howell figures to be next in a long line of partners for the world's No. 1 player.

"That's what Tiger has requested," U.S. captain Jack Nicklaus said. "If you have two guys who want to play together, and they're playing reasonably well, I see no reason why they shouldn't play together."

Woods, 27, and Howell, 24, first squared off in the quarterfinals of the 1996 U.S. Amateur, which Woods won 3 and 1 on his way to a record third straight title.

Their friendship began to take root when they started playing early morning practice rounds at the British Open this year.

"I stand to learn something every time I'm around him," Howell said.

A practice round at Fancourt was no different. They stood in a swale to the right of the ninth green and took turns hitting flop shots that trickled down the green to an imaginary hole, and bump shots into the hill that skipped and stopped near a tee in the ground.

How this partnership will pay off in match play remains to be seen.

Woods already has had 11 partners in the two Presidents Cup and three Ryder Cup teams on which he has played.

Only once has he had the same partner all four team sessions _ Notah Begay, his former teammate at Stanford. They went 2-2 at the 2000 Presidents Cup.

Good friends don't always make a good team. Woods and Mark O'Meara were 1-2 in the '97 Ryder Cup at Valderrama. A powerful tandem isn't always the answer. Woods and David Duval, at the time Nos. 1 and 2 in the world, were beaten at Brookline in 1999.

Woods has played with shorter hitters (Justin Leonard and Steve Pate), big hitters (Davis Love III and Fred Couples), guys who make a lot of birdies (Mark Calcavecchia and John Huston) and those who grind out pars (Tom Lehman and Paul Azinger).

The results vary. His team record is 7-12-1.

Woods produced the most dominant stretch ever in U.S. Amateur history, winning his final 18 matches over three years.

When he played in his first Presidents Cup at Royal Melbourne in 1998, someone asked him the biggest difference between match play as a professional and as an amateur.

"The field," Woods replied.

True, there are better players. Finding the right partner is also important.

So far, it hasn't been easy.

Nicklaus used to pair up with Arnold Palmer, then Tom Watson. Curtis Strange often played with Tom Kite. Love and Couples were a good fit.

Woods has had enough partners to fill a team.

"I wouldn't think it would be that hard," Leonard said. "He's so disciplined. He seems to do everything pretty well."

Leonard and Woods played together twice in alternate shot. They halved their match in the '97 Ryder Cup and lost in the '98 Presidents Cup.

"I enjoyed playing with him," Leonard said. "I think there's a lot of guys that can play with him. That's probably the reason he's had 11 partners." Strange planned to pair Woods with Scott Verplank last year at the Ryder Cup, but decided on Love at the last minute because of the golf ball; Love had a similar launch angle as Woods, important in alternate shot.

"I play the same game he plays — maybe not the same club, but I understand what he's doing," said Love, who won both his matches with Woods at The Belfry. "It's hard for a guy who doesn't play that way."

"But I've been around him since he was 15," Love said. "If you throw a guy in there that hasn't played under the gun with him that much,

Ways and Means Chair resigns

By Ed Hudson
Collegian Staff

A motion to allocate $5,100 for a pilot Judicial Advising Program, which will help to inform students of their rights, was passed by the Student Government Association Senate last night. Senator Anthony Pascoe also announced his resignation as chair of the Rules and Ethics subcommittee.

The advising program will work in conjunction with the Dean of Students office and with funding from the long-term reserves of the SGA.

"I get to see kids come in every day that don't, unfortunately, know their rights," Chair of Ways and Means Patrick Higgins said. "They're really left out in the cold." Higgins said there is presently no place for students to go to become informed of their rights at the University of Massachusetts.

Higgins said the SGA processes about 3,400 student cases every year. "These can be substantial cases," he added, referring to cases dealing with assault and sexual misconduct. "I think this needs to be a top issue," he said. "Making sure [students] get a fair shake."

According to Higgins, $240 of the allocated funds will be used for the funding of phone lines for the program. The remaining funds will go to employees on the program's payroll. Attorney General Mark Morrison said applications would be available for anyone interested in the position. Morrison will act as the program's supervisor.

Higgins said the funding would pay for the employment of two students working 12 hours each per week. According to him, the two students will work two days a week for six hours per day. "[The SGA will be] paying for students' time, so they can sit down and advocate for other students," Higgins said.

The Judicial Advisors Program was created by the SGA about 15 years ago. The University abandoned it two years ago because of budget constraints. "It's a great program we lost," Student Trustee Hannah Fatemi said. "I highly recommend it. All it does is help students."

Fatemi also announced that Dennis Austin, trustee and co-chair of the Presidential Search committee, recently notified her that she was unable to be appointed to the committee as she reported to the Senate last week. According to her, there continues to be no undergraduate representation on the search committee. "There needs to be undergraduate representation on that committee," she said. "You use your voice; I've been voicing our need."

Senator Pascoe announced his resignation as chair of the Rules and Ethics subcommittee. The committee is currently investigating possible infractions by four Senators and an officer serving in the SGA.

"I have always tried to do what is best for the University ... throughout this long and difficult period, I have felt it was my duty to persevere," he said. "In the past few days, however, it has become evident to me that I no longer justify continuing that effort.

"The interest of the Senate must always come before any personal considerations," he added. "I have never been a quitter. To leave office before my term is completed is abhorrent to every instinct in my body. But ... the

Ellen Story to speak at UMass

By Casey Novak
Collegian Correspondent

Ellen Story, State Representative for the third Hampshire District, will visit the University of Massachusetts today to speak on "A Women's View From Inside the Massachusetts State House," at 4 p.m. in room 917of the Campus Center.

Representative Story will come to UMass to discuss the current status and experience of progressive women in Massachusetts's politics and also to report on a recent national conference for progressive women in office.

"We are totally delighted that Ellen is coming. There are still so few women involved in electoral politics running for political office," said Sandy Mandel, associate director, special events of the Everywoman's Center. "It will be great to hear more about what's going on with progressive women in politics all over in the United States. We need to hear each other's voices, so we can all stay inspired."

Representative Story is currently serving in her sixth full term in the Massachusetts Legislature. She is the first woman to represent her district, the towns of Amherst and Granby.

As a crusader for women's issues, public education, human service programs and a strong supporter of labor and environmental issues, Representative Story has been recognized many times for her accomplishments. These accomplishments include receiving the 2002 National Alliance for the Mentally Ill Legislator of the Year Award, the 2002 Legislator of the Year Award from Girls Incorporated, an organization that serves adolescent girls, the 2001 Women's Bar Association Legislator of the Year Award, the 2001 Legislator of the Year Award from the Parent/Professional Advocacy League and the 2001 Outstanding Legislator of the Year Award from a coalition of organizations that address health and mental health service for immigrants and refugees. She also received the 2000 — and first ever — Legislative Advocacy Award from the Stravros Center in Amherst, an organization that serves people with disabilities.

Before she served in the statehouse, Ellen Story was a community activist and the associate executive director of the Family Planning Council of Western Massachusetts for 17 years.

"She's been a community activist, and now she is in her sixth term as a state legislator," said Karen Lederer, chief undergraduate advisor of women's studies at UMass. "Ellen Story knows both the inside and outside perspectives, so I think [her speech] will be very exciting."

Representative Story was raised in Texas, and is also a graduate from the University of Texas. She went on to do graduate work at the University of Wisconsin, SUNY Stonybrook and has a Master's degree from Cambridge College. She received an Honorary Alumna award from UMass in 1998.

Representative Story moved to Massachusetts in 1970 and to Amherst in 1972. She became involved in local issues, serving three years on the Regional School Committee, as well as six years as a Town Meeting member.

Representative Story's talk is co-sponsored by the UMass women's studies department and the Everywoman's Center. The event is free, open to the public and wheelchair accessible. Light refreshments will be served.

Violence forum opens communication

A group of students and community members meet yesterday in the Campus Center to discuss the roots and effects of violence on campus.

By Matt Elder
Collegian Staff

Yesterday, a group of students, faculty and community members met in the University of Massachusetts Campus Center to discuss the recent violence on and off campus.

The group included members of the Student Government Association as well as Lieutenant Thomas Thrasher of the University of Massachusetts Police Department.

Both the roots and the effects of violence were discussed at the forum. Tom Schiff, a health educator at University Health Services (UHS), often views the results of violence at UHS, while Lt. Thrasher found himself in the middle of the recent riots in the Southwest residential area.

Schiff mentioned the issue of sexual violence. "More women have come [to UHS] for sexual assault this semester than all last year," he said.

Evandro Carvalho, the Resident Assistant of Thoreau dormitory, said that many people don't know how much of a problem stalking and relationship abuse is on campus. "It's causing fear in their minds," he said.

Thrasher, who was hospitalized for being hit by a rock at the Hobart riots this spring, said, "unfortunately on the weekends, Budweiser rules."

Lt. Thrasher outlined what measures police take during riots. He explained that the first action taken is bringing in horses to disperse the crowd. Next, the police use a "pepper ball," which is similar to a paintball, and it has a similar effect to pepper spray. Then, as a last resort, the police will use a "sponge round", which is a piece of foam rubber that is shot at rioters who don't respond to the other measures.

Lt. Thrasher compared the riots to a hurricane. He said that the eye of the hurricane is groups of select people, whom he said mainly aren't UMass students. The rest of the hurricane consists of a large group of people who are present to watch the events.

Larry Goldbaum, Director of the Office of Jewish Affairs, said that the riots were bad, but he compared them to the riot after the 1986 World Series. "It turned into a race riot," Goldbaum said. "I'm glad it didn't go the way it did then."

Marcos Bachman, Treasurer of the Orchard Hill Government, said that the riots were greatly exaggerated. He also said that a problem on campus is the lack of communication.

Also mentioned at the forum was the campus escort service. Levi O'Brien, Chair of Administration Affairs said that while UMass does have a walking escort service on campus, some people are either afraid of using it, or aren't aware of its existence. He said that some people, primarily women, still feel nervous walking home with a stranger.

Many students mentioned that violence on campus consists of more than the recent riots. Lt. Thrasher brought up that Resident Assistants and Resident Directors have recently been victims of violence. He said he hasn't remembered this type of violence occurring in the past 20 years that he's been here.

While the group wasn't brought together to offer any solutions, they did come up with some strategies to deter violence. Many participants brought up the connection between drinking and violence.

"We need to change the alcohol culture on campus," said Brian Long, Secretary of University Policy. "We have a culture on campus directly related to alcohol."

Other strategies were brought up like keeping the center of campus filled with student activity during the week.

Participants also mentioned the relationship between students and police.

"There's been a deterioration in the relationship with students and police," said Long in regards to the way the Amherst Police responds to problems on and off campus. "I've lost a lot of respect for the APD."

"We need to be constantly educating people," said Sid Ferreira, of Enrollment Services.

"It's amazing how much the students don't know," He said The Collegian, as well as other media outlets, should participate in education. "We need the students to see UMass as their home," he said. He said that this would make UMass students less eager to destroy their home.

State Legislature approves economic stimulus package

By Jennifer Peter
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — A long-awaited economic stimulus package won preliminary legislative approval from the House and Senate yesterday, offering businesses a variety of incentives to create new jobs in Massachusetts and lifting the state's Blue Law ban on Sunday liquor sales.

The $100 million package would also create a one-day sales tax holiday on Aug. 14 of next year, aimed at back-to-school shopping, and pour $2 million into an international tourism initiative.

A provision championed by the Senate, which would have encouraged stem cell research in Massachusetts, was stricken from the final compromise bill, which was hammered out during the waning hours of the legislative session. Final enactment was expected by midnight, leaving its fate in the hands of Gov. Mitt Romney.

A previous version of the bill also proposed two sales tax holidays, one of which would have been in December. Leaders say the one-day sales tax holiday will still cost the state $5 million in revenue, but should help businesses during a slow sales month.

The package was considered one of the key goals of the Legislature this year, as the state tries to crawl out of an economic downturn that to the loss of 160,000 jobs.

"We thought that there was something we could do to grow this economy ... to grow jobs and create a better quality of life," said Rep. Peter Larkin, D-Pittsfield, who helped craft the compromise. "This will jumpstart this economy. Because we can't afford to wait on the sidelines for something to happen." Earlier yesterday, the Legislature approved a $102 million supplemental budget that will restore funding to the University of Massachusetts, rape crisis centers and homeless shelters and lead to the Internet posting of the worst sex offenders.

Sex offenders would also have to register with the state at least 48 hours before being released from prison, rather than within 48 hours after their departure.

Lawmakers also took the first steps toward providing property tax relief to the residents of Boston and several other cities and scrambled to reach agreement on a job-creation bill that has been in the works since July.

The bill, which was promoted heavily by Boston Mayor Thomas Menino, would give relief to about 50 communities who would have otherwise been forced to dramatically increase the residential property tax this year in order to abide by a state law limiting how much of the local property tax can be paid by businesses. The bill provides temporary relief and establishes a commission to arrive at a permanent solution.

Another bill that won final approval yesterday would guarantee that state workers on military leave continue to receive

RESCHEDULING OF FINAL EXAMS ON OFFICIAL SNOW DAYS - FALL 2003

In order to reschedule final examinations in case of snow, two alternate exam periods have been devised. They are 6:30 p.m. and 8:45 p.m. each exam day. The use of these alternative periods in the event of closings is outlined below. This policy goes into effect ONLY if the University is officially closed. The snow day Hot Line is 545-3630. If the University is open, all exams are expected to take place as scheduled. Each faculty member should inform his or her class of the planned time and location of the rescheduled final exam in the event of a snow day. All rescheduled exams will be held in the same location as published in the final exam schedule.

If the University is closed until 10:30 a.m.

8:00 am	rescheduled to 6:30 pm same day
10:30 am	held as originally scheduled
1:30 pm	held as originally scheduled
4:00 pm	held as originally scheduled

If the University is closed all day but open in the evening:

8:00 am	rescheduled to 6:30 pm same day
10:30 am	rescheduled to 8:45 pm same day
1:30 pm	rescheduled to 6:30 pm next exam day
4:00 pm	rescheduled to 8:45 pm next exam day
except:
1:30 pm Dec. 19	rescheduled to 1:30 pm Dec. 20
4:00 pm Dec. 19	rescheduled to 4:00 pm Dec. 20

Bush urges Europe to combine efforts in Iraq

By Tom Raum
Associated Press

LONDON (AP) — President Bush urged Europe yesterday to put aside bitter war disagreements with the United States and work to build democracy in Iraq or risk returning the nation to terrorists. Anti-war demonstrators mobilized for a march of tens of thousands today.
Bush conceded in a speech that deep differences remain over Iraq, even among staunch war allies, the United States and Britain.

But, he asserted, "we did not charge hundred of miles into the heart of Iraq and pay a bitter cost of casualties and liberate 25 million people only to retreat before a band of thugs and assassins."

His speech followed an elegant welcoming ceremony with Queen Elizabeth II at Buckingham Palace, which included a 41-gun salute and a review of troops on foot and on horseback.

Meanwhile, anti-war protesters made preparations for huge demonstrations against Bush's 3 1/2-day state visit.

There were isolated, smaller demonstrations around the city yesterday. At one point, as the president's motorcade arrived at Banqueting House for his speech, noisy demonstrators could be seen and easily heard just two blocks away. The demonstrators, held back by police lines, could not be heard inside the hall where Bush spoke.

Bush acknowledged differing views about U.S.-led involvement in postwar Iraq, but said, "Whatever has come before, we now have only two options: To keep our word or to break our word."

"Failure of democracy in Iraq would throw its people back into misery and turn that country over to terrorists who wish to destroy us," Bush told about 400 foreign policy experts and invited guests.

He was warmly received with applause.

Bush asserted that there are times, as with Saddam Hussein in Iraq, when "the violent restraint of violent men" is justified.

"In some cases, the measured use of force is all that protects us from a chaotic world ruled by force," he said.

Bush said he still strongly supports international organizations, like the United Nations, which he bypassed in going to war in Iraq. But he said the United Nations must be willing to enforce its own demands — or lose its relevancy.

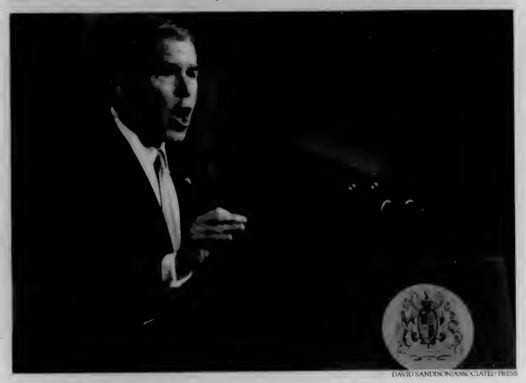
Turning to the Middle East, Bush cited several months of "setbacks and frustrations."

He said European leaders "should withdraw all favor and support from any Palestinian leader who fails his people and betrays their cause," an apparent reference to Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

Bush urged Israel to end the "daily humiliation" of Palestinians and not to undercut peace prospects "with the placements of walls and fences."

Also on yesterday, Bush met with leaders of Parliament and some relatives of the 67 British victims of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States. Today, Bush meets with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, whose close support of Bush on Iraq has drawn rising public opposition in Britain.

"It really is about time we started to realize who our allies are, who our enemies are, stick with the one and fight the other," Blair told the House of Commons earlier. His remarks drew loud applause.



Bush and first lady Laura Bush were guests of honor at a white-tie state dinner last night, held in room with cathedral ceilings at Buckingham Palace, where the Bushes were staying during the visit. Oversized paintings and tapestries covered the walls and the deep red carpet matched roses that overflowed from tables set with china, flatware and glasses dating to the time of King George IV in the early 1800s.

"You led the response to an unprovoked terrorist attack, which was on a scale never seen before," the queen said in toasting Bush. "Our two countries stand firm in their determination to defeat terrorism."

Demonstrators gathered behind metal barriers near the palace, watched by large numbers of yellow-jacketed police officers. As darkness fell, police scuffled with some of the several hundred demonstrators who assembled outside the palace and banged drums, blew whistles and charged "Bush go home!"

"Bush stole the presidency. Blair lied to the people. Bush led us down the path of war. They are not listening to the public," Nina Baker, a Scottish Green Party activist from Glasgow, said yesterday outside Buckingham Palace.

On the other hand, Denis McShane, European minister in Blair's government and a Labor Party activist, described Bush's address as a "very forward-looking" speech. "It belies some of the views people have had of the president in the past ... that of a caricature," he said.

their full salaries. Several hundred state workers called up from the reserves since Sept. 11, 2001 have seen their pay reduced from their state-level salaries to their military salaries.

Any non-budget related bills that were not approved by midnight will be carried over into the second year of the two-year legislative session in January for further consideration.

Because of the last-minute action on the budget and the economic stimulus package, the House and Senate changed their rules so that they will be able to consider any line-item vetoes of these two bills when they return to session next year.

Without this change, the Democrat-dominated Legislature would have no opportunity to review or override any changes or deletions Republican Gov. Mitt Romney might make to these two bills.

Michael Jackson wanted for child molestation

By Robert Jablon
Associated Press

SANTA BARBARA, Calif. (AP) — Authorities issued a warrant for Michael Jackson's arrest on charges of molesting a child and asked the pop superstar yesterday to turn himself in and surrender his passport. Jackson's spokesman called the allegations "scurrilous and totally unfounded."

The 45-year-old King of Pop was accused of multiple counts of lewd or lascivious acts with a child under 14. A decade ago, Jackson was also accused of molestation but was never charged because the youngster refused to testify.

"I am sad that there is another victim out there. I feel bad for the family. I feel bad for the victim. Beyond that, I feel it is a sad thing for all those involved," District Attorney Thomas W. Sneddon Jr. said at a news conference.

Jackson was believed to be in Las Vegas working at a recording studio.

"Get over here and get checked in," the prosecutor said.

Sneddon would not say when or where the alleged crimes took place or how old the youngster was. He said an affidavit outlining the details will be sealed for 45 days.
But Brian Oxman, an attorney who has represented the Jackson family over the years, told CBS that the case involves the alleged molestation of a 12-year-old boy at Jackson's Neverland Ranch, the storybook playground where the singer has been known to hold sleepover parties with children. Oxman is not representing Jackson.

CBS immediately pulled a Jackson music special planned for next Wednesday on his greatest hits and the impact on pop culture of the former child star who got his start with his brothers as a member of the singing-and-dancing Jackson 5.

"Given the gravity of the charges against Mr. Jackson, we believe it would be inappropriate at this time to broadcast an entertainment special," the network said.

committee needs a fulltime chair, particularly at this time with the very serious issues which it faces."

Senator Giarusso has taken over the role of committee chair. Giarusso said he hopes to proceed with the investigation of the four senators charged with infractions in a "quick and fair manner."

"The first essential is to begin healing the wounds of this government, to put the bitterness and divisions of the recent past behind us," Pascoe said. "To rediscover those shared ideals that lie at the heart of our strength and unity as students as well as senators."

Pascoe said he would continue to work as a member of Senate.

Zsuzsa Cook, chair of Finance, announced that the Finance committee did not meet quorum last week and therefore did not hold a meeting due to lack of attendance by its members. She said that both the Ways and Means committee and the Coordinating Council also did not for the same reasons. "It's really important to attend the meetings," she declared to the Senate. "We need to get stuff done, and we can't."

The Senate unanimously appointed Susan Allen, a freshman communications major, to the Student Judiciary, though she said she would step down from any decision involving ALANA appointed seats. "I would have a bias," she said, referring to her involvement with the ALANA caucus. Allen was on the law-trial team for three years at her high school. Juniors Brian Meaney and Allison Rowland were also appointed Election Commissioners.

Russell Plato, secretary of Diversity Issues, announced that the next Diversity Round Table will take place Monday at 3 p.m. in room 164 of the Campus Center.

Thirty-nine of the 53 students currently serving in the Senate were present for the meeting. According to Mina Safain, secretary of Public Policy and Relations, 13 students have been removed from the Senate because of absentee policies this year.

Speaker of the Senate, Jared Nokes, addressed the SGA last night during the weekly meeting.

EDITORIAL OPINION

Jonestown: a forgotten tragedy 25 years later

This past Wednesday marked the 25th anniversary of the Jonestown tragedy, the mass suicide that took the lives over 913 (including 270 children) individuals in the South American nation of Guyana. "Jonestown" was one of the darkest and most shocking moments of recent times. But when you ask random students around campus about the Jonestown situation, an alarmingly high number of them have no knowledge of it ever happening. And if they do, it is in the form of disjointed and incorrect facts.

For those of you who aren't aware, Jonestown was the name given to a community of people lead by the Reverend Jim Jones. The community belonged to a group known as the People's Temple. Its members, believing in some form of after-life, and believing Jones to be the reincarnation of Christ, committed a mass-suicide (by drinking cups of cyanide-laced punch) as a "revolutionary act."

Jonestown was a tragedy of great proportion. Yet the silver anniversary of the event was nowhere to be found in most newspapers or TV news shows, and there were little to no parades or memorandum ceremonies. How can it be that such a horrific event can fade into memory only 25 short years after it took place?

This question may be best answered by looking at another, more recent tragedy that is already starting to show signs of being forgotten —Sept. 11. On the one year anniversary of the World Trade Center disaster, newspapers and televisions were filled with tributes, memorials, etc. But by the two year anniversary of the event, just a mere two months ago, the coverage had dropped significantly. The number of American flags hanging outside of people's houses had lessened, as had the number of people wearing "God Bless America" t-shirts.

One reason why people tend to forget the past is because it makes it easier to deal with. It is human nature to repress horrific, traumatizing events; we do so to cope with such large-scale tragedy. But there is a difference between repressing tragedy and forgetting it. When society as a whole forgets a tragic event, such as Jonestown, it robs future generations of being educated about history. It also shows disrespect to the victims and their families.

So maybe the answer is simpler than psychological repression. Maybe we forget because forgetting is simply easier. Going to a memorial ceremony or parade takes a great deal of effort; most of us don't even have the time to take five minutes to remember soldiers on Veterans Day.

Most likely, the Jonestown tragedy had no impact on any of our lives personally. But that does not mean that we should forget about it, or not learn about it altogether. Sept. 11 is a more recent and more alarming case (not to mention one that has a greater impact on our lives), of this regrettable trend. Unfortunately, society as a whole is not like it once was, and very few of us are willing to take the time and/or effort to really pay tribute to those who have died in tragic events. With technology heading the way it is, with people's lives being more and more on-the-go, things show no signs of changing. And that fact may be just as sad, if not sadder, than the actual events that have been forgotten.

A student's worst nightmare

Gilad Skolnick

I detest it, I despise it and I abhor it. I try to avoid it by all possible means, as it is the subject of every nightmare and every fear. A college student's worst problem is what I speak of, something so unpleasant, so horrid, that I would rather take a 9 a.m. class.

No, I do not speak of famine or pollution, but of a concept that to this day I am trying to comprehend: laundry. It was mid-semester during my freshmen year when I started noticing an absence of clothing in my drawer that this far-fetched idea of doing laundry crept up on me. I had to start being realistic; this terrible act would have to be done eventually, and I could no longer be in denial. I journeyed downstairs, and I did it.

To this very day I am still recovering from the horrors of doing laundry, trying to limit undergoing this procedure as much as possible. It is utterly ridiculous, for if now I am expected to regularly do laundry where will it end? Maybe next week I'll be expected to sew my own clothing? Cut my own hair? I shall do whatever it takes to delay this event.

Luckily, running out of t-shirts has never been a problem, as just about every place or event is giving away a t-shirt and every club and organization is selling a really cool looking one these days. That's not to mention that time last spring where I signed up for a dozen credit cards to get five t-shirts.

As for underwear, when my supplies dwindle it means taking a trip to Wal-Mart to restock. It doesn't take up much space, and you can always buy more. I can go commando on weekends, and when left with no choice, a bathing suit can make a great substitute for boxers.

Socks are also cheap to buy, easy to steal from your roommate or even find lying around in the laundry room. When those run out, I go by the philosophy that it's sandal weather until I see snow.

Now, jeans were designed in the 1800s with one purpose in mind, to be rugged and last long. The miners in California used them as they chipped at rocks all day in the dark dirty cold mines. These magical pieces of clothing have an amazing ability not to get dirty and smell good for long periods of time. In other words, change sparingly.

Unfortunately, there comes a time every semester when it's too cold to go outside only wearing paper bags, when there is no choice. Unlike the spoiled people of Orchard Hill, the lazy people of Southwest, or the sly people of Sylvan, Central has no such elevators. We in upper central value such fine things as exercise and not wasting electricity. Unfortunately, this includes walking down sometimes up to five flights of stairs with a months worth of laundry, which can get quite heavy.

I do not oppose this practice of laundry because of ecological, financial or ideological reasons, but simply because of its difficulty. It's just that I have an easier time getting something completed in Whitmore than doing laundry.

Colors must be separated from whites, light colors must be separated from dark colors, and no one really knows where boxers and jeans go. Towels are a whole different matter, along with sheets, hats and scarves. Apparently many shirts have their own individualized instructions on that tag on the back. One has to be a physics major to figure them out. Then, after you have separated your clothing into 15 different categories, you find out that some clothing even needs different temperatures of water. I'm still lost when it comes to bleach; I have no clue what you do with that stuff, as well as detergent. There's the hard kind, the liquid kind, and this fabric softener concept is completely foreign to me.

If that wasn't enough, there are all those impatient nuts that roam around the building. I put my clothing in the washing machine or dryer and plan to pick it up within a few days. As someone with a busy schedule as myself, it's very difficult to find time for these things. Then some psycho who can't wait a bit to put his clothing in decides to take out all my clothing and leave it on top of the machine.

Folding clothing is still way beyond me. If Abercrombie & Fitch can make a ton of money selling pre-ripped clothing, then I'm sure the crumpled up clothing look will catch on soon enough.

Thus, I call for the complete termination of all laundry. Now is the time for change; now is the time for one time use clothing. In an era where everything else is already one time use, from cameras, bottles, shopping bags, etc, why not add just one more thing? Without laundry, people would have time to join such important groups as MassPIRG or the UMass Student Run Goat Herd club (which I just found out today really does exist).

As it is, clothing is cheap to make, with sweatshop laborers making five cents an hour. The only thing that would change would be an increase demand for clothing, which would mean more people with jobs. The price of clothing would drop to make it cheaper, and I would be able to leave my UMass laundry support group and never have to undergo such humiliating processes of laundry again. No longer would my confidence and self-esteem suffer.

Not another column about Iraq

Rachel Smith

Last Friday in Illinois, Wheaton College lifted a 143-year ban on dancing. The newly liberated Wheaton students now face fresh challenges, such as how to dance and who to dance with. The students were free to try out their new bestowed freedom all weekend, although many of them chose to practice at home a little before heading out to the clubs.

The day after Wheaton was liberated, Specialist John R. Sullivan of the 626th Forward Support Battalion, 101st Airborne Division, died in a helicopter crash over Mosul. Sullivan grew up 20 minutes away from Wheaton in Countryside, Illinois. He was 26 years old, and if circumstances were different, he may have been out dancing with Wheaton students Saturday night instead of flying in a UH-60 Blackhawk above Northern Iraq.

As Spc. Sullivan was fighting to liberate the Iraqi people, Wheaton students were struggling to liberate themselves. According to CNN, alumni expressed concern when the small Christian school lifted the dancing ban. Wheaton graduates and parents of current students were concerned that the college was getting too liberal, and that allowing dancing was the first slide down a slippery slope to hedonism and moral decay. The students, however, were most concerned with not looking like idiots on the dance floor.

With all the excitement at Wheaton, it's easy to forget about people like Spc. Sullivan who are serving in the military. It's easy to forget that even here at the University of Massachusetts in sleepy little Amherst, where students enjoy a liberal campus and many freedoms, there are people who sacrificed and served in Iraq.

While the debate over the war rages on in classrooms, dorm rooms and even the school paper, for many students who are getting ready to ship out or who have returned from the Middle East, the Iraq question is not just academic.

UMass ignores the very worthy stories about the University students for whom Iraq is not a chapter in a book or a presentation in Political Science 121, but a reality that they must face.

Military units from nearby Westover and Springfield are currently deployed in Iraq, and many local veterans have returned to Massachusetts. As family members pace in front of their telephones, waiting for a call from their loved ones who are stationed overseas, UMass students are tying on their dancing shoes, oblivious to the emotional pain and sacrifices of local veterans and their families.

I work with veterans at the Dean of Students' Office, so I talk to returning service members weekly. Across the board, they are thrilled to sit in a classroom again, sleep in a cramped but well-heated dorm room, write papers and do all the things that we take for granted at the University. They feel the same way Wheaton students did last weekend, precariously stepping onto the dance floor, nervous but hopeful.

However, Wheaton students are sharing this experience together. They're teaching each other new steps, and they're not laughing when a classmate slips on the dance floor. Wheaton is a small Christian college with a common set of beliefs that binds its 3,000 or so students together. UMass is a much larger institution and has a student body offering no such help to the returning or deploying community of veterans.

Even the school paper fails to recognize local veterans, but doesn't hesitate to fill its pages with stories and editorials about the peace movement, ranging from angry calls for Iraqi resistance to thoughtful analyses of the conflict. UMass ignores the very worthy stories about University students for whom Iraq is not a chapter in a book, or a presentation in Political Science 121, but a reality that they must face as soldiers, families and humans.

Becca is a 2003 graduate of UMass' wildlife and fisheries department, former coxswain on the school's crew team and engaged to Plymouth, Massachusetts native and soldier in the U.S. Army, Jim. Last semester, I had dinner with Becca in the Blue Wall and handed out yellow ribbons in the Campus Center with her as she suffered through each day and worried about her fiancee, who entered Iraq with the first wave of forces in March of this year.

Becca taped an envelope on her door filled with yellow ribbons, symbols of family and friends' wishes for service members to return home safely from war. Students repeatedly vandalized Becca's dorm, scattering her ribbons on the floor and writing inflammatory messages on her dry erase board. At a time when she needed support and understanding from the UMass community, her dorm snubbed her. She didn't support the war; she supported Jim, but her peers didn't even try to understand that.

War veterans and their families aren't a bunch of strangers in another place or another time; they're your classmates, your peers. The stories of service members that UMass ignores aren't somebody else's; they're yours. Your generation is fighting in Iraq, and your fellow UMass students are coming home and shipping out. This is our war, whether we want it or not, and Iraq is our problem to solve. Like Wheaton, I hope we can face these new challenges together, as a unified student body, one step at a time.

Something strange, part I

Frannie Carr

A tour of a haunted insane asylum, a spo-radic dance party in the street during red traffic lights, a keg party in a bookstore, crab Rangoon to boot, a martini bar buried within a tunnel. Yes, just your average weekend in Northampton.

Now that I have tickled your interest, unfortunately, I do not have enough space to delve into all of the above. But I have chosen, what I hope you would agree, the most interesting incident to elaborate on: The Northampton State Hospital.

I am researching various places in the valley for a project I am doing both for a class and for the news and public affairs departments of WMUA radio, 91.1fm. The topic is "Ghosts of the Valley."

One of the most obvious places I began to research was the old abandoned hospital, originally called the Northampton Lunatic Asylum. I had heard from a few people that the asbestos infested buildings that lie at the top of the hill above the Smith Campus were believed to be haunted. A friend who is an Amherst native told me that during high school, trying to sneak access into the old decaying buildings with some cheap whiskey was a popular dare and weekend pastime. He also told me that getting close to the buildings was quite difficult, and that vigilant security guards had always thwarted their attempts.

So, two weekends ago, I resolved to see for myself. I drove up the hill and parked my car. Lo and behold, not two minutes later, I was being approached by a flashlight and a uniform. The guard informed me that to even be on the premises was illegal without written permission from the state. He gave me further instruction, but guaranteed that there would be some red tape involved. In fact, he was right. The next day, I followed up and couldn't find any mention of the person that I was supposed to appeal to on the Web site he had given me. I was so inundated by other information that I put the state hospital on the back burner; I was considering giving it up.

Then, during my Wednesday morning radio show, I decided to appeal to my listeners for help. I asked if anyone had any strange or unexplainable experiences anywhere locally. Normally, when I invite my listeners to call during my 6 to 9 a.m. slot, I am unsuccessful.

In fact, usually, I don't get a single call until around 7:45 a.m. Not this past Wednesday, however. The second I mentioned ghosts, the phones started ringing and steadily kept on ringing for the duration of the show. Many people provided additional places to investigate that they had heard about, while others had personal experiences. But then, toward the end of the show, I got an unusual call. "Yeah," said a low breathy voice when I answered the phone. "You doing anything about the Northampton State Hospital?"

"Yes," I said. "I'm looking into it. Why? Do you know something?"

"I used to know someone who heard screaming from the windows, long after it shut down." And then all of the sudden, "Yeah, okay, take care." Click.

I was intrigued. My mysterious caller, unintentionally, convinced me to stick with it. And so two days later, I went back.

I was hoping that the same security guard would be on duty. I would ask him if he could give me more explicit directions about who to get in touch with regarding access to the grounds. He wasn't there.

When my friend and I pulled up at 8:15 p.m., we spied a much younger guard in the security trailer. We figured we'd try to get on the grounds. It was worth a shot. And sure enough, the younger guard didn't seem bound by rules and regulations: "Go ahead and take a look around," he said. So we did. And it was eerie.

We got relatively close to both the Male Attendants House and the Memorial Building that was across the street. Kaete, my friend, was fearless. She kept leading me further on, but as the light from the road lessened and we traveled further away from the security post, I put my foot down. "Kaete, let's go back, and do an interview. I don't want to go any further. We've got enough." She eventually conceded, and we returned to the trailer.

We thanked the guard. We asked if he ever got scared working all alone at such a spooky place. "Nah," he smiled and shrugged. "I'm new." We asked if he believed in ghosts. He shrugged again; he told us to come back at midnight, because the next guy on duty knew everything about the place. We said we would.

We were packing up to leave when one of us, as an afterthought asked, "Do you ever go in there alone?" He said no resolutely and then told us about the tunnels which connect all of the buildings, including, Old Main, which is the oldest, biggest and not visible from the road. Our eyes widened, and we started asking questions simultaneously. He pointed to a map of the grounds on a weathered bulletin board in the trailer. We rushed past him to the map. "Demons" was scribbled in pencil in the middle of Old Main. "I'll take you down there if you want."

Stay tuned for Part II.

Coach offers reality check

Peter Trovato

Bill Hanson is making his way onto the cover of the Boston Globe sports page. He's not affiliated with the Celtics or strategizing for the New England Patriots. He's not on the search committee to replace Grady Little and he surely isn't involved with the local college sports scene. Instead, Coach Bill Hanson is in a legal battle with the governing body of high school sports in Massachusetts: the Massachusetts Interscholastic Athletic Association (MIAA).

Hanson is the longtime ice-hockey coach of Catholic Memorial High School (CM) in Boston. Recently, he was suspended for 10 games of his upcoming season for violating a rule that bars coaches from participating in practices before the start of the season. Hanson has been found guilty of supervising a pre-season camp. This is all a smoke screen; the suspension is a front for a deeper issue that the MIAA disagrees with.

Last year, Hanson and his CM hockey team was the subject of a three part series that appeared in the Boston Globe. The series followed the team throughout their season and left nothing to the imagination of the reader. Everything was documented, from the player's locker room behavior to Hanson's controversial style of governing. The Globe articles shed light on the pre-season camp that eventually got Hanson suspended, but the MIAA sanction is not about a violation of code.

I played for Coach Hanson at CM. He is the definition of the "throw back" style of coaching. Playing for him was nothing short of being part of Patton's army. The team was run like a group of small soldiers, whose primary goal was to defend the good name of their school and their leader.

Most of his sentences started with "goddamned." The "f" word was commonplace, as were all other curses. Radios weren't allowed to be on before a game; this was time to think about the task at hand. If he found out you had a girlfriend, he would remind you: "chicks and sticks don't mix." Practices were more of an emotional workout than a physical exercise; if you got through the full hour without being yelled at, you felt you had just won the lottery. He did not discriminate; he would bench his captains and curse out his stars, break sticks and throw water bottles. And if you took a penalty during a game, even if the referee made a bogus call, you were out.

Coach Hanson was not light on discipline and the series conducted by the Globe placed this issue front and center, however controversy ensued. The Globe ran editorials from readers claiming Hanson was not suited to work with teenagers. The talk around hockey rinks was of the coach's brutish nature. Catholic Memorial was criticized for employing a coach that was politically incorrect. This disturbed the MIAA.

They immediately posted a message on their website condemning the actions of the Catholic Memorial program. They wanted to make it clear that the MIAA did not endorse curse words and coaches being critical of players. In other words: reality.

However, curse words and constructive criticism have produced a dynasty of winning teams. Hanson is the most successful high school hockey coach in state history. He has won over a dozen Massachusetts state hockey titles and his teams have been voted national champions several times. He has produced Olympians and successful National Hockey League players. Countless numbers of coach Hanson's players have gone on to play at the collegiate level; this year alone, there are over 10 of his former players participating in division one hockey, two at the University of Massachusetts.

Hanson's success can be attributed to his Bobby Knight style of coaching. The MIAA does not agree with his methods. They put up a smoke screen, found him guilty on a minor charge, and suspended him — like the FBI getting Al Capone on tax evasion.

Nowadays, too many high school athletic coaches are worried about abiding by the proper coaching technique than what is best for the student athlete. There is no emphasis on character development and accountability.

The Globe ran editorials from readers claiming Hanson was not suited to work with teenagers. The talk around hockey rinks was of the coach's brutish nature. Catholic Memorial was criticized for employing a coach that was politically incorrect.

Hanson runs a tough ship. He's hard on the ice, but tougher on character. If he sees a player slacking off, he opens his classroom for mandatory morning study hall hours. He's the type of coach that insists his players stand still during the national anthem played before games.

His style throws political correctness out the window and demands accountability. There is no prescribed way of coaching young athletes, but Hanson's way works. He wins championships and builds character. The MIAA is blind to this. They see a tyrant getting front-page press headlines and feature stories in the Boston Globe. Organizations like the MIAA should not be overstepping their bounds and demanding a passive coaching style. They don't want leaders. They don't want good coaches; they want puppets. They want every game to end in a tie and for every player to get a pat on the back. But Hanson comes with no strings attached. His games don't end in ties; they end in wins, losses, and a hard dose of reality — something the MIAA should immediately prescribe to.

The right to choose: oxymoron?

Emily O'Brien

It appears as though President Bush's signing of the law banning partial birth abortions is not the only thing adding fuel to the fire of the controversial topic, as is evident by the recent boycott in Austin, Texas in which a variety of construction workers refused to partake in the building of an abortion clinic.

The Planned Parenthood clinic, which was to be opened next fall, would not only offer abortions but intended on providing services such as AIDS testing and cancer screening. The clinic anticipated making available gynecological examinations, vasectomy procedures, as well as a wealth of other medical care to the residents of Austin.

Those plans came to a halt, however, when the contractor hired to construct the clinic couldn't find anyone willing to work for him, ranging from plumbers to cement suppliers. The self professed pro-life leader of this boycott is Chris Danze, a prominent construction industry executive in the Austin area.

Danze put his authority in the local construction scene to work when he contacted a variety of contractors and advised them that it was in their best interest not to do business with the abortion clinic project. Fearing that involving themselves with the project would hurt business, many contractors, regardless of their stance on the issue of abortion, heeded Danze's advice and either pulled out of the project or refused to partake in it.

Danze, who compared the construction of the clinic to the construction of a concentration camp in the Holocaust, is a perfect example of how, although legally speaking women theoretically have the right to choose, society continues to construct obstacles. This is evidenced ironically in Texas by the literal refusal to construct a clinic, which strips from women the autonomy of that right.

It was over 30 years ago the milestone case of Roe vs. Wade convinced advocates of abortion in the notion that the legalization of abortion meant reproductive equality for all women. However, society and particularly the government continue to hinder that equality by forcing women to make a very personal decision often times in public forums in which the underlying message is one of scrutiny. This is accomplished by the variety of ways in which society tries to influence and sometimes even determine that choice. These ways include age qualifications for making the choice to have an abortion, parental notification rules for teenagers including a parental consent law which is enforced in Massachusetts, mandatory waiting periods and counseling.

Danze, who compared the construction of the clinic to the construction of a concentration camp in the Holocaust, is a perfect example of how ... society continues to construct obstacles.

In the years before the legalization of abortion, the years in which equality seemed just out of reach, supporters often spoke of the legalization of abortion in the terms that it was a woman's right to have an abortion. Yet, due to societies uncomfort with the idea of abortion and all that it entailed, in the years following Roe vs. Wade, the language of abortion was transformed into the notion that it was a woman's choice to decide whether or not she wanted to have an abortion.

The complex differences of the definitions of these two terms and what they meant to abortion were confirmed in 1980. In Harris vs. Mackrae, it was ruled that Roe vs. Wade had not established a constitutional right to abortion. This was a landmark decision due to what these two terms meant to the women who were seeking abortions.

If abortion were to be a constitutional right, then it would have been available to all women, i.e. publicly funded. However, speaking in terms of choice, although abortion was available to all women, the readiness of that availability was significantly difficult for certain members of society to attain. Thus abortion in a sense became a commodity that only those of good financial standing could obtain; therefore, women who often wanted to abort often found that they had no choice in the matter.

Regardless of your stance on the matter of abortion, whether you claim to be pro-life or pro-choice, as humans we must all respect the rights of each and every individual. Although we may not agree, we cannot stand in the way of them making that decision, whether it be refusing to construct a building which would offer abortions or socially stigmatizing a woman who chooses to abort a pregnancy as a bad person.

So my advice to Chris Danze, as well as to the contractors that insist on boycotting the construction of a clinic that intended to offer the residents of Austin a variety of beneficial medical services, is to devote that time andr nonselfish reasons that would actu eenergy into utilizing their skills foally profit the whole of society.

Power tools: not in the garage anymore

Deborah Geiger

What are you working so hard?

Power. Regardless of your major, you want a job, you want to make money and you want to be powerful. Power, or the illusion of it, is the bottom line in any hierarchy, the means to more rapidly achieving your dreams, and something indefinable that people wait years to attain.

Luckily, you can learn how to be powerful, and I will tell you the basics. You really don't need to (initially) own a slew of Benzes and hang out with celebrities; you can start now by doing simple but important tasks in your college years to practice for that first job, that first million and your first E! Hollywood special.

Your first goal should be to build a network of people you know and who know you. Learn names. There is nothing more cliché and distancing than "I'm really bad with names." We are at a huge college, in the middle of a five-college area, so there is real potential for meeting lots of people!

First of all, look good. I know that's easier said than done, but really, start looking even smarter and sexier than usual. People will notice. Your confidence and yes, power, will improve more than you know. So start tomorrow morning. Go for that morning power walk you've been putting off, wearing incognito black sunglasses. Remember, you're a celebrity in training, so look the part. You don't want the Paparazzi stalking you anymore.

If you have a cell phone, don't talk loudly. First of all, it's rude, and second of all, be mysterious about who and what you're talking about. Get off the phone first. Value your time and other peoples'. When people see you doing this, taking care of yourself, you become important. Taking care of yourself is a basic; you become your own biggest priority again, which is the way it should be. Always love and respect yourself, and other people will heed your excellent example.

Powerful people have interests, so cultivate some cool ones to add to that lame extracurricular resume of working at Carvel and babysitting the brats next door. Take up skydiving, feng shui, Hungarian cooking, Expressionist film, oil painting. Not only will you make new friends and become more knowledgeable (remember, knowledge is power!), you may find a new love. There's power in hobbies — when you apply for that entry level position at Nike, the interviewer may have to start you in management because she, too, loves scuba diving in Antigua!

Sometimes being powerful requires acting. If you need to brush up on acting, join an acting or drama club, read a book on it or talk into a dead cell phone and see how long you can hold up your end of the conversation (I hope you don't really try that). Let's face it; you need to be a good faker to become powerful. You should be able to talk about anything, even things you know nothing about. The art of making stuff up is a rite of passage at UMass. Everyone here just makes stuff up after a while.

Being powerful in our society is really about having high standards for yourself and the way people treat you. Last but not least, always give the impression that you're in high demand; if you use instant messenger, be sure never to sign on.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

PART OF THE PROBLEM OR THE SOLUTION?

In response to Russ Juskalian's article published on Tuesday, I would like to say that my parents don't pay for my rent or my cable. They probably would if I asked them to, but I feel they have given me something far more important than rent or a TV. My parents gave me a house out in the country where I could play and grow strong. More so than that, my parents taught me about life. They taught me what a hard day's work means; they taught me that there will always be people who are lesser and greater than I am, to try my best, to have cautious respect for authority, and to treat everyone as if they are better than me, even if they aren't. They taught me some other things as well. I'll get to those later.

Before you write your friend off as corporate scum in training, as some of my friends have done to me, ask yourself, or better yet, ask him why he wants to be a lawyer. Maybe he wants to represent people wronged by corporations in class action lawsuits; maybe he wants to defend people unjustly accused by the police. Who knows?

My parents taught me to see. I could stand up in class, or be looking out from the library, or be in the space station. Either way, I would look around and see that the classroom or campus or world is filled with people with very similar needs and wants. My parents taught me what those are, too. What I want, and what Eldrige Cleaver wanted, and what the zionists and Palestinians want, and what the feminists and the gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgender community want, and what everyone wants is to be taken seriously and to be accepted. Sometimes you have to make sacrifices in life; sometimes the sacrifices are your own valiant ideas and self-righteous morals. So, Russ Juskalian, what I ask you, and what Cleaver asks and what the 6.35 billion people behind me ask: "Are you part of the solution, or part of the problem?" (Eldrige Cleaver, 1968)

THE DANGERS OF DEPO PROVERA

The arrival of Glora Feldt and Ellie Smeal to the five college campuses recent weeks for organizing for the April "March for Freedom of Choice" in Washington marked a riveting time for activists, feminists and other students excited. This visit and the April rally center on reproductive rights and left me considering some of the often unrecognized aspects of reproductive choice that activists won't be marching for in April. The most prominent is one currently being violated at the University of Massachusetts and at other colleges and universities throughout the United States: the right to attain access and information about safe contraception.

In general, the UMass community is extremely upfront and open about promoting safe sex, information on sexually transmitted diseases and pregnancy counseling through innovative and engaging programs such as the Not Ready for Bedtime Players and Peer Health Educators. These programs instruct and inform, by educating students on many options, which in turn lead them to make informed decisions of their own.

Yet, this is the opposite of what is happening on the very pages of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian. Any student turning to The Collegian for information about birth control would gather from its excessive advertisements that the injection of the hormonal contraceptive Depo Provera is the best suited, if not the only option available. In light of recent studies confirming the danger of targeting Depo Provera toward women in their early reproductive years, The Collegian's unmitigated promotion of the drug appears quite ironic.

The two most dramatic reasons college students should avoid Depo are 1) Bone density loss which can be extremely damaging to women who by the age 20 often have not finished the critical completion of skeletal maturation and 2) the risk of damaging later reproductive potential. The verdict is still inconclusive on possible links between sterilization, osteoporosis and Depo Provera, as well as links with increased STD susceptibility and cancer. Additional "minor" side affects of this specific contraceptive, often ignored or disregarded by medical professionals, include hair loss, depression, weight gain and disruption of menses.

While Depo Provera is by no means the wrong contraceptive for everyone, I would argue even more forcefully that it is by no means the right choice for every woman when safer options such as the condom and the birth control pill are just as easily accessible. The pill, which is also a hormonal contraceptive, maintains many of the same risks as Depo, yet unlike the injection, it gives the user the option of simply stopping the method upon the development of a problem as opposed to receiving a three month provider controlled drug unable to be removed from the body.

I encourage The Collegian to recognize the restrictions they are placing on the women of our campus community by failing to advertise safe birth control options in conjunction with Depo Provera. I urge everyone who plans on marching in April to keep in mind that safe contraception is just as much a reproductive right as abortion access and to look critically at the recklessly distributed misinformation of The Collegian's pharmaceutical sponsors.

HOWARD DEAN ON UNITING AMERICANS

In a Nov. 18 editorial, it is argued that "the Confederate flag does not represent the oppression of one race by another." I guess it depends on who you talk to, but for a lot of people, the Confederate flag represents a rebellion against the founding principles of the United States. Specifically, it is the symbol of a supposed "nation" that broke away from the United States in order to continue the practice of keeping people as slaves based on their skin color. Maybe The Massachusetts Collegian Editorial Board has a more stringent definition of racial oppression, but slavery certainly fits my definition.

All that aside, the editorial misses the point of Howard Dean's remarks. As Dean has explained, his comment was a clumsy way of pointing to a fundamental problem in this country. For nearly 50 years, the Republican party has used race as a wedge issue to enact policies that favor the very rich at the expense of the poor and middle class. Their tactic is to stir up fear in working-class whites over divisive issues like gun ownership and affirmative action, leading them to ignore the real economic disparity in this country.

This country can only move forward when people of all races see their problems as common ones, with common solutions. Though the words he chose were not the best, Howard Dean believes that poor whites and poor blacks face the same challenges, and can triumph only when they unite in the voting booth.

TLC's

By JOHNNY DONALDSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

"This Old House" was never like this.

When "Trading Spaces," a small, unassuming home makeover show originally aired, the network it was on, TLC, was one in search of an identity. A kid sister of the more successful and identifiable Discovery Channel, TLC — an acronym for the The Learning Channel — was simply thought of as yet another infotainment network, the kind of parent-approved, but often kid-repellent educational channel that recycles endless documentaries about Egyptian mummies and dinosaurs.

"Trading Spaces" was merely an idea to update the staid tradition of the home improvement show — a curious pop cultural phenomenon that became so entrenched in the public, thanks to the affable handyman Bob Villa, that it even led to a sitcom ("Home Improvement") which took off from the subject.

The idea was to take the ingredients of the archetype — watching a room in a house remodeled and redecorated — and give a hip, modern spin. Gone would be the rustic, pastoral feel of the show; Villa's homespun jack-of-all-trades persona and the leisurely, informative pace of "This Old House" was replaced by a perky, pretty host (Paige Davis) and a slew of professional interior decorators with distinctive personalities.

Trading

There's Doug Wilson, who's more or less locked into the show's "villain" position as a snarky decorator who favors unconventional designs, dark colors and going against the homeowner's preconceived desires in order to open their aesthetic eyes. Wilson's opposite is the lovable, huggable teddy bear Frank Bielec, a joyful older gentleman who favors country-tinged designs and comes off like the grandfather everyone wishes they had. Generation's X and Y are represented by the young, fashionable Genevieve Gorder. Kia Steave-Dickerson loves to decorate in themes; Rick Rille is a veteran of Hollywood set design who favors bold gestures, much like Wilson.

The premise of "Trading Spaces" has two sets of neighbors switching houses for two days, each armed with their own designer and a $1,000 budget, which the designer must not go over unless they wish to pay out of their own pocket, to remodel one room in the other's house. The catch? Neither team can see their home until both teams are finished. With 11 different

Leslie: the beauty, brains and brawn

By MOLLY EGGLESTON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Leslie Segrete is a handywoman extraordinaire.

As carpenter and seamstress on TLC's Emmy-nominated show "While You Were Out," she has dazzled and inspired audiences across the country with her creative designs and desirable on-air presence to go out and become at-home handy people themselves.

While You Were Out

"I'd like to think that the show has had an influence on people and is encouraging them to create more," Segrete said. "I was always creating things, and people thought I was such a dork, but now I'm like, 'look at all the things I can do'."

Segrete and the rest of the "While You Were Out" cast have more than influenced home-owning adults; college students living in cubical dorms are catching onto the techniques displayed on the show.

"I think [the popularity of the show amongst college students] mainly is because we're on a tight budget," Segrete said. "So are college students."

Leslie is well aware of the importance of designing the coolest dorm room on the floor.

"In my dorm room in college, I had one of those tapestries you get at head shops, and I got binder clips, then clipped one end of the tapestry to the top of my blinds," Segrete explained. "When I hung it down, I hooked it into the lowest blind, so when you pull up the blind, it sort of creates a roman shade. It pulls up so you get this nice billowing of the tapestry. And when it's closed, instead of seeing those gross manila brown blinds, you see the cool tapestry."

According to Segrete, many factors have influenced her distinct modern style. Working with different designers has had effects on her unique approach to interior design.

"Jon Bruce lets me have pretty much free range with my designs," Segrete said. "Chayse Dakota, on the other hand, is much more structured. She wants things done a specific way.

"I just like the challenge of creating something new," Segrete added. "I really like taking something two dimensional and making it into something three dimensional."

Every designer has his/her own favorite element to look to for inspiration in designing a room, for Segrete, she admits, "its all about the texture."

"I'm really into how a room feels," she said. Segrete's design prowess has been a work in progress since she was a young girl growing up in New York.

"I grew up in a creative home," Segrete said of her childhood. "My mom was always encouraging me to make crafts."

The Segrete household was all about designing. Leslie's father was an interior designer for retail spaces, and her mother began teaching her to sew at the age of four. When all the other kids on her street were running lemonade stands, Leslie was selling crafts she had made from her sidewalk.

Her interest in creating things followed her to college. By fulfilling general education requirements with advanced placement classes in high school, Segrete allowed herself the time to take more interesting classes geared toward her goal to be a designer.

"I was able to take a lot of electives like pottery and metal working," Segrete said.

As a theater major at Hofstra University, Segrete was able to express her creativity in many ways. Not only was she starring on the stage, but also Segrete was planning, designing and completing complicated scenery for the productions.

Segrete didn't miss any opportunities to put her education to use. With a minor in anthropology, she uses her knowledge in that area to further visualize her scenery.

"The interesting thing that combines the two is that there are so many different cultures and different people that play in to the role and inspire all their different elements into design, and at least having anthropology and archeology as a basis on some of these things, I can better understand what the thought process is of people," Leslie said. "Especially when designing a play, it helps you understand what the circumstances are of characters and why they are that and what society has done to make those people the way they are and what would be the visual impacts of those things." As an artist, her entire life, Segrete faced a new challenge when starting on "While You Were Out." An experienced set designer for both plays and television, she had never been on camera before. Creating beautiful work is one thing, creating beautiful work with millions of people watching you is entirely different. The laid back carpenter has taken the challenge in stride.

"It's really not that uncomfortable being on television," she said. "I am doing what I love to do; people are just watching me."

A 'Family' trip to Northampton

Robert Randolph at Pearl Street tonight

Robert Randolph and his Family Band bring their soul/blues jams to Pearl Street's Ballroom tonight.

By Brad Farberman
Collegian Staff

When pedal steel phenom Robert Randolph and his Family Band bring their unique bag of gospel-inflected funk to Pearl Street tonight, you won't find a disbeliever in the house. These four young musicians have toured the globe, shared the stage with some of today's biggest acts, even seen their video play on MTV. And tonight, they're here to take you to church.

When the group released their debut album late last year, they had no idea what they were getting themselves into. "Live at The Wetlands" led them to commercial success, critical acclaim and to an opening slot on tour with the Dave Matthews Band. And now with "Unclassified," released in August, the band has put out an airtight, studio vision of what the Family Band has become.

Interesting too, however, is how they got to this place. Irvington, N.J. native Randolph began playing the pedal steel in church when he was only 16. And while you might catch the band running through spirited covers of Sly Stone's "Thank You (Falettinme Be Mice Elf Agin)," Jimi Hendrix's "Purple Haze," or Stevie Wonder's "I Just Called To Say I Love You," Randolph's formative years were spent ensconced in gospel music and the blues.

"I would say Stevie Ray Vaughn is probably one of my main influences," Randolph said. "Also guys I grew up watching in church." Those musicians include Calvin Cooke and Ted Beard, namesake for the group's "Ted's Jam," a live staple (for readers unsure as to what the pedal steel sounds like, listen to Crosby, Stills, Nash and Young's "Teach your Children" or Eric Clapton's "Tears In Heaven"; both feature the pedal steel quite prominently).

And just as varied as his influences are the musicians he likes to collaborate with, outside of the Family Band.

"People like Luther [Dickinson of The North Mississippi Allstars] and Kraz [Eric Krasno, guitarist for Soulive]," Randolph said. "Definitely playing with the Dave Matthews Band, they're a tight band. Carter Beauford on the drums, unbelievable!"

Randolph's praise for his fellow musicians doesn't end there.

"He's all over the place, he just loves to play music," said Randolph of frequent collaborator Krasno. "He is a good guy, he fits right in musically."

Other past collaborations include those with the Allman Brothers Band, Derek Trucks, and Warren Haynes.

But, as always, Randolph's focus is on the band. Upon the departure of longtime organist John Ginty in October, multi-instrumentalist Jason Crosby was called upon to join Randolph, drummer Marcus Randolph, and bassist Danyel Morgan in their musical quest. Crosby, a former keys-man for Susan Tedeschi and Oteil Burbridge's solo band, seems to be a great fit for the group.

"What Jason Crosby has that's probably a little bit different [from John Ginty] is he's a more diverse musician," Randolph said. "He can be a great arranger of music. He can play fiddle, he can play trumpet, he can play keyboards and organ. Also, he sings backgrounds, which adds a lot. He's like Danyel; they have perfect pitch. The two of them together adds so much."

However, it seems to be the work of all four bandmates that has catapulted them to stardom. Heading to Germany next week and Japan next month, the Family Band has extended their tour of the country to include spots both big and small all over the world. From Madison Square Garden (where they opened for the Dave Matthews Band) to Tennessee's Bonnaroo Music Festival (attended by 80,000 fans this past summer) and all points in between, however, it remains that the small, intimate venues are where Randolph and his Family Band thrive.

"Places like Pearl Street is a great gig, it's a fun place," said Randolph. "I remember when we played with Susan Tedeschi there and people got packed in. I can't wait, it's a great room."

Touring in support of their newest release, "Unclassified," Robert Randolph and the Family Band will take the stage at that fun place tonight, following opening act Los Lonely Boys. Tickets are $17.50 in advance, $20.00 up front. The show begins at 8:30 p.m.

Bouldering competition Saturday

The Dover Indoor Climbing Gym and Newenglandbould-ering.com have set the route for all future New England boulder-ing competitions by putting together the Newenglandbould-ering.com Championships, set to take place on Saturday, Nov. 22, in Dover, N.H.

The event will include a minimum of a $3,000 purse for the winner of the elite division and thousands of dollars worth of giveaways will be awarded to the competitors in the non-elite division.

For entertainment, there will be a live DJ, a book signing by local guidebook author Ivan Greene, the premier showing of Rob Frost's film, "Autoroute" and a free keg beer for those of age.

The all-day event begins at noon and ends at midnight. The format of the competition will be similar to EarthTreks' competition in Timonium, Md., and the Cave Rave Series in Northampton, Mass.

The amateur's portion of the competition will be held from noon to 4 p.m. on some new climbing walls that have over 150 obstacles. Skill levels will range from V0 to V10, so all climbers are welcome.

Throughout the day, there will be gear giveaways and entertainment for the spectators. After the premier movie, the kegs will be tapped and the Elite Finals will be held for both men and women. An after party will continue well into the next day. Top competitors include Joel Brady, Nate Gold, KK Gregory and Nikki Whelan.

The Newenglandbould-ering.com Championships has been put together by two of New England's most established climbers — Pete Ward and Tim Kemple. Ward is a certified route-setter by USCCA, ABS and PCA standards and was trained by climbing legend, Tony Yarino. He has run the Cave Rave in Noho before. Kemple has been the head route-setter at over 10 competitions in the last two years and is also a prolific photographer.

Tickets for the event are $25 and can be purchased at the door. Climbers competing in the amateur division are allowed free admittance.

TLC finds its niche in home improvement

designers on staff, fans can rest assured to see an eclectic series of remodeled projects — some of which are loved by the homeowners and some of which are absolutely abhorred by them.

The unexpected success of the show ("Trading Spaces" has become a top cable hit and is now TLC's anchor series) led to the usual horde of copies and imitators, some of which are part of the "Trading Spaces" family itself. In fact, there is a show called "Trading Spaces Family," in which entire families get in on the act, under the supervision of host Joe Farrell. (Discovery Kids airs "Trading Spaces: Boys vs. Girls," a variation on the show aimed for small fry.) But for every "Trading Spaces" or its sister program, "While You Were Out," there are 15 "Designer's Challenges" — cheap, forgettable retreads of the same formula.

"While You Were Out" takes a similar route to "Trading Spaces," with a young, good-looking host (Evan Farmer, a former actor on the MTV series "2gether"), a collection of regular designers and a cast of quirky, handsome/attractive carpenters ("Trading Spaces" alternates between goofy heartthrob Ty Pennington, Carter Oosterhouse and Amy Wynn Pastor; "Out" features Andrew Dan Jumbo and Leslie Segrete). But this time, it's one person — a husband, a wife, a child, whatever — spending two days and $1,500 to remodel a room as a gift for someone they love. While the "victim" is wiling away the period in luxury, oblivious to what's happening at home, their loved one is busy redecorating say a bedroom, or living room, for them out of love.

These shows offer no hard info on redecoration; these aren't exactly shows of knowledge. They often gloss over the act of redecoration in order to wring as much drama as they can in an hour. Shows often feature highlights of the arduous work that goes into the act of recreation, pouncing on the moments of drama and comedy that play best on TV — homeowners have issues with a design, weather interferes, something unexpected happens.

But that's the appeal of these shows. These are meant to entertain and tickle the hearts of the viewers, not beat them over the head with stats and facts. Yes, this is the "Learning Channel" but there's enough knowledge here to impart something to the viewer, without making them feel forcefed. And, all in all, these are heartwarming shows that celebrate positive values, a nice change of pace in an era that almost totally adores greed, violence and unabashed sexuality. These G-rated shows instead focus on working hard, creation, art, teamwork, love and giving. There's nothing offensive about these shows — well, unless you're Bob Villa and your good-natured squareness as been brushed to the side — and that may be why audiences are willing to sit and watch as others get their homes remodeled.

"Trading Spaces" airs Saturday nights; "While You Were Out" airs Friday nights. Check your local listings.

Punk bands ready for 'day' in Worcester

By Brittany Loring
Collegian Staff

Taking Back Sunday and Saves the Day will be playing this Thursday night at the Palladium in Worcester. The tour, which began this summer, has led the two bands to the Bay state this week. They will also play a sold out show in Boston, Friday night at the Avalon. Taking Back Sunday's high-powered, punk sound mixed with the more mellowed out emo and newer rock-inspired music of Saves the Day are sure to be an interesting combination.

Saves The Day & Taking Back Sunday
The Palladium
Worcester
$18

Created in New York City in 1999, Taking Back Sunday was started by two of its current members, vocalist Adam Lazarra and guitarist Ed Reyes. The band was completed with the addition of Mark O'Connell on the drums and two others, Shaun Cooper and John Nolan. Only this past year, guitarist and vocalist Fred Mascherino and bass player Matthew Rubano replaced Cooper and Nolan forming the Taking Back Sunday that fans will get to see on the current tour. Their record entitled "Tell All of Your Friends" consists of a fantastic blend of peppy punk rock. Most enjoyable about their record, which was released Mar. 26, 2002 by Victory Records, is that the songs — such as the catchy "You're So Last Summer" — are full of the energy that those attending the concerts yearn for.

Co-headlining with Taking Back Sunday is Saves the Day, who debuted with their first LP, "Can't Slow Down," in 1998. The band has gone through many changes since its start. Band members have come and gone leaving lead singer Chris Conley as the only original member.

Besides Chris, the band consists of bassist Eban D'Amico, guitarist David Soloway and drummer Pete Parada, who replaced drummer Bryan Newman after he left the band along with the second guitarist Ted Alexander.

The first two records "Can't Slow Down" and "I'm Sorry I'm Leaving" — both released in 1998 — gave Saves the Day the reputation of a typical punk rock band. 1999's "Through Being Cool" and 2001's "Stay What You Are" gave Saves the Day a new title. The pop punk emo band, coined for the softer punk sound and emotional lyrics.

However, this year has proven that Saves the Day plans to continue to evolve. The newest CD, "In Reverie," takes Saves the Day's previous punk and emo sound and adds a more mature, rock-inspired twist.

Saves the Day lead singer Chris Conley hopes that the band's new sound will be adopted by fans as an evolution of their music. Unfortunately, as many bands have experienced in the past, convincing fans that a change in musical style is a good thing is not always that easy. However, Conley and the other band members have forged full speed ahead changing their musical style to a well-tuned and mature sound, different from the punk rock that it used to be.

Attempting to gain a more solid fan base, Taking Back Sunday and Saves the Day will continue to tour in the United States through the end of the month. Hopefully, Saves the Day's newer pop punk will continue to be accepted by current fans and gain the popularity the band members' desire. As far as Taking Back Sunday is concerned, they will continue to thrill fans with punk rock melodies and songs of relationships gone wrong. If nothing else, the concert Thursday night is sure to be an entertaining mix of both an energized and laid back atmosphere.

with Williams back there."

Defensively, the Rams are led by free safety Virgil Gray. The freshman has posted a team-high 80 tackles, including 50 solo, as well as intercepting a pair of passes and recording a sack.

Also chipping in is classmate and middle linebacker Steve Marrella, who is second on the team in tackles with 69 and tied for second in solo stops with 39.

"They have gotten a lot better on defense," Whipple said. "They're coming off of a shutout of Hofstra, and they were right there with Cincinnati."

On the injury front for UMass, cornerback Steve Costello remains questionable with an abdominal strain, although Whipple doubts he will see any action.

Senior defensive lineman Doran Davis, however, should see the field in what will be his final regular season home game at UMass.

On the offensive side of the ball, both Demers and Baylark are nearing 100 percent, as is Peebler, who practiced on consecutive days without incident for the first time since injuring his hamstring.

Notes: Saturday's contest will be Senior Day, as it marks the final regular season home game for 19 seniors on the Massachusetts roster. They are as follows: Valdamar Brower, tri-captain Jeremy Cain, Ryan Chevers, Colin Christopher, Carmen Collins, Doran Davis, Ian Dyche, Malik Hall, Mike Haynes, Jimmie Howard, Mark Kimener, tri-captain Jeff Krohn, Tim McDermond, Ryan McHugh, tri-captain Anton McKenzie, Glen Opie, Johnson Owumi, Charlie Shove and Mike Ziccardi.

A title fight

UMass looks to secure A-10 championship against Rhode Island

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

It has been a long season for the Massachusetts football team — one filled with emotional ups and downs.

There was the opening 51-7 pasting of Central Connecticut State, the 65-yard touchdown strike from Jeff Krohn to Jason Peebler that shocked Kansas State and Shannon James' heroic fumble recovery for the winning touchdown at Villanova that many still can't seem to fathom.

In addition, there was also the emergence of a pair of unknown running backs in Steve Baylark and Rich Demers, revenge served on both Hofstra and Northeastern and the longest touchdown pass in school history — twice.

Then there was the shocking suspension of A-10 Rookie of the Year R. J. Cobbs for "academic discipline," a knee injury that has kept Raunny Rosario from contributing for much of the year and, most recently, an utterly heartbreaking loss to No. 3 Delaware in what is widely considered the best football game a Minuteman team have ever been a part of.

Now, with all of that behind them, the No. 7 Minutemen (9-2 7-1 A-10) are set to conclude their memorable season Saturday at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium against rival Rhode Island (4-7 (3-5 A-10), with nothing short of an Atlantic 10 title and the chance to set a school record for wins in a season on the line.

If the Minutemen win and Delaware loses to Villanova, the Minutemen will claim the A-10 title outright and receive the conference's automatic bid to the Division I-AA playoffs. If UMass and Delaware both win or both lose, the teams will share the title — with the Blue Hens receiving the automatic bid.

"We have a chance to win a championship," UMass coach Mark Whipple said. "We have to find a way to win the football game. It's Rhode Island and it's the last game, and it's for everything.

Whipple also realizes that the Maroon and White will certainly need to have some bounce back in their step, as the Rams boast arguably the most team speed in the A-10, led by back/return man Wendall Williams.

"They've got guys that can just fly," Whipple said. "I think Wendall Williams is the fastest guy in the league — they're scary.

"If you make one assignment mistake on defense, they can take it all the way."

On the season Williams, who also returns kickoffs and punts in addition to carrying the football, leads the Rams in all-purpose yards with 1,767 — an average of 160.6 a game. He is not alone in putting up impressive offensive numbers for Rhody, especially on the ground.

Junior Jason Ham is the team's leading rusher, becoming just the eighth player in school history to reach the 1,000-yard plateau when his 156 yards last week in a shutout win over Hofstra game him 1,064 on the season.

The numbers do not stop there, however, for the run-based Rams. Quarterback Jayson Davis, who has passed for a mere 540 yards on the season, is second on the team in rushing with 924 yards, while Luther Green has posted 715 yards followed by Williams' 611 yards.

"They're tremendous on offense," Whipple said. "They've played some good teams so they're executing at a high level, plus their quarterback makes a huge difference."

Making the task of stopping the Rams' vaunted ground game that much more difficult is the Flexbone style of offense that coach Tim Stowers employs; one that predominantly features a double-wing formation with a lone back in the backfield that includes consistent motion both toward and away from the ball; an offense that has produced the number one rushing attack in the A-10, averaging 332.7 yards per game With 3,660 total rushing yards on the season, URI is also just 283 rushing yards short of a new A-10 record.

"It's a different offense," Whipple said. "They do a lot of things like Richmond does, but we really haven't seen anything like it, so we need to focus on."

When the Rams do go to the air, which they've done only 127 times all season between Davis and backup Adam Johnson, who has seen spot duty in all 10 games, Williams is the top target. He has caught a team-high 19 balls, four of which for touchdowns. He also joins Curtis Horne as the only Rams to catch touchdown passes on the season.

Also of concern for Whipple is Rhody's special teams, which is headed by Williams and all-conference placekicker/punter Shane Laisle and has been solid all season long.

"Special teams always plays a big role," Whipple said. "Laisle has been a four year starter and has been in a lot of pressure situations.

"Our special teams were a big problem last week ... our coverage teams were the worst they've been all year so we've worked harder to address those things, especially

GERALD H. LINGO/COLLEGIAN

Wide receiver Jimmie Howard is one of 19 seniors who will play their final regular season home game in a UMass uniform when Rhode Island visits McGuirk Alumni Stadium Saturday. The Minutemen can wrap up a share of the A-10 title with a win.

Forecasting the All-Americans

Todd Foster

Guard — Raymond Felton, North Carolina

New Tar Heels head coach Roy Williams has a lot to be excited about in this kid. As a diaper dandy last season, Felton showed his incredible playmaking ability, remaining under control and composed with the ball in his hands. His unlimited potential and athleticism gives him the chance to be the next great Carolina point guard, joining the ranks of Phil Ford and Ed Cota. The 400 points and 200 assists are the undeniable proof to back up the bold statement, since no other Tar Heel freshman has ever accomplished that feat.

Felton is a threat to average a double-double every game this season with super sophomores Rashard McCants and Sean May as his first two options.

In his final six games of the regular season, Felton averaged nearly 10 assists a game and will mostly likely expand upon those numbers in Williams' fast break offense.

Guard — Rickey Paulding, Missouri

The perfect nickname for Paulding would have to be "The Show." Why, you ask? Watch what happens when the Wooden Award Candidate touches the ball from anywhere on the court. If the defender plays him tight, he'll blow by him with the most deadly first step in the Big 12 and put down a Sportscenter-worthy slam. Don't leave him open either, as his 39-percent from behind the arc is nothing to challenge.

A scoring average of 17.4 points per game is impressive, but Paulding steps up his game in March. He is the all-time leader in NCAA Tournament points with 145 and averaged 27.5 ppg during his two March Madness games including a dazzling 36-point performance versus Marquette — the man knows how to put on a show.

Forward — Hakim Warrick, Syracuse

Freshman sensation and current Denver Nugget, Carmelo Anthony got his title and left Syracuse for the NBA limelight. But while 'Melo' received most of the hype, he could not have won the title without the presence of Warrick. Warrick, the Big East's Most Improved Player, is one of the most athletic and explosive leapers in the nation with 80 dunks last season. Just ask Texas guard Rickey Ivey, the recipient of the worst facial in the history of basketball.

So while 'Melo' battles the big names in the Western Conference, the team is now in Warrick's hands. Warrick showed his ability to step-up by more than doubling his freshman scoring (6.1 to 14.1 ppg) and improving his rebounding average by 3.7 boards (4.8 to 8.5). Warrick is a clutch performer, blocking Kansas' Michael Lee's last second trey to secure the title. Now Warrick will be ready to join the elite.

Forward — Ike Diogu, Arizona State

If you have no idea who this monstrous force is, you will by the end of this season. The Pac-10 Freshman of the Year had an great freshman season after not being heavily recruited by the big name programs, as Ike was the only player in the Pac-10 to place in the top five in scoring (19.0 ppg) and rebounding (7.8 rpg). The low-post scoring machine scored in double digits in every game, and posted the third highest freshman scoring average Pac-10 history.

His incredible power and intense competitiveness gives him the ability for a 20-point and 10-rebound performance every night.

Center — Emeka Okafor, UConn

Emeka Okafor is the 21st century version of Bill Russell. Okafor is not close to the level of the Dean of Defense, but his potential to get there is boundless. The Big East Defensive Player of the Year posted impressive 2003 averages of 15.9 ppg, 11.2 rpg and 4.73 blocks per game. His career average four swats (4.41 bpg) is an all-time best in Big East History, with Georgetown legend Patrick Ewing in a distant second (3.98).

Okafor is the most intelligent and dedicated player UConn coach Jim Calhoun could ask for. He has started all 67 games in his career, improving game by game. Look for Okafor to win the Wooden Award with averages of 18 ppg, 13 rpg, and 5 bpg before being No. 1 pick overall in 2004 NBA draft.

Swimming to host St. Johns

By Matt Barstow
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts swimming and diving teams will face St. John's for the last time Saturday, as they host a Red Storm squad whose program will be eliminated at the end of this season.

The Minutemen (2-0) will look to remain unbeaten as they face the Red Storm, who finished last season fifth in the Big East.

"John Scudin [St John's men's coach] is an old friend, and it's unfortunate that this is the last times our teams will meet," men's coach Russ Yarworth said. "They have a ton of talent and a full complement of scholarships, so we'll have to swim our best to stick with them."

The Red Storm have been victorious the last three meetings.

UMass junior Dylan Smith will be looked upon to lead the Minutemen to their third consecutive victory. Smith received Atlantic 10 Swimmer of the Week accolades Nov. 13, following an impressive performance against Boston University Nov. 4.

A mid-distance swimmer, Smith won four events for the Maroon and White, including victories in the 200-yard freestyle (1:46.20) and 200-yard backstroke (1:59.60). Smith went on to take top honors in the 100-yard butterfly (52.33), and anchor the winning 200-yard medley relay team.

Smith's team-high six victories have helped keep UMass on target to win its fourth consecutive A-10 title.

"Dylan knows what he has to do; this is a young team that needs everyone to raise their game," Yarworth said. "He's an extremely versatile swimmer who won a race doing the fly, back and free. He's in great shape, so he can swim just about any stroke we need."

Upon receiving conference honors, Smith stepped into the limelight previously held by freshman teammate Greg Chartier, who was named last week's A-10 Co-Rookie of the Week.

Chartier began the season by winning the 400-yard individual medley with a time of 4:13.59 in the Husky Invitational, Oct. 18. He then went on to a 200-yard freestyle victory, Oct. 25 at New Hampshire, with a time of 1:45.44. In the latest meet against BU, Chartier placed first in three events: the 200-yard IM (1:57.16), 500-yard free (4:46.95), and 1000-yard free (9:52.66).

On the women's side, Massachusetts (1-1) will try for its second consecutive win against a Red Storm team that finished eleventh in the Big East last season.

Sophomore Aimee Bourassa has emerged as the leading Minutewomen scorer, recording four victories in two meets.

Bourassa finished first in the 500-yard free and 200-yard IM at New Hampshire, with times of 5:15.13 and 2:11.64, respectively. Against BU, Bourassa swam to first-place finishes in the 500 and 1000-yard freestyle, with times of 5:16.81 and 10:50.07, respectively.

"Aimee has been a major factor in our success; she's a versatile swimmer that works hard at every stroke," women's coach Bob Newcomb said. "We have a young team, and so far everyone is doing their part against BU. We started the meet by winning a relay race [in which] all three captains swam a leg."

Senior Tri-captains Diana Alberti, Christen Dexter and Lauren Rowel have teamed up with freshman Nicole LeBarge to lead an undefeated 200-yard medley relay team.

Newcomb aims to avoid any distractions associated with Saturday's race, but will not deny a personal significance.

"We've had some great meets with [St. Johns] over the years, they've been a solid team and a lot of the races have come down to the last relay," Newcomb said. "I'm sorry that we will be loosing the competition."

The meet will start Saturday at 1 p.m. in Boyden Gymnasium..

Chairman rebukes claim of resignation

By Morris Singer
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association Ways and Means Committee Chairman yesterday reacted to speculation that he was resigning from his position as chairmen of the committee, saying he has "absolutely no intention of resigning whatsoever."

"I love Ways and Means," Chairman Patrick Higgins said. "I love working with the people on the committee on the SGA."

According to Higgins, speculation was prevalent yesterday among registered student organizations and agency directors about a potential resignation from the chair. Higgins has been responding to questions about his position since The Massachusetts Collegian yesterday incorrectly reported his resignation in a headline.

"I've been contacted by everyone from Campus Activities to various agencies directors," he said.

Higgins, in continuing his work as the chairman, said he would do his best to work with organizations on campus to secure the budgets they need.

"I'm very enthusiastic," Higgins said "I know we're going to have a very successful year."

"I would say not to worry, that I am still the chair, and the committee is very excited about renewing ... budgets," he said. "There's absolutely no problems we can foresee for the upcoming year and we are excited about the next semester."

To help ease the confusion, Higgins spoke of his plans for the committee, saying they will send memoranda to agency directors and R.S.O.'s about the proper procedures for working with the SGA to renew budgets.

"The committee is going to do their very best to keep communication at a high," he said.

According to Higgins, the committee is also going to try harder to cater to the needs of the R.S.O.'s this year.

"We're going to see if we can do a better job," he said. "I think we need to listen more."

Senator Anthony Pascoe announced his resignation Tuesday as chair of the Rules and Ethics subcommittee of the SGA. It was his resignation that was the source of the confusion.

"Anthony felt like he couldn't give every ounce of himself to the position," Higgins said. "He respects the position enough ... that he felt he needed to back away."

"He felt like the position of chair was going to be too much and he would be doing a diservice to the University."

State representative backs bill to fund contracts

Delivers criticism of former governor

AMELIA P. LINCOLN/COLLEGIAN

State Representative Ellen Story speaks yesterday about the new legislation to fund faculty contracts. Workers say they want retroactive raises and back pay.

By Casey Novak
Collegian Correspondent

A bill that will fund the contracts of the University of Massachusetts faculty will be sent to Governor Mitt Romney, State Representative Ellen Story told a crowd of about 50 yesterday.

"The bill will now go to the governor, and even if the governor vetoes it, there are enough people in the House to override the veto," Story said. "If [Romney] does veto [the bill], it will be a huge surprise."

In fall 2001, contracts promising pay raises to higher education union workers, as well as competitive salaries for faculty members, were negotiated for 13,000 higher education employees. The contracts were passed as part of the 2002 budget in both the Massachusetts House of Representatives and the State Senate.

When it came time for acting Governor Jane Swift to decide on funding the contracts, she vetoed them in July of 2002. The contracts have not been implemented since.

Representative Story said Swift "became fairly arrogant and difficult, isolating herself from people that could have helped her," after having twins while in office.

On Jan. 1, the base pay of all employees will reflect the total cost of living increase that should have been given over the three years of the contract, Senator Stanley Rosenberg said. Half of the increase will be delivered in the paychecks, and the second half will appear in paychecks sometime after July 1, he said.

"It's a very unusual arrangement," Rosenberg said, "but given the pay raises are three years late, there's a lot of catching up to do. In the middle of the fiscal crisis, it is extraordinary difficult to catch up on 3 years worth of raises."

The funding announcement overshadowed Story's speech, cosponsored by the UMass women's studies department and the Everywoman's Center. The speech focused on Story's experience as a progressive woman in politics, and how important it is for everyone, especially women, to get involved.

"Women seem to think when they run for office they should know something," Story said. "It is very rare for a women in her 20s or 30s to run for office."

When the floor was opened to questions, UMass student Aaron Maloy showed his appreciation to Story for her honesty in supporting the Supreme Judicial Court decision on same-sex marriages.

Story said when the SJC ruled to legalize same-sex marriages, she immediately received e-mails from people around the country, describing how shocked and horrified they were about the decision. But Story said she supports the law completely and that "most representatives don't pay any attention to people not from their district."

In Story's speech she also announced her commitment to supporting former Vermont governor Howard Dean's presidential campaign, which also supports civil marriages. Story explained that she wanted "anybody who can beat [President George W.] Bush, anybody," saying that Bush will "dismantle all of the things we care about."

Departments stand up to diabetes; raise awareness

National Diabetes Day recognized

By Nathan Chomsky-Higgins
Collegian Correspondent

Yesterday the nursing, nutrition, and exercise science departments came together to raise awareness for diabetes, a disease that is growing in frequency, especially among children and young adults.

"It used to be just an adult onset disease, but now we're seeing Type II diabetes in elementary-aged children" says Emily Rice, a Nutrition major.

"What we wanted to do is bring about awareness, specifically about Type II Diabetes, to the UMass campus," said Carrie Sharoff, a graduate student in the Nursing program.

The event consisted of various tables in the Campus Center concourse, set up by each department, each with different activities for passers-by to take part in.

The nutrition table had people take quizzes to test their food knowledge, such as how much of different types of food are in a portion and how much sugar is in drinks, such as coke and cranberry juice.

At the exercise science table students could test their physical fitness level with a step test and determine their risk level for contracting diabetes. There were also numerous pamphlets on different sports in hopes of making an active lifestyle more appealing to people.

Lauren Kelly, one of the students who tried the step test, said she thought the event was a good idea.

"It gets students aware of what they need to do to remain healthy," she said.

Jeff Krohn, quarterback for the Massachusetts football team, was present at the event, and signed autographs later in the day to promote physical activity, as well as Saturday's football game and Senior Day.

The Nursing table had information and statistics about the disease, and even some computers set up to allow people to determine their relative risks for acquiring diabetes.

Among the factors that may increase a person's chances of getting diabetes are weight, age, ethnicity, and family history. Despite these factors, the disease is avoidable.

"Small changes in lifestyle, [such as] increasing physical activity and decreas-

Legislature agrees to fund University contracts

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts State Legislature Wednesday passed a bill providing $34 million dollars in contract funding for 13,000 teachers, administrators and professionals on every public campus in the Commonwealth. Many of those workers at the University of Massachusetts have been working under a non-funded state contract for 873 days.

The Massachusetts House Wednesday passed the bill unanimously, and the Senate passed it in a 32-7 vote.

At a rally held in the Campus Center auditorium at noon yesterday, union members met to discuss new developments concerning their contracts.

"We've won the battle, but not the war," said Tom Coish of SCEU Local 888.

Speakers at the rally urged supporters to call Governor Mitt Romney and encourage him to sign the higher education pay bill. Romney could still veto the contract bill within ten days after receiving it.

"This is a victory," said Coish. "But everyone must continue to stay involved for the entire process."

According to the Massachusetts Teachers Association, passing the contract funding would help better the quality of education and teaching in the state's system of public higher education.

"We must not forget why we are here," said Donna Johnson of the University Staff Association. "It is because of the students. Without them, we would not be here. We are here for their rights too."

If the bill is passed, workers' salaries are supposed to include three years' of pay raises that were contractually negotiated. This rate will become the workers' new base pay. Each union has a different contract.

However, according to the UMass Labor Coalition, workers would not see this pay difference for a few months. If Romney vetoes the bill, the legislature must be convinced to override the veto. This could delay the process until early January. The state must then transfer the money to the University, which will then translate the money into the workers' paychecks.

"When the language is written in July ...we should have full funding in the contracts. There is no reason to believe we won't get it," said Johnson. "In the contract, [there is] a payroll for three years of raises. We will get those raises."

The retroactive salary money dates from July 1, 2001, when the contracts were first activated. It would include pay up until January. The supplemental budget concerning pay raises does not specify that retroactive funds will be allotted. However, workers argue that these monies should be paid to them.

"Our retroactive money is coming," said Jenny Spencer, President of MCP. "There should be no negotiation on what we've already bargained for."

For retirees and workers who have been laid off, there is no guarantee that they will be paid retroactive funds or receive larger pensions due to salary raises.

Next year's contract bargaining, which will begin in the spring, are also a concern. Romney may increase health care costs and decrease state pensions. He has already informed union leaders that he will veto all proposed pay increases for the next three years.

"This has been the biggest drop-off in state revenue in the commonwealth history. It has been a huge budget battle," said Spencer.

Union members are encouraged to write thank you notes to their legislatures for helping the Senate and House pass the funding contracts, as well as to recruit people to call Governor Romney and tell him to sign the higher education bill.

"Talk to the legislature. They work for us," said Johnson. "One thing I've learned: our vote does count. Let them know this and tell them that UMass funding is our priority."

Union members are planning to voice their opinions at the State Democratic convention which will be held in the Mullins Center on May 8.

Microsoft chief likens inovation to evolution

Pierre DeVries, Chief of Incubation for the Microsoft Corporation, spoke Wednesday afternoon in the Computer Science building at UMass, to a crowd of about 50 students and faculty

His speech, entitled "Of Pennies and Packets: Politics And Business In A World of Seamless Communications," focused on the world's increasing technology and how he and his colleagues at Microsoft work to make those technologies useable in everyday life.

DeVries began his speech with an analogy between hadrocodium, a small prehistoric mammal from the Jurassic period, and the growing technology in today's society. Like hadrocodium, which was overshadowed by the dominant reptiles of the era, DeVries said that there is a lot of development going on in technology today that isn't outwardly noticeable because of larger, more dominant projects. He also noted that the brain-power behind these smaller projects is enormous.

"One of the most interesting things that I've learned about being a mammal is that our ear bones are different from reptiles and that means you get more space for your brain."

DeVries began working with Microsoft to design and build "Microsoft Home," a technology demonstrator. He now manages incubation efforts for Advanced Strategies and Policy.

"What I try to do is to recognize and identify some interesting opportunities, very often things that are happening in Microsoft research, and then help keep them alive and form them into things that will become products," DeVries said.

DeVries is the sixth guest lecturer in The Sidney Topol Distinguished Lecturer Series being held at Umass this semester.

Professor awarded grant

By Kristin Erekson
Collegian Correspondent

A University of Massachusetts professor's research of how organizations handle vast amounts of information may ultimately help news organizations and intelligence agencies cope with information overload.

Anna Nagurney, a professor of finance and operations management, received two weeks ago a $198,904 grant from the National Science Foundation. The funds, supplied to NSF by the National Security Agency, will go toward the study of dynamic knowledge-intensive organizations such as major news organizations, high tech companies, and global financial institutions.

The grant will also help to maintain the Virtual Center for Supernetworks, developed at the Isenberg School of Management in November 2001 to study extensive networks, such as transportation, logistics, finance, and economics. The Center connects the results to everyday life and institutions. Nagurney is conducting the study with June Dong, a professor of management at the State University of New York at Oswego, and UMass students from the Virtual Center of Supernetworks.

"This is something quite special that we got," Nagurney said. "The NSF was established a half a century ago and in its charter it has that when it comes to issues of national security in the United States, they should fund these kinds of research because it is very, very important."

Nagurney said that it is vital to study systems where there are a lot of incoming messages and competition, such as national security or transportation networks, because sometimes, individual behavior will affect the entire set of connections. This behavior can often lead decision-makers to cause problems because they are unable to control the situation.

"For instance, people may decide to build a bridge one place and then a road next to it with hopes that travel time will improve for everyone," Nagurney said. "But actually what happens is the exact opposite. So ...we work on predicting flows, predicting costs, and figuring out how to do things better."

The group will work with the American Productivity and Quality Center, a resource that provides information on "process and production improvement," by analyzing data from such places as the World Bank and the U.S. Agency for International Development.

Nagurney and her team will then put together models based on the different variables that affect these organizations, such as investment change or the electrical black out of Aug. 14, 2003, and suggest solutions like re-allocating resources to eliminate risk.

Nagurney said she and her team will look at news outlets like CNN and outline the different demands that affect these businesses. Much of the research deals with "knowledge supernetworks," a mapping of how scattered information from transportation, finance, economics, and logistics affect human connections and behavior.

"People's actions affect the economy and how a society works," Nagurney said. "It's not just the telecommunications. It's who's using it and how they use it ... that lead[s] to the congestion of messages."

Nagurney said the "congestion of messages" could have led to the disregard of critical intelligence information about the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, before they occurred.

ing caloric intake, greatly reduce the risk for Type II diabetes," said Sharoff.

There are two types of diabetes, Type I and Type II. A diagnosis of Type I Diabetes means that the body can no longer produce insulin. It accounts for about five to 10 percent of those with the disease.

Type II Diabetes is characterized by the body's cells becoming resistant to insulin. It is of much bigger concern, accounting for the remaining 90 to 95 percent of those with diabetes.

One of the fastest growing epidemics, millions of people are diagnosed with Type II Diabetes each year. It is also the fifth deadliest disease in the world and is the leading cause of adult blindness, end-stage kidney disease and many other medical problems.

Type II Diabetes is growing fastest among the 20- to 30-year age group.

"I think its mostly linked to our becoming sedentary and eating fast foods," said Elizabeth Mitchell, an exercise science major.

Dr. Barry Braun, professor of exercise science and chief organizer of the event, was excited with the turnout at the event, and is envisioning an even bigger event this spring or next year. He even suggested a partnership with Cooley-Dickinson Hospital in Northampton in the future to expand the cause beyond the University campus.

"What's great is there are undergraduate students from three different departments coming together to put out a cohesive message on an important, timely [subject]," Dr. Braun said, as he visited the different tables and spoke with some of the people who came to the event.

Financial support for the event was received from Kidsports, Stop and Shop, and Atkins Farms.

However, the news on contract funding was the highlight of Story's speech.

"Having the contracts funded is an absolute miracle for those of us who have been working on this contract battle for the last two and a half years.

It has been an enormous struggle," said Sandy Mandel, associate director of special events at the Everywomen's Center.

EDITORIAL OPINION

Gap between male and female salaries remains

Despite the major advancements women have made over the last few decades, there is still a major gap between the amounts of money women earn versus the amounts men earn.

Some of the reasons women earn less are because they work less than men, leave the labor force for longer periods and generally hold jobs that pay less. But the Associated Press reported a congressional study has found that women earned an average of 20.3 percent less than men in 2000 even after adjustments are made for those aspects.

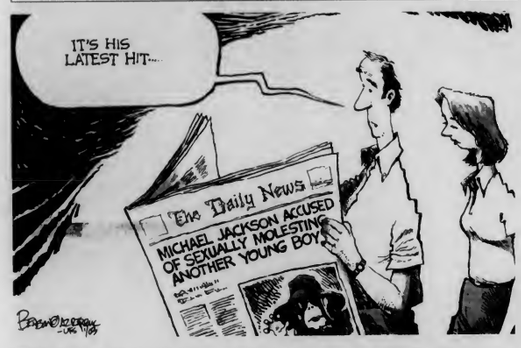
That number has barely changed from two decades ago. In 1983, women were making 19.6 percent less than men, according to the Associated Press.

The study failed to explain why there is an earnings difference. Many women decide to stay in their current position because of commitments to family. Also, women oftentimes look for jobs that are more flexible and not as stressful as those that men look for.

Despite those reasons, which are valid and understandable, society seems to discriminate against women. Bosses don't seem to give raises and bonus payments to women simply because of their gender.

There are other reasons for the disparity between earnings. Age, for instance, may play a factor. Women may be more likely to accept an early retirement package or may spend more time with their children and grandchildren. Sometimes women decide to work fewer hours a week than men because of these reasons.

It seems a new study is now necessary to indicate whether societal standards prevent women from making as much money as men. Critics have also said that women don't ask for higher starting salary, raises, promotions and are consequently not receiving any. Work environments that are oftentimes controlled by men may make women feel inferior and may prevent them from speaking up and result in failed advances, both financially and in position.



Women often hold the same degree as men and as more women enter the workforce, the United States could see a decrease in the rather large gender gap that currently exists.

If women produce work that is just as good of that of a man, and produce it at the same rate, there should be no reason they do not get treated the same. Companies should continue to review their policies regarding the discrimination against women simply for being women.

It's clear that there are many reasons why women still make less than men, and many of these reasons (such as commitments to family) cannot be avoided. But disparities between the amounts of money that male and female executives with the same education make show that women still make less. This seems to show society still places a glass ceiling on women.

Women must speak out against these issues and pursue top bosses and, when necessary, seek higher authority to close the gap on salaries that men and women make.

What she doesn't know will kill you

Matt Brochu

You met her a few months ago, and somehow she managed to seep into your subconscious like that "Suga how you get so fly" song. Just like you have no clue who the hell sings it, you don't know why she's there. But she is, whether you like it or not. You know her cell phone, her room phone. You can dial her Aunt Doreen's house in West Springfield (where she goes to do her laundry every two weeks) faster than you can peck-out 911. But she doesn't know.

Her screenname, that generic one with her first name followed by three to five random numbers or UMass, has its own category at the top of your buddy list. Not only do you know what a "Buddy Alert" is, you've rigged your computer to play "Fat Guy in a Little Coat" from "Tommy Boy" every time her screen name changes from gray to black. Then her away message comes down, and you have a decision to make. To IM or not to IM? These are the ridiculous games that you play on a daily basis. But she doesn't know.

She's it. All right, so maybe not "it" it. Not necessarily Ms. Right, but closer to Ms. Right-up-there-with-Anna-Kournikova-and-Lizzie-McGuire-on-your-list-of-people-you'd-give-anything-to-be-stranded-with-on-a-broken-down-elevator. But it's about more than that. When is it ever about more than that? Never. Not like frilly white dress, overpriced catering, embarrassing drunk in-laws more, but closer to UMass sweatpants, two D.P. Dough Roni Zonies, a futon and a movie you have no interest in seeing more. But she doesn't know.

She's gorgeous, but gorgeous is an understatement. More like you're startled every time you see her because you notice something new in a "Where's Waldo" sort of way. More like you can't stop writing third grade run-on sentences because you can't remotely begin to describe something ... someone ... so inherently amazing. But you're a writer. You can describe anything. That's what you do: pictures to words, events to words, words to even better words. But nothing seems right. More like you're afraid that if you stare at her for too long, you'll prove your parents right: that yes, your face will stick that way. But you wouldn't mind.

You wouldn't mind that the questioning, "Hello?" on the other end makes you want to smile and throw up at the same time. You wouldn't mind worrying about what to get her for her birthday and spending $300 when you only have $17.50 and a Triple-A card to your name. You wouldn't mind that she left your TV on and the blaring infomercials wake you up at 4 a.m. ... because it gives you a chance to watch her sleep. You don't mind that you've slipped up twice when you were hammered and hinted at how you feel, but she was too drunk to remember. So she doesn't know.

Sure, she's pretty, but it's about more than that. You two connect. Anything you throw at her, she can throw right back. You figured out what's going on in that predictable head of hers in under five minutes, but something tells you her heart would take about five years.

You remember everything she's ever said to you, and when that freaks her out you blame it on your photographic memory (which is a lie, you have a 2.7 GPA). You can't remember your teaching assistant's name, and you can't remember that your Puffton rent check was due four days ago, yet you remember the middle name of the kid who tripped her in fifth grade and gave her that cute little scar on her shoulder. Maybe it's because you actually listen when she talks. When do you actually listen? Never. But she doesn't know.

But she has a boyfriend. The kid is a tool, and you are not. He has no redeeming qualities, and you have about 38, even when you're hung over. You could kick his butt, and you've never been in a fight in your life. He treats her like crap, and you would treat her like the princess she believed herself to be on Halloween in 1988.

But she loves him. He wouldn't know what he had even if she slapped him across the face and dumped him, but somehow she still loves him. And somehow she still doesn't know.

Then, out of nowhere, she slaps him across the face and dumps him. She comes to you. You've been there before, so you seem like the smartest guy on earth. She cries, but your corny half-joke, half-compliment somehow gets a smile out of her that almost makes you feel ashamed that you're the only one around who gets to witness it. It looks like you might make her realize that all guys don't deserve to have rocks thrown at them.

But nothing changes. She doesn't know. You get that library elevator feeling in your stomach that she'll never know. You get that feeling that you'll be forced to write a cheesy Collegian column about her that makes "Sleepless in Seattle" look like "Girls Gone Wild."

You go to sleep. You wake up. She doesn't know. You're not in love. You're not obsessed. You blame it on the fact that you just need to get some, but still, it's about more than that. It would just be nice if once in your life, things worked out the way you wanted them to.

So _____, it's about time you know*.

Now cut this out, fill in her name, and give it to her, coward. Just let me know how it works out.

Why is our public so uninformed?

Dan O'Brien

The United States of America is a country where its citizens pride themselves on their rights to independence, freedom of speech and human rights. It seems strange that in an age where our president clearly is not keeping his people updated about a war that has now cost over $150 billion, that we, the people of this land are keeping our mouths closed.

Sept. 11, 2001 was a day that will last in every American's mind forever. It affected all of us in different ways. Even those of us who did not lose loved ones were awoken to the evil that exists in our world. This was a tragedy that should have served as a reminder to all Americans to actively participate in their government and to get involved in helping solve problems that are going on in their communities. Yet, two years later, we Americans seem to be in the same boat as before, apathetic and uninformed.

An example of an uninformed American was displayed better by none other than pop music queen Britney Spears. During an interview by John Tucker of CNN, Spears was asked whether or not President Bush should be sending more troops into Iraq. She responded by saying, "I believe in our president, and we should always support his decisions in whatever he does."

Not only has the American public once again lost interest in what their government does in terms of foreign policy, we have lost interest in it now more than ever before. We live in a time when fear is the top story on the evening news, as we are constantly being bombarded with information about soldiers dying, suicide bombings, and terror threats in our own country.

All of our information from the news seems to be the end result of a story. We are used to hearing sound bites that say, "Two American soldiers were killed today." After hearing about 15 seconds of information regarding a soldier's death, the shot cuts to the White House where either Bush or one of his staff is responding to the tragedy, telling Americans that we are "winning this war."

What we are not hearing are intelligent discussions and commentary about the daily events of the war in Iraq or why the United States military remains there in the first place. About the only discussion on television concerning the war is on Bill O'Reilly's "O'Reilly Factor" on FOX News. However, his agenda regarding the war is clearly known.

There has surely been a lack of general information given to the American public about our affairs overseas. I am not sure who is to blame for this problem which results in leaving Americans uninformed. It could be the fault of the mainstream media. We all know that newspapers and television outlets make money when their ratings increase. On television it would make sense to broadcast captivating teasers such as "Two soldiers died today," to keep more viewers tuning in. After all, the always sensational FOX News Channel's ratings increased 175 percent during their coverage of the war in Iraq this past spring, proving to the nation that captivating headlines and flashy graphics do, in fact, attract viewers.

I have a few questions of my own to which I would like Bush to provide answers. How about what are the plans for paying the salaries of Iraqi police officers? How are we going to rebuild Baghdad?

But this situation is not solely the fault of the media. The government is guilty of not releasing enough information. Although the media should take a more active role in reporting the real stories behind the war, it is possible that the media only reports on stories about death because that is most of the information that the government is giving it. Why is it that whenever someone asks Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld or President George W. Bush questions about how much longer our soldiers will be risking their lives, they respond by using one-sentence answers such as, "We are going to catch these evildoers"?

I have a few questions of my own to which I would like Bush to provide answers. How about what are the plans for paying the salaries of Iraqi police officers? How are we going to rebuild Baghdad? And, what have been the effects of the 500,000 Iraqi civilians that have been killed due to U.S. bombings and sanctions since 1991? If these questions have truly been answered to the mainstream media, then I certainly haven't heard them.

Congress just approved more money to be spent on troops being sent to Iraq at the amount of $87 billion. This is an enormous amount of money being spent in a time when almost every state is suffering from budget deficits. Education and prescription drugs budgets are being cut, and UMass is suffering from a $40 million budget cut. It is up to every American to figure out for themselves exactly why our money is being spent on this war and not to leave it up to CNN and FOX to decide.

One of college's greatest traditions

Emilie Duggan

There were quite a few things I could have written about this week — the lifting of the ban on gay marriage, the state of the media today, my take on the resignation of an SGA senator. But, really, life is already negative enough lately, why add to it?

So, this column is about adventure, excitement and seeing the world — or at least North America — highway by highway. It is about being free and taking the time to breathe, relax and unclench. It's about being wildly uninhibited and responsibly reckless. It's about the almighty road trip.

We have reached the point in the semester where people go crazy from high stress levels and full workloads. Sanity will return during winter break, but right now it's easy to forget that there is more to life than this. We are so caught up in our papers and our projects, our mid-terms and our finals, that we forget about what's beyond the boundaries of our insulated college campus.

College is more than books and lectures. That's hardly a surprising statement, but how many of you actually remember that on a daily basis? Too often students exist with their heads in their books or their eyes glued to computer screens, and so much is missed in the process of learning. This is the time when you should be finding out who you are and who you will become. You're away from home and parents; you have the liberty to do whatever you want without interference. Do really want to look back at the years spent here and have to say that the only thing you got out of college was a degree? Grades are important, to a point; but they are not and should not be all that you get out of your education.

Mark Twain once said, "I have never let my schooling interfere with my education," and truer words have never been spoken. There's an extraordinary world out there waiting to be explored, and there will never be a better time than now to journey through it.

We cannot be fully complete as beings until we have explored all aspects of our selves. And we cannot do that while we are overwhelmed and overburdened with the requirements of the socially mandated college education. What better way to discover your inner being than to throw caution to the wind and hit the road at 3 a.m.? The final destination can never be reached without first taking the journey.

Road trips often begin because you need a change. They are spontaneous — spurred by dissatisfaction with the status quo. There's the feeling that something is missing in your life and a there's desire to find it, and get everything you can from it. You need excitement and adventure, a break from the suffocation brought on by homework and boring lectures from awful professors. You need an escape, and you can find it on the open road.

Road trips have beginnings and ends but it's what's in between that counts. I've been on road trips without destinations that were still filled with the feeling of 'are we there yet?' Then something happens — you see the moon rising between skyscrapers in whatever city you're skirting around, or you wreak havoc at a truck stop in the wee hours of the morning — and suddenly it doesn't matter how far you are away from nowhere. All that matters is that, at that very moment, you are having the most wonderful experience you have ever had. That becomes the first credo of every road warrior — enjoy the trip. You are wherever you are; how you get there and what you do once you arrive is half the fun.

Trips are not measured in miles, and the quality of them cannot be judged by whether or not you go to a place you've never been. Every time you go somewhere it's different, you're different, and it's a different day. You don't even have to leave Amherst and you're still on a journey. That's the key to credo number two: the road is always rolling beneath you, if only you take notice. Go explore.

It's important to remember that road tripping is a way of life and it's certainly not for everyone. It requires an open mind, the ability to view the world around you with curious eyes, and the ability to assert your right to the most basic and important freedom — freedom of choice. It is not about staying in nice hotels (though they're nice sometimes), eating fancy meals (Wendy's dollar menu, all the way) and spending lots of money (though it's unavoidable sometimes). Road trips are about letting your soul fly free and experiencing raw adventure on the open road. It's about living and driving by the seat of your pants, casting all cares and responsibilities aside, and allowing yourself to feel the exhilaration of really living.

We have hurtled through the dark with only a vague idea of where we were going, entering vast expanses of land where the radio picks up nothing but country music's twang of three chords and truthful words.

My best friend is my partner-in-crime on the road. We never run out of things to talk about, but more often than not we talk about how much we have changed, how far we have come, and how much we still have to do still. We bicker about the music and fight about the temperature, but five minutes later we act as though nothing happened. We have run out of money, gas, food and drink on the remotest of roads; we've been treated like criminals in hick towns and like royalty at big city gas stations. We have slept in cars and traveled hundreds of miles just for the sake of traveling.

We have hurtled through the dark with only a vague idea of where we were going, entering vast expanses of land where the radio picks up nothing but country music's twang of three chords and truthful words. We have driven through snowstorms and rainstorms, and worried about whether rivers would flood the road we were on.

But it has never mattered to us what Mother Nature sends down or if the river will rise up. We are always only passing through, singing along with Janis Joplin as she tells us that "freedom's just another word for nothing left to lose." Maybe we have nothing left to lose, Janis, but we have the whole world before us to gain. On the open road, we are not determined by anything but our own nature and we prove only to each other that we are capable of deciding our fate ourselves.

New 'Mario Kart' is double the fun

Press Start to Play

Reid Davenport

For months, fans of the "Mario Kart" games have been waiting for the release of "Mario Kart Double Dash." It's no surprise that "Double Dash" is one of the highest anticipated games of the year for Nintendo as they have stepped up the game play and availability of new exciting modes for players to try out.

"Double Dash" is the single greatest multiplayer racing game on the Gamecube. It surpasses "F-Zero GX" because of the capabilities to use weapons and having a more solid fan base. "Double Dash" throws new levels, as well as familiar ones, at players along with giving them new options when choosing their racers.

The racers are made-up of Nintendo character favorites such as Mario, Luigi, Donkey and Diddy Kong, Yoshi, Birdo, and Bowser as well as the introduction of Princess Daisy, Baby Mario and Baby Bowser. Along with choosing the characters the player will re- ceive a special 'power up' for each character when it comes time to hit an item box during a race. There is also the option to use two characters on one car for added artillery. The final selection is the vehicle itself. The size will change the difference between speed and defense; with the bigger vehicles being strong and slow while the small ones are weak but fast.

The game play with other players is bumped up to the next level as you now have new multiplayer options over the races. The familiar balloon game is back, but this time players can steal balloons from opponents if health is needed. Nintendo has also introduced 'Steal the Shine' where the last person to hold the shine when time runs out wins. This is basically a game of keep away that is good for three or more players. The final one is 'Bombs Away' where the players try throwing bombs at each other to score points. The first one to fill up the hit bar wins.

The race game play has also stepped-up, as there is a new technique to learn how to mini-boost. This is one of the more difficult techniques to learn, but once mastered it makes the player virtually unstoppable. When coming into a sharp turn, hold down the L or R button, depending upon the direction. Then click the control stick back and forth from left to right. Once the exhaust flames turn blue let go of the buttons and a nice little boost comes as the player rounds the corner. This helps only if the technique has been mastered because, as those starting to learn it will find, it is easy to smash into wall or become stuck.

The special weapons are also a big factor in winning the race. Some of the more notable artillery includes Baby Mario's Chain Chomper and Princess Peach's Hearts. The Chain Chomper destroys any racer in front of of Baby Mario when released and will continue to due so after Baby Mario lets him go. Peach's Hearts sends three hearts around the cart and if you are hit by an item, you steal that item.

Another exciting addition to "Mario Kart Double Dash" is the ability to use LAN play. This way each player can use his own TV instead of having to do a split screen or a four square split screen. This is an excellent addition for those looking to set up tournaments with the game, or those who just want the ability to log on and play other players online. The only downside is that the LAN accessory for the Gamecube is currently hard to find and it takes time to learn how to set-up properly.

"Mario Kart Double Dash" is one of the greatest games to be released by Nintendo since the release of "Zelda: Wind Waker." As Nintendo has improved all aspects of the famous Mario racer and added plenty of extras, "Double Dash" is sure to keep players and their friends well entertained into the early morning hours. It is currently priced at $49.99 and is available at local gaming retailers.

Harvest Night '03: Exploring African Culture

By Glen Straub
Collegian Staff

Africa.

Not much in the mainstream arena is known about the so-called "Dark Continent." The images of civil war, physical distress amongst the inhabitants and the AIDS epidemic are some of the disheartening aspects our western culture is exposed to. But there is much more to Africa than what people gather from the news. There are 54 countries on the continent with a wide array of rich cultural practices, gourmet foods, beautiful dress wear and glorious traditional music and dance.

Saturday night these positive attributes of the motherland take center stage in the many happenings going on around campus, as the African Student Association will hold "Harvest Night 2003" in the Campus Center Auditorium.

Harvest Night 2003
Sat., Nov. 22
Campus Center Auditorium - UMass Amherst
7 p.m. - midnight
$8 Five College
$10 General

"Our main goal is to gain awareness," ASA President Yaphet Tilahun said. "We want people to leave the night feeling that they have learned something and to dismiss all the negative stereotypes of Africa."

The event — now in its 34th year – is planned to run from 8 p.m. to midnight. It will feature such entertainment as poetry readings from University of Massachusetts students, a comedic sketch, a fashion show of traditional clothing from many different countries and an array of African foods from across the continent.

"I would say that about 15-20 nations will be represented at this year's event between all the music, dance, food and the fashion show," Tilahun said.

Tilahun, originally from Addis Abba, Ethiopia, a country in the northwest region of Africa, said the night will try to portray all the communities of African students represented on the UMass campus. He plans to represent his home nation, Ethiopia, by constructing a sauce made with Ethiopian spices and butter that is to be served over rice.

To prepare for the wide range of foods that will be served at "Harvest Night," the ASA will also be leading cooking workshops in the Hatch all day Friday and Saturday for anyone who would like to learn how to cook traditional dishes. All one needs to do is go to the Hatch, located in the lower level of the Student Union, and sign up.

According to Tilahun, a highlight of past "Harvest Nights" has been the sketch comedy performed during the evening.

"It is always a crowd favorite," he said. "We like to discuss the issues affecting Africa but in a comedic way."

"['Harvest Night'] is not a time for lecturing," he added. "A lot of students trying to learn about Africa in African-American Studies courses may not be into the material because class at times is boring, so we want to entertain and educate."

Following the night of performing arts and fine cuisine, a dance after-party will be thrown at The X, located in the Southwest living area, until 4 a.m.

Doors open for ASA's "Harvest Night 2003" at 7 p.m. and tickets cost $8 for Five College students with an I.D. and $10 for the general public. Tickets can be purchased at a reduced price all day Friday and Saturday for anyone who

Film looks at the society of Wrestling

By Lauren DeFilippo
Collegian Staff

The formula for success in the entertainment industry is tried-and-true. Simply put — give the people what they want. It is this adage that built and sustains the empire that is World Wrestling Entertainment, and has made its owner, Vince McMahon a millionaire more than a few times over.

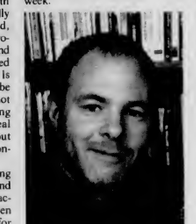
The film, "Wrestling With Manhood: Boys, Bullying and Battering," is a 60 minute in-depth critique of the messages produced, and therefore widely disseminated by the WWE and its programming. At the helm of this critique is University of Massachusetts Communication Professor Sut Jhally, as well as gender violence prevention advocate and UMass alum Jackson Katz.

'Wrestling With Manhood: Boys, Bullying and Battering'
Directed by Sut Jhally and Jackson Katz
60 mins.
Grade: B+

What is interesting about "Wrestling With Manhood," which is produced by the Media Education Foundation, a group based in Northampton, Mass., is that it is the first documentary film to seriously consider professional wrestling from a critical standpoint. It not only analyzes what it is, but what it has the potential to do.

Jhally and Katz beg to ask the question, "what does this mean?" Of course "this" refers to the often-graphic violence that depicts little to no real-life consequences, the rampant homophobia, and the objectification of females for entertainment.

The film itself is pretty standard documentary fare: expert observations and opinions punctuated by illustrative examples. However, "Wrestling With Manhood" differs in that it is almost unrelenting in its development. As the minutes pass, the examples and points become more and more explicit, driving the point clearly home.



From this, it might be easy to suspect that "Wrestling with Manhood" is very anti-professional wrestling as entertainment, but this is not quite the case. What Jhally and Katz do is merit the ability of McMahon and the industry to create and perpetuate an illusion of masculinity, while going one step further and simultaneously pointing out the more questionable fact that no one challenges the popularity of the "sport," or even the casual write-offs that the programming is "just entertainment."

Jhally and Katz believe there are greater cultural forces at work and therefore juxtapose their examples of actual wrestling programming with real world statistics and facts. Among them: the number of reported cases of sexual harassment, the growing problem of school bullying, and its relation to youth suicide, as well as increased youth and domestic violence.

The film is not intended to point fingers at the WWE or the professional wrestling industry as the single most direct cause of the previously mentioned public health issues. What the Jhally and Katz contend, repeatedly, is that professional wrestling and its choreographed depictions (yes, it is openly admitted to be fake) of violence are not directly responsible for bullying and creating less than ideal stereotypes of masculinity, but they are, in a very real way, contributing factors.

What was most interesting was the way in which Jhally and Katz point out the audience reactions. Wrestling is often described as a "soap opera for men," so there is no doubt that it is dramatic and exciting. However, in the fury of excitement, the audience seems to full-heartedly embrace an idea of masculinity that is positively conservative and traditional, practically unfrozen from the 1950's, simply because it is packaged as rebellious, real, and edgy.

"Wrestling With Manhood" definitely gives you something to think about. Fans of the WWE should not be particularly wary; the film probably does not provide any information that they do not already know. What it does do, however, is force a more careful, and necessary examination of that knowledge. "Wrestling With Manhood" airs on HSCN this week.

New flick exposes unethical journalism

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Correspondent

Derived from a true story, "Shattered Glass" is based on a conniving political writer, Stephen Glass. His character shows audiences a world of journalistic dishonesty where articles can be completely falsified and based on little fact, but often times whole-heartedly believed.

In the mid 1990s the Washington, D.C. writer began his career writing small pieces for the political magazine New Republic. By sensationalizing his work, he quickly became one of the most sought after feature writers. It is unclear to the audience what drives the young Glass to begin his intense fabrication and lying, but it may be an attempt to take the stress-free route while working and attending graduate school. Perhaps it was the thrill of getting away with it, or the desire for scandal or simply a skill he is extremely good at it.

Glass seems to become pathological with his lying: he uses such brilliance when deriving the important information that makes up his articles. For three years he fabricates stories — Glass leads readers to believe that 27 of his articles are true. He writes these fictitious articles containing error right down to the sources, quotes and entire dialect of the story.

At first, one might ask, how could a conniving barely out-of-teen-hood student get away with such journalistic murder? Possibly because Stephen Glass was a damn good liar, and, in terms of the film itself, because Hayden Christensen does a remarkable job of playing the geek-turned-infamously popular Glass.

"Shattered Glass" examines more than the journalistic fiction that Glass created. The film grants the viewer a look into the personal life of this intriguing man. The audience is given the chance to see Glass' slippery relationships with women and co-workers. He uses his skill to compliment women and tell people just exactly what they wanted to hear. He is not only convincing, but also likeable and popular amongst his peers. At one point, Glass even speaks to a journalism class to discuss his rising popularity and instant fame. It seems as though the entire magazine staff of 20-something aged adults are so vulnerable, they allow to Glass entice them and the rest of the country with his colorful deception.

'Shattered Glass'
Directed by Billy Ray
Starring
Hayden Christensen
Peter Sarsgaard
Rosario Dawson
Lion Gate Entertainment
Grade: A-

The published article that shattered Glass' career came when he reported and wrote about a conference about hackers, and then went on to discuss the meeting time and place of the convention even to the restaurant where the journalists gathered prior to the meeting. Adam Peneburg, played by Steve Zahn, a fellow editor, and presently a renowned online journalist followed up on Glass' article and found that the convention of hackers was non-existent. The hall that Glass supposedly visited on Sunday at 3 p.m. was not even open on Sunday, nor was the restaurant where he supposedly met with fellow journalists. The career of the big-time writer came to a screeching halt after Peneburg uncovered Glass' secret; over half of the 41 articles he had written for the political magazine were falsified.

Perhaps the most stunning performance in the film is delivered by Peter Sarsgaard, who plays The New Republic's new editor, Charles Lane. Lane was informed of his likeliness to lie in stories when the 'Hack Heaven' story was published. He was a bit weary and skeptical that the young professional was capable of such dishonesty, but quickly found that this was not the first time that Glass fabricated articles. The audience watched as Glass' career shattered quicker than it started and it was mesmerizing to see.

The film, although full of lies, tells it like it is; there were no special effects needed, no fancy scenery and no elaborate sets, perhaps that is why it is so vivid and real to watch. Christensen does a remarkable job at playing the sly and slick Glass and director Billy Ray brilliantly scripts the antithesis of seeing his career shatter.

APC fall tour swings through a score of regional venues wrote the music for the majority of the songs — to a role in A Perfect Circle where he is, at this point, mostly playing other people's music.

"[Howerdel] had written mostly everything, except for 'The Package' which I wrote on and 'Crimes,'" said White. "It was kind of challenging to play someone else's music. It was something I wasn't really used to, I was used to pretty much playing my own stuff."

White also saw a different experience in working with the notoriously flamboyant Manson to the more subdued Keenan who, despite literally staying in the shadows of the stage, is still the centerpiece of the band. White, however, doesn't care who is front-and-center and how they act at all, he honestly just cares about making the music.

"It was important to [Manson] to be on the cover of every magazine, to get all the attention; that's why it was called Marilyn Manson," White said. " ... It wasn't really important to me, what's important is playing music to people. In the long run everyone knows who did what. The music lasts forever, the celebrity — it dies out eventually."

As for the exact differences between Manson and Keenan, White already has developed a stock answer.

"With Manson it is kinda like a pornographic movie meets a slasher, in-your-face kind of thing," White said. "[Keenan's stage presence] is more like a movie like the first 'Alien' movie where you don't really see the monster. It's a little more mysterious.

Manson likes to be in the front and Maynard likes to stay in the back. That kind of describes their personalities. They're both probably eccentric egomaniacs, just in two different ways. They're very artistic and smart. One's a little more artistic and one can sing a little better."

White transitioned seamlessly from this analogy to his description of A Perfect Circle's live set.

"There are a lot of heavy songs in the set," he said, "but there's also a lot of stuff that's kind of laid back. Just because it's not heavy and in your face all the time doesn't mean its not good."

It would appear White has found himself an ideal home in A Perfect Circle.

"I've learned a lot having worked with someone like Manson for a long time," he said. "When you're working with a frontman, as a musician, you feed off their energy. You, you know, adapt to it and learn from it. With Manson it's all about press photos and videos and just image in everything and I don't think it's that bad of a thing."

White stopped and corrected himself.

"I think it's better to have the music take a front seat to everything," he said. "[The experience with Manson] kind of made me appreciate music a little more [rather] than just trying to look crazy and be a rock star."

New England fans will have many chances to see the newly transformed Jeordie White as well as fellow newguy James Iha play with A Perfect Circle this week. Nov. 21 the band will be in Durham, NH, followed by shows on Nov. 22 in Portland, ME, on Nov. 24 in Providence, and finally a show on Nov. 25 in Wallingford, CT.

Year Of The Rabbit, the new band from ex-Failure frontman Ken Andrews will be opening all the shows. The band's spacey art/alt-rock should be a big hit amongst APC fans as "Thirteenth Step" is unabashedly Failure influenced — in fact the album's stand-out track is a beautiful, heart-stopping string-based rendition of Failure's track "The Nurse Who Loved Me" which APC performs live as a faithful, and amazing, cover.

Minutewomen look for solutions

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

With it's first regular season weekend series on tap, the Massachusetts women's basketball team is staring at more questions than answers.

The Maroon and White travel to Fairfield, Conn. today to face Sacred Heart for its first game of the season. It returns back home to play Holy Cross on Sunday for it's regular season home opener.

Last year the Minutewomen destroyed the Pioneers 74-48, but that was a much different team. UMass had current WNBA player Jen Butler dominating in the post, an area in question for this year's youthful team.

"We played them last year," Massachusetts coach Marnie Dacko said, "We beat them pretty easily but we had a different kind of team, we had a post-laden team."

The Maroon and White are still the heavily favored team against Pioneers, who in their existence have yet to win a conference title. However, Sacred Heart has picked up a bevy of talent in the off-season and look to build off of last years 18-10 team.

A large part of last year's success came on the shoulders of last season's NEC rookie of the year Nicolle Rubino, who averaged 12.4 point and 3.5 rebounds a game.

Coach Dacko sees the game as a learning experience for her young team, and knows that the Pioneers haven't forgotten what happened the last time the teams met.

"They run a lot of motion offense, they play man-to-man defense, they are pretty aggressive," Dacko said, "They've got everything to gain, they have nothing to lose so they are going to be coming out after us with the revenge factor that we blew them away last year."

The Pioneers have had some significant losses with the graduation of Brooke Rutnik and Brooke Kelly. Sacred Heart's third all-time leading scorer. Both players were key components in the paint last year, leaving a big hole around the basket.

Holy Cross will bring an entirely different challenge to Amherst on Sunday. The Crusaders have exhibited year in and year out that they are one of the elite teams in the Patriot league.

The Crusaders have won seven straight Patriot league regular season titles, and are picked to win their eighth this year. As far as competition is concerned Holy Cross is one of the more talented teams that the Minutewomen will face on their non-conference schedule.

"Holy Cross is a very seasoned team, they have always been known to be a top runner in the Patriot League," Dacko said. "They're a very well coached team. They are going to be a team like in the A-10, and be challenging to play, they are a very physical team."

The Crusaders play a similar offense to UMass as far as calling picks and running their motion. The major concern is whether the Maroon and White can keep up with the aggressive Holy Cross attack.

"They run an offense similar to ours they run a lot of flex cuts, they have a lot of screens in their offense," Dacko said, "It will be familiar to us so hopefully we will be able to defend it."

Leading the way for the Crusaders will be junior Maggie Fontana and senior forward Mary Rose Campbell. The duo has been part of several successful Holy Cross teams, including last year's NCAA tournament squad.

Fontana will be the biggest concern for UMass as she possesses the ability to dominate the boards every night. Last season she averaged 7 rebounds a game to complement her 15 points a game.

As a freshman Fontana earned first team Patriot league accolades and was named the MVP of the Patriot league tournament.

The Minutewomen have had some difficulties in the preseason. In their first exhibition game, against a much larger Team Concept, the Minutewomen lost their momentum after the half, eventually losing 73-58.

Finishing has been a major concern for Dacko, who hopes that UMass is ready to play a full game, rather than just a first half.

"The athleticism is there. I think that my players have to prove it to themselves that they can go out and play 40 minutes of basketball," Dacko said, "We haven't seen it yet, we haven't had 40 minutes in a real game situation."

New England can't overlook the Texans

By Mark Babineck
Associated Press

HOUSTON (AP) — The New England Patriots need to look back one week to ward themselves against taking their trip to Houston lightly.

The first-place Patriots have won six straight and their 8-2 start ties the best in franchise history. But the Texans are coming off a close win against the Buffalo Bills, who shut out New England in the season opener.

"We realize that and I think they can feed off of that also. They did something we didn't," Patriots cornerback Ty Law said. "They're going to come out fired up and ready to play, just as well as our team. I think it'll turn out to be a better game than people think it might be."

The second-year Texans (4-6) beat Buffalo 12-10, giving them two wins in their last three games and matching the victory total from their inaugural season.

When they play the Patriots, the Texans will be unique in having faced the teams with the top records in the league — the Chiefs (9-1) and the Titans, Colts and Panthers (all 8-2). Houston beat the Panthers with Tony Banks subbing at quarterback, and he will start again Sunday as David Carr rests a sprained right shoulder.

The Texans have navigated that schedule with an injury-depleted defense that has been among the most vulnerable until some recent improvement.

the Deacons downed 4-2 back in August.

"[The Wolverines] have changed drastically, and so have we. We just have to keep doing the fundamental things we've done well and keep ourselves on track," said coach Jen Averill.

The Wolverines are the only non-ACC team in this year's Final Four. Michigan is led by tri-captain and 2002 Big Ten Athlete of the Year, April Fronzoni. As Michigan's all-time leader in career goals (68) and points (155), the senior leads the Wolverines with 20 goals and seven assists for 47 points. She will be joined by fellow tri-captains Stephanie Johnson and Kristi Gannon.

Being the only true northern team this year may benefit the Wolverines this weekend in chilly Amherst.

"We've played in some harsh weather ... we've practiced in it every day also," Gannon said. "I think it will give us a little edge, if anything. If anything helps, we'll take it."

At 7:30, ACC rivals Duke (19-3) and Maryland (20-3) will go head-to head for the first time in postseason history.

Maryland leads the all-time series 19-3-3, but lost the last match 3-1 last month.

The Blue Devils are on a mean streak as of late, winning 11 of their last 12 games, capped by an 8-2 thumping of Old Dominion in the NCAA quarterfinals to punch their ticket to Amherst.

"We're firing on all cylinders, playing our best hockey, and hope we can carry that through," said coach Beth Bozman.

The Blue Devils carry an offense featuring five players that have scored in double-digits, led by the one-two punch of sophomore Katie Grant and junior Gracie Sorbello. Grant's 62 points on the year are good enough for fourth in the nation.

But they will be up against the Terrapins, who have excelled at Garber Field in 2003. The Terps played their first three games of the season at Garber, where they outscored opponents by a combined score of 21-0.

"I think it's a great experience when we can play on a field early in the season and then come back to play on it again, it feels a little more familiar, and we're familiar with the facilities, so it feels good to come back," said junior Kristin Harris. "It's exciting."

The Terps will be led by the high-powered scoring of Paula Infante, Anja Boettcheer, Jackie Ciconte, and Colleen Barbieri, who all have scored in double-digits as well.

Through 23 games, the Terps have scored more than five goals in a game on eight occasions, most recently a 5-0 defeat of Penn State in the NCAA quarterfinals for their ninth Final Four visit.

long-term risks for short-term gain."

The Minutemen suffered a 4-1 loss to BC in their first game without Mauldin last Friday, but rebounded with goals from Marvin Degon, James Solon, and John Toffey — all season firsts — to down Providence 3-2 at Schneider Arena.

"Well, it's a sign of maturity, and it's a sign of their commitment to staying with the task, which is a six-month proposition," Cahoon said of his club's resilience. "You can't let one game get you too high, and you can't let one game get you too low. It takes experience to make that happen, and I think those guys exhibited that last week. Now we have to put anything that's happened up to this point aside and deal with tomorrow, and try to make the most of that.

While Cahoon's line combinations, which fluctuated greatly prior to the conference season, seem to have solidified, there are still some changes on the horizon.

"I'm not comfortable yet, the kids know that I'm not. There's still kids fighting for playing time, there's still kids trying to figure out what end of the equation they're on, the role player, offensive type of player, two-way player, we're trying to figure all of this out.

"I've got a couple of combinations that I'm more comfortable with right now, i.e. [Tim] Vitek, [John] Toffey, and [Josh] Hanson, I thought they played well last weekend. They had a good week of practice, hopefully that line will kind of feed off one another. I've got [Stephen] Werner and Solon playing together, and that creates an awful lot of speed on that line, and hopefully they can get something going with [Craig] MacDonald playing with them."

SPORTS WEEKEND

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 2003 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Record: 20-3, 2-2 ACC
Coach: Missy Meharg
Last meeting: Duke won, 3-1
Key players: B Paula Infante (19 goals, 7 assists, 45 points)
F Anja Boettcher (18 goals, 2 assists, 38 points)
G Tori Cano (GAA 1.00, Pct. .726, 4 shutouts)

Outlook: Maryland has had its best success this season at Garber, and will look to continue their winning ways in their second stint in Amherst. Early on, they will need to humble the Blue Devils by making some big plays on offense, and the Terps are very capable with scoring machines Boettcher, Infante, Jackie Ciconte, and Colleen Barbieri. In this matchup of two high-powered offenses, the pressure will be on the defense of Cano, Emily Boyer and Kristin Harris to make some stops.

Record: 17-5, 5-1 Big Ten
Coach: Marcia Pankratz
Last meeting: 9/1/2003, Wake Forest won 4-2
Key players: F April Fronzoni (20 goals, 7 assists, 47 points), M Jessica Blake (9 goals, 9 assists, 27 points), G Beth Riley (GAA 0.81, Pct. .797, 6 shutouts)
Outlook: In their 2001 national championship season, the Wolverines lost in the semifinals of the Big Ten tournament. After losing this year's Big Ten semifinals again, the Blue and Gold have to be wondering if this is déjà vu all over again. Expect a nail-biter, as 10 of the Wolverines' 13 NCAA tourney games have been decided by one goal or less. They will need to find ways to penetrate the stingy Deacon defense early if they are to stay close.

Record: 19-3, 2-2 ACC
Coach: Beth Bozman
All-time series: Maryland leads, 19-3-3
Key players: F Katie Grant (12 goals, 8 assists, 32 points)
B Gracie Sorbello (8 goals, 4 assists, 20 points), G Christy Morgan (GAA 1.64, Pct. .755, 4 shutouts)

Outlook: The Blue Devils have been on a roll as of late, winning 11 of their last 12 games, most recently an 8-2 thrashing of powerhouse Old Dominion to bring them to their first Final Four. Although they beat the Terps earlier this year, they must be cautious of their improved and explosive offense. Maryland has outscored their opponents 21-0 through three games this season at Garber Field, and has been known to take off on scoring sprees.

NCAA Final Four arrives at Garber

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Students will be in for a treat this weekend, when the 2003 NCAA Field Hockey Final Four comes to the University of Massachusetts' own Richard F. Garber Field.

Defending national champion Wake Forest (20-1) continues its title defense in the first game tonight, at 5 p.m. against Michigan (17-5). This is the fourth consecutive year that the Demon Deacons have qualified for the Final Four. They will be led offensively by junior Kelly Dostal and two-time Atlantic Coast Conference Player of the Year Kelly Doton, who will both be feeling right at home this weekend when they play in their home state of Massachusetts.

Dostal, a Hatfield native, ranks third in the nation with a team-high 29 goals and 11 assists for 63 points. The senior Doton, a Greenfield native, ranks second on the team with 11 goals and 16 assists for 38 points. They will be joined up front by sophomore Macke Boreel and senior Katie Ackerman for an explosive offense that has outshot opponents 471-96.

Goalie Katie Ridd leads a defense that has allowed just 12 goals all season. She has recorded 10 shutouts this season, and her .927 career goals against average is a team record.

"[Katie]'s a great leader in the backfield," Dostal said. "Our defense is awesome."

Their quest to repeat goes through the Wolverines, whom

Outlook: The favorite to repeat as national champs, this year's Deacons feature one of the most stifling defenses in the nation, and will look to put the clamps on Michigan quickly. They will be looking to the wicked combination of Dostal and Doton to keep the Wolverines on their heels, but they must overlook their win earlier this year and expect a much better opponent this time. Expect some fan support for local native Doton, who will be playing twenty minutes down the road from her hometown.

Déjà vu at Mullins

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

Two hundred and forty-nine days.

That's how long ago the Massachusetts hockey team did the improbable. In that time, the war in Iraq began and "ended," the Boston Red Sox completed an entire season, and China sent its first man into space.

Exactly 249 days ago — eight months and four days — the Minutemen completed a sweep of the Maine Black Bears in the Hockey East quarterfinals. Even more unlikely, the series was held in Alfond Arena in Orono, Maine, where the Black Bears had never lost a playoff series.

Tonight at the Mullins Center (7 p.m.), the teams meet for the first time since that cold night in Orono, when UMass held off a late Maine surge to advance to the Hockey East semifinals for the first time in school history, where it was ousted by New Hampshire in front of 17,565 at Boston's FleetCenter.

Tonight has a different spin for the Minutemen as well. Coming off a weekend split that included a loss to Boston College and a gritty win over Providence, UMass remains at No. 9 in the USA Today/Inside College Hockey national poll, and the Black Bears sit at No. 3.

Whatever emotions might be left over from the early March playoff meeting has dissipated for the Minutemen.

"Other than the fact that we know that they're a really good team, and last time we got together it was advantage us," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "Now that's put aside, you can't duplicate that situation, there's different people involved, they've lost some people, we've lost some people. It's a different point in the season, there's different stakes."

"We're taking this as a separate game, this is the 2003-2004 year, this is our first encounter with them, we want to play well, we're going to have to play hard, we're going to have to play smart in order to get it done, and what happened last year has no bearing on what goes on tonight."

The Black Bears come to the Mullins Center riding a two-game win streak, with victories over Northeastern (5-2) last Friday and UMass Lowell (4-0) two days later. Sophomore Frank Doyle had to stop just 22 shots to blank the River Hawks, and Maine received goals from four different players. But the Black Bears have struggled against ranked opponents recently, with a 4-1 loss to No. 2 BC on Nov. 7 and a 6-3 loss to No. 4 UNH the following day.

Cahoon confirmed that the Minutemen will be without high-scoring Greg Mauldin again tonight. Mauldin has missed two games already after suffering an injury late last week, and Cahoon said he is day-to-day, with the possibility of returning Tuesday against Vermont.

"He's making good progress, but we're not comfortable enough with his level of comfort to throw him in there," Cahoon said. "I'm not going to take

Deep in the heart of Texas

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

By virtue of its 80-58 win over St. Francis at the Mullins Center Tuesday night, the Massachusetts' men's basketball team (1-0) will travel to Lubbock, Texas tonight for a 7 p.m. tilt with Bobby Knight's Texas Tech Red Raiders (2-0) in the second round of the Pre-Season National Invitation Tournament.

The game, which will be televised nationally on ESPN2, will mark the first meeting between the two schools on the hardwood. The Maroon and White does own an 8-8 all-time mark against schools from the Big 12 Conference, however they came up short in their only previous visit to the Lone Star State; a 76-65 loss at Texas in January of 1999.

The winner will advance to the semi-final round, which will be held at New York's Madison Square Garden on Wednesday night, and will take on Utah who defeated Minnesota in the first round on Wednesday night.

For the Minutemen, it is the third time in the last 11 years that they have opened their season in the Pre-Season NIT. They own a 5-2 all-time record in tournament play; including a runner-up finish in 1993 where they ousted No. 1 North Carolina in the semifinals before bowing out to eventual champion Kansas.

Third-year coach Steve Lappas' squad is led by junior point guard Anthony Anderson, who is coming off of a 21-point effort against the Terriers that also saw him dish out six assists with only one turnover.

Anderson, who was three-of-five from 3-point range and a perfect six-for-six from the foul line, was the Maroon and White's second leading scorer last season, averaging 11.8 points per game.

Equally impressive for the Minutemen was the play of center Gabe Lee. The sophomore posted career highs in both rebounds (11) and blocked shots (seven), while also scoring eight points.

Another encouraging factor in the win for UMass was the play of its freshmen. Forward Rashaun Freeman, playing in his first collegiate game, led all players with 14 rebounds and also totaled 11 points, while guards Art Bowers (14 points) and Maurice Maxwell (six points, three steals) both had impressive debuts as well.

The Red Raiders, who are coming off of an impressive 89-58 win over Davidson, are led by senior forward Andre Emmett and freshman guard Jarius Jackson.

Emmett, a potential All-Big 12 candidate, led Tech with 17 points and five rebounds against Davidson, while Jackson chipped in with 17 points and two assists.

Last season, the Red Raiders posted a 22-13 overall record, including a third place finish in the NIT.

Knight, who is in his third season in Lubbock, has guided Tech to a 46-22 record. Knight's career record currently stands at 810-311, including his 29 seasons at Indiana and six at Army. He ranks fourth in NCAA history in career victories, currently ranking behind only Dean Smith (879), Adolph Rupp (876) and Jim Phelan (830).

Knight has led his teams to 25 NCAA Tournament appearances, including three NCAA titles with the Hooisers.

Last train that left after 9-11 returns to station

By Karen Matthews
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — The last New Jersey commuter train to leave the World Trade Center before the twin towers collapsed in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attack was the first one to return, rolling into a temporary station Sunday with dignitaries and victims' family members on board.

"It's a resumption of normalcy," said New Jersey Gov. James McGreevey. He was joined on the short trip under the Hudson River from Jersey City, N.J. to the temporary PATH station by Mayor Michael Bloomberg and New Jersey Sens. Jon Corzine and Frank Lautenberg.

"Today, we're proud and we're pleased to bring back to the people of this region something that was taken from us on Sept. 11," said Anthony Coscia, chairman of the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey.

Thelma Stuart, whose husband, Port Authority police officer Walwyn Stuart Jr., was instrumental in safely evacuating that train — and who then returned to the trade center, where he died — rode in the first car with her 3-year-old daughter, Amanda.

"It's a great honor," she said.

As the train surfaced from the tunnel under the Hudson River, passengers saw the construction site that the trade center has become.

The World Trade Center station itself looks stripped down and industrial, with exposed beams and a corrugated steel ceiling. The bare-bones aesthetic is softened with panels bearing quotations about New York from notables including Edgar Allan Poe and Gene Kelly.

The station, in the northeast corner of ground zero, was restored over 16 months for about $323 million, after crews gutted two train tunnels down to their steel frames and installed nearly 7,000 feet of new track. A permanent, $2 billion transit hub will take its place in 2006.

The station is expected to accommodate up to 50,000 passengers a day. Before the attacks, the station handled about 67,000 daily passengers; they had to switch to ferries, cars and buses after the station was destroyed.

Athletes at risk for sexual abuse

By Jennifer Marcoullier
Collegian Correspondent

Sexual abuse in sports is a widespread problem not getting the attention it deserves, according to sports scholar Celia Brackenridge.

Brackenridge's spoke at Smith College on the topic "Sex Offending in Sports: A Whole New Ball Game?"

According to Brackenridge, there are three major risk factors for abuse: athlete vulnerability, coach inclination, and sport opportunity. She described theoretical models that may explain how someone becomes an abuser. Brackenridge also stressed that no definitive answers can be given in the case of sports since this is such a new area of study.

"Prior to 1990, there was no research in this area," said Brackenridge. "I met with a lot of skepticism in the early '90s."

The turning point in the UK, according to Brackenridge, came in 1995 when Britain's Olympic swimming coach Paul Hickson was sentenced to 17 years in prison after being convicted of rape and sexual assault. Publicity from the case spurred policy changes in the UK to protect children in sports from sex offenders.

But those new protections do not extend to adult athletes, said Brackenridge.

"There are no anti-harassment or assault policies for adults [in the UK]."

In addition, the culture of sports may protect perpetrators

Georgia president resigns under pressure

MISHA JAPARIDZE/ASSOCIATED PRESS

Opposition supporters, some atop an APC, center, celebrate Georgian President Eduard Shevardnadze's resignation near his residence in Tbilisi, yesterday. Shevardnadze, under increasing pressure for weeks over fraud in parliamentary elections.

By Misha Dzhindzhikhashvili
Associated Press

TBILISI, Georgia (AP) — Georgian President Eduard Shevardnadze resigned Sunday as the opposition threatened to storm his residence. His fall sparked fireworks and dancing among tens of thousands of protesters, and ended a political crisis astonishing for its speed and lack of violence in a blood-washed region.

Shevardnadze's resignation caps a political career during which he won admiration in the West by helping guide the Cold War to an end as Soviet foreign minister under Mikhail Gorbachev. But during 10 years as president of Georgia, he became despised for rampant corruption.

Residents of Tbilisi poured into streets and partied late into the night after the resignation was announced, honking car horns and waving flags on the capital's main Rustaveli Avenue. Champagne corks flew, and revelers placed flowers into the machine gun barrels of two armored personnel carriers blocking a street.

Georgia lies at a crossroads important to both the United States and Russia, on the planned path of an oil pipeline between the landlocked Caspian Sea and the ports of the Black Sea. The Caucasus nation has seen two bloody separatist movements under Shevardnadze's rule since 1992.

Throughout nearly three weeks of protests — since parliament elections that the opposition said were rigged — both sides, mindful of Georgia's history of fatal political conflicts, had pledged to avoid provocations. Shevardnadze said maintaining peace was paramount in his decision to resign.

"I realized that what is happening may end with spilled blood if I use my rights" to use force against the protesters, he said on national television.

"The president has accomplished a courageous act," said opposition leader Mikhail Saakashvili, head of the National Movement. "History will judge him kindly."

But by then, it was unclear if police and soldiers would have obeyed an order to use force. Some soldiers joined a crowd of 50,000 opposition protesters who massed in front of parliament Sunday morning as Shevardnadze still clung to power.

The defense minister said the military wouldn't intervene on the president's behalf after opposition supporters on Saturday stormed parliament and declared an interim government, forcing Shevardnadze to flee the building in a nationally televised scene.

Abroad, Shevardnadze found few allies. He has long courted the United States, but Washington condemned the Nov. 2 elections as fraudulent. After the parliament takeover, the United States only called on both sides to avoid violence. Russia sent its foreign minister to mediate a way out.

Walk of Light set to improve campus safety

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

Measures are being taken by the Student Government Association and the University of Massachusetts Police Department to promote safety on campus by sponsoring a campus-wide walk called the Walk of Light.

The Walk of Light is an annual event, created to promote the safety of walkways on campus. During the walk, members of the UMPD, SGA, and the student body walk the paths of campus to identify places that don't have enough lighting and to address any other safety concerns.

The two main objectives of the walk are to identify and repair areas with poor lighting, as well as to trim back overgrown bushes and trees that cause passage problems.

"We try to find the problem spots on campus," said Mina Safain, SGA secretary of public policy and relations. "The UMPD and SGA want to protect students as much as possible."

Volunteers are split into two groups, one covering the right side of campus and one covering the left. The entire walk usually takes anywhere from one to two hours, depending on maintenance needs. The walk begins at 6 p.m. to ensure complete darkness.

"It's very important for students to participate. Even the UMPD doesn't have the same perception [as the students] of what's safe and what's not," said Safain.

Safain said that two years ago, the trail by the Worcester Dining Hall leading to Orchard Hill was very poorly lit. During that year's walk, volunteers installed enough lights to illuminate the entire walkway.

"Before, [the path] was horrible," said Safain. "We trimmed a lot of overhanging bushes that were causing traffic problems. It's much safer now."

In the past, the Walk of Light has allowed for the installation of extra police call boxes around campus as well.

"These problems don't take a lot to fix: you can see progress right away," he said.

According to Safain, the Walk of Light was created partly in response to rapes and sexual assaults that were reported on the UMass campus in years past.

The Walk of Light begins on the Student Union steps tomorrow at 6 p.m. No prior registration is necessary and volunteers from both the UMass campus and the surrounding areas are welcome. The event is sponsored by the UMPD.

Two U.S. soldiers possibly beat to death by Iraqi teens

By Mariam Fam
Associated Press

MOSUL, Iraq (AP) — Iraqi teenagers dragged two bloodied American soldiers from a wrecked vehicle, pummeled them with concrete blocks and slit their throats on Sunday, witnesses said, describing a burst of savagery in a city once safe for Americans.

Another soldier was killed by a bomb and a U.S.-allied police chief was assassinated.

The U.S.-led coalition also said it grounded commercial flights after the military confirmed that a missile struck a DHL cargo plane that landed Saturday at Baghdad International Airport with its wing aflame.

Nevertheless, American officers insisted they were making progress in bringing stability to Iraq, and the U.S.-appointed Governing Council named an ambassador to Washington — an Iraqi-American woman who spent the past decade lobbying U.S. lawmakers to promote democracy in her homeland.

Witnesses to the Mosul attack said gunmen shot two soldiers driving through the city center, sending their vehicle crashing into a wall. The 101st Airborne Division said the soldiers were driving to another garrison.

About a dozen swarming teenagers dragged the soldiers out of the wreckage and beat them with concrete blocks, the witnesses said.

"They lifted a block and hit them with lt on the face," said Younis Mahmoud, 19.

The bodies were seen with their throats cut. It was unknown whether the soldiers were alive or dead when pulled from the wreckage.

Another teenager, Bahaa Jassim, said some looted the vehicle of weapons, CDs and a backpack.

"They remained there for over an hour without the Americans knowing anything about it," he said. "I ... went and told other troops."

Television video showed the soldiers' bodies splayed on the ground as U.S. troops secured the area. One victim's foot appeared to have been severed.

The frenzy recalled the October 1993 scene in Somalia, when locals dragged the bodies of Marines killed in fighting with warlords through the streets.

In Baqouba, just north of Baghdad, insurgents detonated a roadside bomb as a 4th Infantry Division convoy passed, killing one soldier and wounding two others, the military said.

In Baghdad, Brig. Gen. Mark Kimmitt confirmed the Mosul deaths but refused to provide details.

"We're not going to get ghoulish about it," he said.

The savagery of the attack was unusual for Mosul, once touted as a success story in sharp contrast to the anti-American violence seen in Sunni Muslim areas north and west of Baghdad.

In recent weeks, however, attacks against U.S. troops have increased in Mosul, raising concerns the insurgency is spreading.

Simultaneously, attacks have accelerated against Iraqis considered to be supporting Americans — such as policemen and politicians working for the interim Iraqi administration.

On Sunday, gunmen killed the Iraqi police chief of Latifiyah, 20 miles south of Baghdad, and his bodyguard and driver, American and Iraqi officials said. No further details were released.

The assassination occurred one day after suicide bombers struck two police stations northeast of Baghdad within 30 minutes, killing at least 14 people. Gunmen on Saturday also killed an Iraqi police colonel protecting oil installations in Mosul.

Elsewhere, Iraqi police said six U.S. Apache helicopter gunships blasted marshland after insurgents fired four rocket-propelled grenades at the American military garrison at the city's northern end. One Iraqi passerby was killed in the air attack, police said.

In Kirkuk, 150 miles north of Baghdad, a bomb exploded at an oil compound, injuring three American civilian contractors from the U.S. firm Kellogg Brown & Root. The three suffered facial cuts from flying glass, U.S. Lt. Col. Matt Croke said.

KBR, a subsidiary of Halliburton, also has a significant presence at Baghdad's Palestine Hotel, which was rocketed by insurgents Friday, wounding one civilian.

"We all know that Americans are being threatened," Croke said.

Kimmitt told reporters in Baghdad that witnesses saw two surface-to-air missiles fired Saturday at a cargo plane operated by the Belgium-based package service DHL as it left for Bahrain.

The plane was the first civilian airliner hit by insurgents, who have shot down several military helicopters with shoulder-fired rockets.

Scholar: Certain athlete types more prone to sexual assault of abuse. For example, Brackenridge described a rookie athlete eager to be accepted by the team. Hazing rituals, which may range from innocent pranks to sexual abuse, are often used to prove membership in the group.

Once the athlete complies with the hazing and is accepted, he or she is protected by a "dome of silence" which serves to hide the abuse and divide those who are part of the group from those who are not. That culture of silence puts athletes at risk, she said.

Brackenridge posted a "health warning" for the mostly student audience.

"Seek help if you need it, especially through your campus counseling centers. Support others ... Challenge others if they diminish the importance of this issue."

Brackenridge, who is from Britain, ended her talk with a question for the United States.

"In the land of the free, who will prevent sexual exploitation in sports?"

"I think it's time we really pay serious attention to what's happening within sports. It's time to stop the violence. This is an important topic we don't talk about enough," said Yanina Vargas, senior associate dean for community development at Hampshire College.

Although sexual assault statistics are reported on each campus, the Five Colleges do not have statistics specifically on sexual abuse in sports, said Vargas.

"But I think we're getting better. The Five Colleges Sexual Assault Prevention and Intervention Committee is doing really good work with the complexities [of each campus' issues]."

The lecture was sponsored by the Project on Women and Social Change, the Exercise and Sports Studies program at Smith and the Smith Lecture Fund.

"[Brackenridge's] work is really cutting edge," said Chris Shelton, co-director of the Project on Women and Social Change and ESS associate professor. "She has an incredible understanding of American sports as an international scholar."

Brackenridge is a visiting professor at Smith and a consultant in child protection and gender equity issues in sport and leisure. She is also a former athlete and captain of the England and Great Britain lacrosse teams.

She spoke Wednesday night to a 50-member audience.

Kerry and Dean neck-in-neck

BOSTON (AP) — Two new polls show Democratic presidential candidates John F. Kerry and Howard Dean in a statistical dead heat in Kerry's home state of Massachusetts.

If the Democratic primary were held tomorrow, former Vermont governor Dean would get 23.5 percent of the vote, while Kerry, the Bay State's junior senator, would receive 22.4 percent, the Eagle-Tribune of North Andover reported Sunday. The seven other Democratic contenders were in single digits.

Asked which would be the strongest candidate against President Bush, regardless of preference, 33 percent said Dean is the Democrats' best hope, compared to 19.1 percent for Kerry.

The random telephone poll of Massachusetts voters was conducted between Nov. 12 and 19. A total of 348 registered Democratic and independent eligible to vote in the Massachusetts Democratic primary were polled about which candidate they preferred and which was most likely to beat Bush.

The poll, conducted by Merrimack College's new Center for Public Opinion Research with the Eagle-Tribune Publishing Co., had a margin of error of plus or minus 4.75 percent.

Dean's popularity is bolstered by his combative style, said Russell Mayer, director of the Center for Public Opinion Research at Merrimack College.

"Dean has portrayed himself as a fighter," said Mayer.

Kerry spokeswoman Stephanie Cutter said the campaign doesn't agree with the poll findings.

"It contradicts every piece of evidence we have of John Kerry's support in this state. No one doubts that he will win Massachusetts," she said.

A Boston Globe/WBZ-TV poll released Sunday also showed Kerry and Howard Dean in a close race in Massachusetts. Dean would receive 27 percent of the votes, while Kerry, who has been trying to jump-start his campaign, would receive 24 percent, if the Democratic primary election were held now, according to that survey.

EDITORIAL OPINION

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 2003 EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The long road of a presidential hopeful

In 1960, a debate between presidential hopefuls Richard Nixon and John F. Kennedy did a great deal in swaying public opinion regarding the upcoming election. The first debate between the two men was a decisive victory for the wittier, more comfortable Kennedy, who later went on to defeat his opponent in a landslide election.

Fast forward to 2004, as the public is once again seeing the hopes of a presidential candidate diminish before their very eyes. The candidate is of course Massachusetts' own John Kerry. A long series of mishaps has led Kerry to loose ground in the polls and to even be criticized by the innermost members of his campaign.

It is impossible for any presidential candidate to say or do something and not have it scrutinized to the highest degree, by both the press and the general public. With that in mind, it seems like only second nature for a campaign team not to put their candidate into a situation that will cost him votes. In 1960, after Nixon lost the debate against Kennedy, his team quickly regrouped, and faired much better in the following three debates. It was not enough to win the election, but it was enough to salvage enough public opinion for Nixon to get him elected in later years. Kerry's team has not followed in Nixon's footsteps.

Kerry's first major gaffe was back on Nov. 9, when the grossly unprepared candidate made numerous bewildering comments in regards to President Bush, among other things. The one that stands out the most is, "the road traveled is the prologue to the road to be traveled." How very poignant, Mr. Senator, how very poignant indeed.

But once it was all said and done, one would have expected the campaign team to regroup and put the mishap behind them. Instead, Kerry proceeded to give a disastrous speech in Maine the following night, in which he rambled on and on about a series of disjointed topics. Kerry's aides said that the reason for the poor performance was that the Senator was "overtired." Again, how can a campaign team put their candidate in that position in the first place, and expect him to perform adequately?

Perhaps the biggest mistake Kerry has made so far happened shortly after the Maine incident, when he fired his campaign manager in an inappropriate and untimely fashion (a move that angered many people inside the campaign).

The week later, with his campaign armed with new and supposedly better leadership, Kerry appeared on "The Tonight Show with Jay Leno." On the show, he was upstaged by Triumph the Insult Comic Dog, a dog puppet promoting a record album.

In the past week, Kerry has made yet another change in his campaign focus. His new slogan is "The Real Deal," which is meant to show the new maturity of Kerry's campaign in an attempt to show a new level of seriousness and commitment on Kerry's part. This raises the question, "What has Senator Kerry been doing for the past year, if it has taken him until late November to become a serious contender for the presidency?" With time running out, this latest attempt of Kerry to salvage his campaign and his dignity appears to be nothing more than the latest in a series of mistakes that have ruined this once hopeful candidate.

Carrying out 'black work'

Mark Ostroff

In the weeks to follow, I will be dedicating a part of my column to keep you all informed about the casualty situation in Iraq. As of last Saturday, 426 troops have been killed in Iraq. This is a higher number than the first couple of years of the Vietnam War. And at least 7,898 Iraqi civilians have been killed. It is the intention of the Pentagon to keep the dead as faceless as possible in order to generate apathy among Americans toward the war.

The president has refused to be seen with, salute, or even attend a funeral of a fallen soldier, and the Pentagon has banned the media from displaying their caskets coming off the planes. This has been done so the public can focus on the "good news" in Iraq. I only hope that by looking at names, people will begin to understand that although news on the war may make us feel strong, glorious and patriotic, there is no such thing as "good news."

This week, keep a moment of silence for the following people: Chief Warrant Officer Alexander S. Coulter, 35; Capt. Nathan S. Dalley, 27; Staff Sgt. Dale Panchot, 26; Capt. James A. Shull, 32; Sgt. Michael D. Acklin II, 25; Spc. Ryan T. Baker, 24; Sgt. 1st Class Kelly Bolor, 37; Spc. Jeremy DiGiovanni, 21; Spc. William D. Dusenbery, ; Pfc. Rick Hafer, 21; Sgt. Warren S. Hansen, 36; Pfc. Sheldon R. Hawk Eagle, 21; Sgt. Timothy L. Hayslett, 26; Pfc. Damian L. Heidelberg, 21; Chief Warrant Officer Erik C. Kesterson, 29; 1st Lt. Pierre Piche, 28; Sgt. John W. Russell, 26; Chief Warrant Officer Scott A. Saboe, 33; Spc. John R. Sullivan, 26; Spc. Eugene A. Uhl III, 21; Army Pfc. Joey Whitener, 19; Army 2nd Lt. Jeremy L. Wolfe, 27. May they rest in peace.

"Every man and woman, who cares for freedom owes you a very special measure of gratitude," said Dick Cheney, when he greeted the 21 Gulf War ex-POWs coming home in March of '91. Out of those 21 POWs, 17 of them had been tortured. A lawsuit was filed against Iraq and almost $1 billion was rewarded in damages to the victims, which would come out of frozen Iraq assets. But just like the lip service they got 11 years earlier, the award turned out to be bogus, compliments of the deadbeat-decency of the Bush Administration.

Within the numerous Big Brother provisions of the USA Patriot Act, Bush and company have found a way to curb the compensation of tortured troops. The provision says that any money that is seized becomes government property per executive order, legally implying that it's at the full discretion of Bush as to whether or not these troops get anything.

The troops were ready to settle for a little more than half of the compensation, but, as Bush would say, they're getting "nada."

The money is gone. And all that is left is a primped-up excuse of "foreign policy interests in ensuring a safe and successful transition in Iraq." But, in fact, that money is reserved for something very special and yet, very dark.

The $1 billion, like a lot of other money, has either been unaccounted for or placed into a "contingency budget" — Bushian for "slush-fund." In the new $87 billion hike for Iraq, $9 billion of this money will actually be part of this "contingency budget." The money is to be allocated "anywhere, anytime," and is entirely at the discretion of Donald Rumsfeld.

Rumsfeld, who has streamlined all the money, maintains it will be used to fund "indigenous forces," as well as "rewards" for "cooperative nations." As we are beginning to find out, many of these "cooperative nations," for a price, are willing to carry out what Joseph Stalin used to call, "black work."

For some time now, the US has been shipping "detainees" and "enemy combatants" over to places like Egypt, Jordan, and even Israel. One detainee, a Pakistani man, was reportedly forced by Mossad agents to swallow large quantities of water and even had his genitals burned with cigarettes. In Jordan and Egypt, teeth are ripped out of faces, fingernails are ripped out of fingers, and electric shocks are administered, sometimes to death. The "rewards" for this work come right from Rumsfeld's office in the Pentagon, while America's hands remain clean.

Even American bases like Guantanamo Bay are in the practice of torture-like techniques, which include being forced to stand, squat, or stay awake for days. Detainees are kept under bright lights, as guards bang on cell walls to keep them from dozing off. In Bagram Airbase, Afghanistan, detainees have already died of beatings from their "interrogations." The Red Cross is also restricted from the base.

Recently, a Canadian-Syrian named Mahar Arar was picked up on suspicion of terrorist activity. In his Brooklyn detention center, Arar was injected with a substance that nobody would identify. He was shipped to Syria, where he would be tortured, under a "sub-contract" with the U.S. government. You see, Arar was an "enemy combatant."

Back in 1943, the USSR used to arrest people on charges of being an "enemy of the people." Sixty years later, the Patriot Act gives us the "enemy combatant." As an enemy combatant, you are not entitled to representation or contact with friends or family, you are held indefinitely, and there are no charges against you. In fact, outside of the Justice Department, nobody knows whether or not you're still alive. Like Arar, there is no telling where they might send you. It's amazing what slush-money and the Patriot Act can accomplish.

As of last week, the FBI has begun surveillance on anti-war protesters and "extremist elements." They'll be taking pictures, names and dossiers of ordinary citizens. Could this be the start down the long, dark road of oppression that every other nation imposing such laws has gone?

Many supporters still argue that the Patriot Act and all of its provisions still only apply to fighting terrorism. Believe it if you want to, but even the government laughs at this notion. As of a couple of weeks ago, Justice Department spokesman Mark Corallo admitted, "The Patriot Act was not meant to be just for terrorism." Everyone is fair game under the Patriot Act, and as both Bush's and Rumsfeld's slush funds have proven, they have ways of making you talk.

Giving thanks for everything

Matt Elder

Thursday is Thanksgiving. Luckily for you, I can write about something timely. A few weeks ago, I wrote about the Red Sox loss to the Yankees. Unfortunately, I wrote it about 10 days after game seven. So, in the spirit of the season, it's time for me to write about what I'm thankful for.

I am thankful for ...

A successful long distance relationship. Despite the fact I get asked the question, "is it hard?" more than a guy who popped a Viagra and has an eager wife, everything has more or less worked out throughout the past two and a half years.

Don Zimmer charging Pedro. I hear People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals is thinking of going after Pedro. How dare he treat a gerbil like that? Maybe he should go back to his wheel and do a few more miles before he decides to bawl his eyes out like a baby (or Dick Vermeil). Maybe the 104-year-old will think twice before charging someone half his age and one-third his weight. But at least Zim can store more seeds and grains in his cheeks during these long, harsh winters.

Whoever's idea it was to make (and subsequently sell) the Paris Hilton sex tape. A job well done! Oscar-worthy! The Pamela Anderson tapes came out while the Internet was just getting going. However, Ms. Hilton can expect to see herself on Kazaa for years to, um, come. What are the odds that it was Ron Jeremy on the phone that stopped the act, in night vision, halfway through?

(On the subject, I hope this generation of kids appreciates what is offered to them. They can browse the Internet and see Pamela Anderson doing things that would seriously impair her ability to speak, then with a click of the mouse see Paris Hilton do the same. Damn kids are spoiled I tell you!)

For fast cars, fast parts and next day shipping. As boys grow up into men, they don't lose toys. In fact, they get more toys. The difference is that now they're more expensive. Before it was a Matchbox Car with a supercharger. Now it's a Pontiac Formula with the real thing.

For weekly poker games. Despite the fact I'm a worse gambler than Pete Rose, it's fun to lose $10 while thinking about nothing and complaining about everything.

For the fact that my backpack cannot be called a book bag because it has seen exponentially more keg cups, beer bottles and cans than it has books.

Have a safe and happy Thanksgiving!

LETTER FROM THE EDITOR

It has come to the attention of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian that a source used by a Collegian columnist may have been fabricated — although not by our writer.

The source in question is the "Letter to an Anti-Zionist Friend" by Martin Luther King, Jr., which was referenced in the Collegian column "A Call for a Jewish State" on Nov. 17.

After an extensive Internet search, The Collegian has decided it is probable that the source is indeed false.

According to the Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America (www.camera.org), the King letter is a hoax. Supposedly originally printed in a 1967 issue of the Saturday Review, CAMERA could find no reference to the letter before 1999, when it appeared in the book "Shared Dreams," by Rabbi Marc Shneler — a book with a preface written by Martin Luther III. Since then, the King letter in question has been printed in numerous places.

The Collegian stands firm that the columnist did not knowingly cite a potentially fabricated source in her column. In addition, the spirit of the column's argument remains intact: it has been chronicled that King made comments with similar themes in a lecture to a crowd at Harvard.

The Collegian remains dedicated to its commitment to show the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and all other political debates from many points of view.

Sincerely,

Dan Lamothe

SGA ROUNDTABLE

The Student Government Association's second Diversity Roundtable of the year is today at 3 p.m. in Campus Center room 163C. While the last roundtable was an open forum to discuss general campus issues, this roundtable will focus more closely on the issues of admissions, retention and financial aid. Given the recent Supreme Court rulings and the resulting changes in University admissions policies, it is important that we come together as a community to talk about our goals and ideas for cultivating a diverse student population.

It is my hope that we will be able to cover not only upcoming changes in the University's affirmative action program but also the overall issue of diversity in the admissions process and in retention programs.

The last roundtable was incredibly useful and productive for those involved. Students, faculty, staff and administrators came together to talk about their concerns, suggestions and questions about diversity issues in the University community. Among the many issues that were raised, a few of the more prominent were those of the University's financial and physical accessibility, campus culture and climate, admissions and retention, and programmatic availability in light of state budget cuts.

While the roundtable is not a policy-formulating body (i.e. it will not be issuing decisions or voting on policy), it is an excellent opportunity for various members of the community to meet one another and talk about areas of common concern. Student will have the opportunity to sit down with decision-making administrators and share their concerns; administrators will be able to hear directly from students.

I encourage anyone interested in these issues to attend the roundtable discussion on Monday. If you have any questions, please feel free to contact me at rplato@student.umass.edu.

A CALL FOR ACTION

Tuesday's ruling on gay marriage by the Massachusetts Supreme Court marks the beginning of a 180-day journey to a historic juncture. Your state legislators must either legalize gay marriage in some form or amend the state Constitution to prohibit it. They now stand in the position to decide, more or less once and for all, whether Massachusetts will recognize gay relationships or sweep them under a policy rug, whether it will reward committed couples or encourage promiscuity.

Even if you had never planned to exercise your rights as Massachusetts residents, I urge you to do so now. Write to state legislators and encourage them to legalize gay marriage. Emphasize that domestic partnerships will not do. Such arrangements undermine the institution of marriage by presenting couples with ways to formalize their relationship without the huge and important commitment that usually comes with marriage.

It needs to be all or nothing. Halfway is more a problem than a solution.

I was recently reminded that one of the major advantages of our Federalist system is the freedom it gives states to experiment with different policies. Seen in this way, states are laboratories where creative solutions to social problems can be tested out.

The possibility of gay marriage in Massachusetts represents an opportunity to try one such solution. I have faith that its legalization will not wreak havoc on the institution of family. On the other hand, it just might give other states a model for strengthening their commitment to commitment.

THE REAL WRONG

Thomas Naughton's column, "The Religious Wrong" openly perpetuates the hate and hypocrisy that he so ardently decries. To lump all participants in organized religion as "hollow, bigoted, marketed, hypocritical, sexist, homophobic and strangling," as Naughton does, reveals his own involvement in the worst form of prejudice — the same injustice which he denounces. That is, Naughton shows a penchant towards gross generalization, and a fundamental disrespect towards the individualism that he propounds.

Naughton, like many of our contemporaries, forgets that an organization is defined by its constituents, not its leaders, and certainly not by its fanatics.

I am a Catholic, a Catholic who advocates gay marriage, feminism, the pro-choice lobby, women in the priesthood, and the clerical right to marriage. I am a Catholic who believes that anyone can grow as close to God as the pope himself. Most importantly, I respect the differences of others and I do not force my religion on them.

One might ask why or how it is I can still call myself a Catholic, or why it is I choose to associate myself with one of the most despotic organizations in human history. I call myself a Catholic for the same reasons that I call myself an American, a United States citizen; that is, I may not agree with the actions of the leaders of this country, but that does not detract from my citizenship. If anything, my disagreements call me to greater action, and that is because I agree with the ideals that this country was sworn to uphold. And for that same reason, I am a Catholic, for at the heart of that ideology is love. Love and infinite generosity, for love is sufficient unto love, even if you say, as a friend once said to me, "Love. Generosity — where is that?" To him, it was a statement, not a question, as it is to me.

The newly opened Amherst Crepes brings Mediterranean cuisine to the Pioneer Valley. Students from the Five College area can enjoy an assortment of crepes, coffee and more.

By Ikaika C. Arnado
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Nedzana Huseinovic, with a sincere smile, served the couple their order. The well-dressed gentlemen smiled back, then, graciously took the food to the table. His date was admiring the Chesapeake-sunset-yellow walls, low hanging light fixtures, and the hand-made pine counters of the restaurant. After glancing at the dish her eyes lit up. "I love crepes," the women said.

Amherst Crepes, 197 North Pleasant Street, opened on Sunday. The Mediterranean flavored café/restaurant has a large assortment of crepes, fresh roast coffees, espresso, lattes, mochas, teas and soups.

The family that opened the restaurant wanted to contribute a new and unique flavor to the Five College Area's vast array of cosmopolitan restaurants and eateries. They agreed that crepes would add a "Mediterranean Ambience" that is widespread in Europe.

"My mother used to have a restaurant back in Bosnia," Armin Huseinovic, co-owner and operator of the restaurant, said. "What we have here is a wide selection of crepes that are very common in all the house holds in Bosnia. In America you have pancakes, we have crepes."

The restaurant has a large variety of crepes available to fulfill any customer's appetite. Sweet dessert crepes are made with the fresh fruits served with nutella, or plum butter, jam or another type of sweet spread.

"The best [desert dish is] nutiella and strawberry," Armin said.

If it is a robust lunch one is looking for, the restaurant serves savory crepes like Goat Cheese with Mushrooms and Sun Dried Tomatoes, and Honey Roasted Turkey with Cranberry Sauce.

"We have 10 different kinds of cheese," Adi Husenovic, co-owner of the restaurant said. "Right now we have about eight different types of meats ... from chicken, to turkey, to proscuitto, to ham, pork, beef."

The crepe is originally from France. Over time it diffused to the rest of Europe.

"They're French cuisine, French pastry basically. It started as a desert and then went on," Adi said.

But the Huseinovics are not planning on sticking to the traditional French crepe.

"We're trying not to make it too French. It is a French thing, but it's more concentrated, we wanted to do Mediterranean taste," Adi said.

The Huseinovics put hard work into building Amherst Crepes. They did all the renovations to the restaurant themselves.

"[The restaurant] would probably cost someone who is not a hands-on person a 100 to a 150,000 dollars," Armin said. "It cost us maybe half of that because we did all the work. Everything you see here is hand made from that table to that bar, the counters, the bathroom — everything."

The Huseinovics also plan to exhibit local artists. It will add an aesthetic essence, and local artists will have a place to showcase and sell their work.

"We're going to use local artists, and of course if we have people from the University of Massachusetts, Hampshire college, or whoever [wants] to have the spot for whatever exhibit," Adi said. "The main purpose of [the artists'] stuff being here is because they want to sell it."

The restaurant is not fully completed. For the spring, the Huseinovic's are planning to replace the front windows with glass doors that can open, and add an outdoor patio.

"I'm thinking about ... a beach hut style on the top, which is not really [like] the French Rivera, but it will give it that summery feel," Adi said.

Some customers look forward to the upcoming renovations.

But for the most part people are happy with the new restaurant.

"I enjoyed my crepe," said Lauren Dresch, a junior sociology major from UMass. "I had the fresh apples and brie, it was delicious."

Deftones bring rock to Worcester

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

WORCESTER — If the Deftones have proven one thing in nearly 10 years of releasing albums and touring the country, it is that music can be loud, harsh and abrasive while still being melodic and beautiful. It's a shame that while the Deftones are finally beginning to get the mainstream success they deserve, they must deal with the audience that they attract. Note to drunken, belligerent frat-boys and metalheads: Just because the Deftones play thunderous music, that at times deals with anger and frontman Chino Moreno is quick to let out a throat-scraping scream, does not mean the Deftones make mindless mosh music. These "fans" are likely the same guys ruining other concerts, like the generic college guy at a Dave Matthews Band concert that gets so trashed he vomits all over the person next to him.

Deftones
Palladium
Nov. 17

At Deftones concerts though, they just stupidly and meaninglessly swing their limbs about, hitting anything that gets in their way. If someone wants to pay $25 to take his shirt off and participate in the most undeniably homoerotic activity he can find on this side of Fight Club good for him — he can have his mosh pit — but there is no reason to ruin the show for everyone that just wants to be up close to the band.

Luckily even the meatiest of the meatheads couldn't ruin the Deftones stunning performance at the Palladium in Worcester Monday night. The Deftones are notoriously hit-or-miss with their live performances; the band sometimes has a bit too many "substances" before hitting the stage resulting in forgotten lyrics, incoherent screaming, insane rambling, poor musical timing and, at its worst, the inability to synchronize. Luckily for fans the Deftones not only managed to refrain from being noticeably wasted, they also appeared to be — believe it or not — sober!

Moreno and the band had a few minor slip-ups, though. During "Digital Bath" Moreno, playing guitar as he occasionally

'The Cat in the Hat'

Translating written text to the screen is not an easy task. In the case of the "The Cat in the Hat" it takes creative expertise to extend a 20-some-odd page children's book to over an hour-long feature film. While remaining quite true to the unique visual detail captured by the original story book version, Mike Myer's twisted, perverted sense of humor is omnipresent throughout "The Cat in the Hat" and causes the viewer to wonder who in the audience this film is directed at, child or parent.

According to www.seuss.org, Theodore Seuss Geisel was born in 1904, a native to the city of Springfield, Mass. He attended Dartmouth College and then went on to Oxford where he received his doctorate in literature. The idea for "The Cat in the Hat" originated in 1954, when a "Life" magazine article claimed a devastating rise in child illiteracy. Seuss and his publisher devised a list of 220 words that they felt were essential for a child's vocabulary and Seuss wrote and illustrated "The Cat in the Hat."

Seuss's story was aimed at was young children, beginning readers aged four to seven. Why then is a book that was clearly intended for such a young age bracket, rated PG for the big screen? And does it matter? These questions lie at the forefront of the critical debate that erupted following the film's release in theaters on Friday afternoon.

Some parents are overjoyed that the kids' film has plenty of "hidden from the children" meanings, which allows the parents to enjoy the film alongside their kids. What began perhaps with "Shrek" was a mutual understanding between parents and studio execs that a day at the movies with the kiddies should not be pure candy coated, 'tra la la'-type torture.

Other not-so-happy parents are disgusted with Universal Studios for the perverse adaptation of the beloved children's classic. They were horrified by the implicit meanings in the film that their children may, or may not, have understood. These parents seem to believe that the theater-going experience with a youngster is enjoyable simply because the child is having a grand ol' time. The adult likes and interests are put on hold and the children's needs come first.

Perhaps the most discussed scene of questionable nature is when The Cat, played by Myers, picks up a framed picture of Sally (Dakota Fanning) and Conrad's (Spencer Breslin) mother and the picture folds out to what can only be interpreted as a centerfold-like picture.

Parents that enjoy this scene defend it with the claim that if your child at age 4-8 can decipher the implicit meaning of the fold out picture, than this is a result of bad, inattentive parenting. The child should not be able to pick up on these meanings at such a young age. If children get the same meanings adults do that means that somewhere along the road they were exposed to this sort of material and that is just sick and twisted.

Parents that were appalled by this scene argue that they brought their kid to a movie expecting it to be fairly innocent and then had to leave the does, stopped the song because he felt that Chi Cheng's bass was too loud. Guitarist Stef Carpenter seemed to encounter technical difficulties with his guitar going out during the intro to the fan-favorite "Be Quiet And Drive (Far Away)" but the band recovered perfectly.

While these were obvious mistakes, it would be nit-picky and unappreciative to focus on them. The fact is that The Deftones are at a stage in their career where they could carry on playing only their big hits, pandering to the crowd, and making generic, boring music and still cash in — but they insist on remaining one of the most original, talented, and forceful bands in hard music today.

Not only was the band musically tight but their performance was extremely high in energy: Moreno was bouncing around the stage, running over to drummer Abe Cunningham's kit and back to the crowd, leaning over the worshipping fans. Cheng was swinging his bass around him and whipping his long hair in every direction.

The Deftones played very fan-pleasing set that focused on their whole career not just the new album — this past spring's self-titled disc. In fact the focus of the set seemed to be 1997's "Around The Fur," arguably the band's finest moment.

The band showcased their more aggressive side with the songs "Bored" and the rarely played "Root" from their 1995 debut "Adrenaline," and played a handful of songs from 1999's "White Pony," including their greatest hit to date, "Change," and the beautiful, atmospheric "Digital Bath." It was during "Digital Bath" that the angry moshing-mentality manifested itself in the worst possible way. The song is one of the Deftones' calmest and downbeat tracks and yet morons still felt compelled to push, shove and disrupt the atmosphere of the show. Although the Deftones cover their songs in a wall of de-tuned, noisy guitars, it doesn't mask the beauty of the music. Moreno's heartfelt lyrics and powerful delivery is the focus of the songs and, underneath the walls of feedback, there are definitive and well-conceived instrumental parts that demonstrate talent and thought.

That is, in fact, the biggest crime committed in the mosh-heavy action at a Deftones show. While the audience members are a living, breathing advertisement for evolution the band onstage is breathtaking and, despite their hard rock reputation, one of the most emotional and melodic bands in present day rock music. The Deftones presented themselves in top form at the Palladium whether the audience fully appreciated the true exquisiteness that many of the bands fans see or were simply looking for a testosterone release.

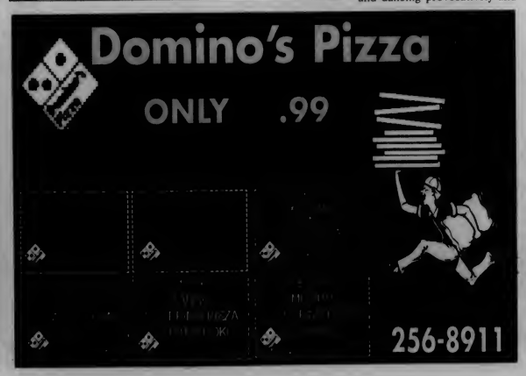
movie avoiding all sorts of uncomfortable questions that no four year old child should have to deal with the answers to. 'Mommy why does that picture fold out?' Just like Mike Myers says to the kids after the picture unfolds and he discovers it is the mother — "awkward."

Another defense for the film is that if it is rated PG than a parent should have the common sense to educate themselves on why the movie was rated as such and then decide whether or not the child is capable or old enough to watch it. This defense is somewhat ludicrous. If a child's favorite book in the whole world is "The Cat in the Hat" then how can a parent be expected to deny the kid the opportunity to see this film on the marvelous big screen? It would appear cruel and overprotective to the child.

Several scenes in the film are solely directed at teenagers and young adults. There is a rave scene, where the two young kids Sally and Conrad are ushered into an underground party. The "party kids" are wearing Cat in the Hat hats and dancing provocatively and then the horror of all horrors Paris Hilton appears virtually out of nowhere in a tiny tummy shirt and flirts with The Cat.

Is this a kid's film or a twisted deviant's daydream? Who but young adults and teenagers will recognize socialite Paris Hilton, who has recently become front-page material in the gossip columns for illegal sales of an intimate videotape of her and ex-boyfriend Rick Solomon. What kind of role model is this? Should children everywhere turn to their parents and say, "I want to be like her when I grow up," it will surely be a parents' worst nightmare come true.



An actor of Mike Myers caliber certainly has some control over the roles he plays and a studio of Universal's caliber clearly has control over the projects they produce. With that in mind both Universal and Myers should be ashamed of themselves. To turn a children's' book into a collage of adult vs. child themes is a selfish marketing tactic. It is obvious that the producers wanted to score a few extra bucks from whatever audience demographic they could possibly target and so they targeted everyone.

Despite the controversy over the film, "The Cat in the Hat" remains primarily a story for and about children ... young children. Dr. Seuss created the story to help kids read. The only thing this film will help children do is to blindly face the harsh reality that this is an adult world, with little time for children's stories. Confusing nuances that will go right over their heads stifle the child's imagination and the audience will strangely be filled with only adult laughter.

UM takes finale

Steve Baylark led the way on the ground for UMass, as the sophomore ran for 116 yards and a touchdown on 26 carries. Raunny Rosario, seeing his first significant action since a knee injury in week one, carried 11 times for 58 yards while Rich Demers chipped in with 45 yards on six carries.

For the Rams (4-8, 2-6 A-10), Jerell Jones paced the rushing attack with 84 yards on just five carries, while three players — Luther Green, Wendall Williams and quarterback Jayson Davis — eclipsed 60 yards carrying the football.

Davis also completed five of his seven passes for 99 yards and a touchdown.

Trailing 31-7, the Rams tacked on a score just before halftime when Davis found Keith Brown with a 40-yard scoring strike to narrow the edge to 31-14 heading into the intermission.

Rhody got on the board early in the second frame, as all-conference kicker Shane Laisle made the score 31-17 with a 33-yard field foal at the 12:23 mark of the third quarter, however that marked all the scoring for both teams in what was a defensive second half.

"We were only able to score three points in the second half and I want to credit UMass for that," Rhode Island coach Tim Stowers said. "I hope UMass goes a long way representing the Atlantic 10 and plays for a national championship."

"Our defense knew Jeff was out and they just really picked it up," Whipple added. "We caught up with their speed in the second half and played more of a field position game.

"We got out in front early and just did what we needed to do down the stretch, and that's a credit to our kids. They played hard and knew that if they did, they could win a championship today."

UMass found its offensive groove early, as Baylark made the score 7-0 with a 5-yard touchdown run just 3:21 into the game.

The Maroon and White then doubled their edge when wide receiver Jason Peebler hauled in a 28-yard scoring toss from Krohn to push the lead to 14-0.

URI cut the Minutemen's lead in half at 14-7 midway through the first quarter when Calvin Poole found paydirt from nine yards out. After recovering an attempted onside kick by the Rams, however, UMass answered just 1:02 later as Demers took off on a 30 yard touchdown jaunt to cap a short three-play, 39-yard drive to make the score 21-7.

A Michael Torres field goal made the score 24-7 with just under seven minutes remaining in the first half, and then Peebler upped the edge to 31-7 with a 10 yard touchdown reception from Krohn.

Freshman Christian Koegel, who has averaged 39.1 yards per punt this season, had one of his finest performances of the year Saturday, averaging 47.5 yards on four punts, with a long of 57. Koegel earned Rookie of the Week honors from the Atlantic 10 for his efforts.

The Minutemen will travel to Hamilton, N.Y. Saturday to play Colgate (12-0) in the first round of the Division I-AA playoffs.

Minutemen were robbed

That brings us to Montana. The Grizzlies are 9-3, and have not only scheduled a D-II this season, they've lost to one (25-24 to North Dakota State). They're also coming off of a bitter loss to rival Montana State this weekend, with the Big Sky Conference title on the line.

So why, again, are they hosting 8-3 Western Illinois?

Very simply, Wayne Hogan is the chairman of the NCAA I-AA Football Committee, entrusted with selecting the 16-team field, and he also happens to be the athletic director at Montana. So not only do the Grizzlies have a home game despite boasting more losses than four of the teams that will travel in round one — including UMass — they will most likely host round two as well if they advance and the Minutemen knock off Colgate.

"I think Wayne Hogan, the guy at Montana, set the whole thing up," Whipple said. "When they get behind closed doors these things happen ... they get to do what they want to do. Anything the NCAA has to do has always got some kind of taint on it."

So how did A-10 selection committee representative Jim Miller let this happen? Did the Richmond athletic director fight for the Minutemen, or did he passively shrug off what was utter disrespect directed towards his own conference?

And where was Linda Bruno? As commissioner of the A-10 itself, does it not bother her to see one of her conference's premier institutions publicly defamed like this?

"I want to know what Jim Miller has to say, and I want to know what Linda Bruno has to say. I think Jim Miller did a poor job for the Atlantic 10, that's what I've heard all the way along," Whipple said. "Our league is the toughest league in the country. We win nine games in our league, and we don't get a chance to play at home? It's ridiculous."

Needless to say, nothing can be done. If these Minutemen want to win a National Title, they will have to be road warriors, much like they were in 1998. But that, however, does not change the fact that what a group of stuffy administrators did to this football team was atrocious, and these young men that have persevered for three long months to put together what has truly been an amazing season are the ones left to feel the effects.

TV, Americans miss NHL's outdoor classic

Andrew Merritt

The Montreal Canadiens picked up two points Saturday night, with a 4-3 win over Edmonton. But that's not even close to the story. Still, you'd be fooled if you only paid attention to American media.

See, the Habs defeated the Oilers in front of 57,167 people. You're not going to find a crowd like that in just any NHL arena, but rather in Edmonton's Commonwealth Stadium. That's right, Stadium, as in outdoors.

Unless you're a serious hockey fan, you might have missed this whole deal. But the idea was to have two NHL teams play a game outside, bringing back the heritage and culture of hockey's beginnings. It was an old-fashioned game of shinny between some of the greatest players on earth. But you didn't see it.

That's because the American networks, in their infinite wisdom, decided that more Americans would be interested in the gamut of college football games — granted, it was rivalry week, so the sports networks get a semi-reprieve — and such must-watch TV as "Entertainment Tonight" (CBS), "Las Vegas" (NBC), and something called "Eloise at Christmastime," which of course aired on "The Network of Champions," ABC. Which championship trophy Eloise won, I'm not sure, since I missed all two hours of the Julie Andrews-induced exhilaration.

So unless you bought NHL's Center Ice package for the satellite dish — not exactly applicable in the dorms — or are, in fact, living in Canada, you missed the whole thing, including the chance to see Wayne Gretzky, Guy LaFleur, and Grant Fuhr strap 'em on one more time for the "MegaStars" prelude.

It's also very possible you don't care, and will stop reading after this sentence. But there are plenty of people who would have loved to see this game (count me among them), but didn't because America just won't accept hockey. Without going into the exhausted "this is the fastest sport on earth" arguments — it is, dontcha know — it seems ridiculous that there was no broadcast below the 49th parallel, when there are plenty of puckheads who would have loved to see the heroes of today and yesterday play outdoors.

There was minimal postgame coverage on ESPN, and even that was sandwiched in with the highlights from all the games you just saw on ESPN anyway.

But the networks aren't the only ones to blame here. The NHL is suffering from a number of things, but chief among those is a lack of fan morale. Outside of the diehards, very few people are attracted to hockey these days. It's a slower product, with less scoring, and the superstars and owners can't seem to get a grip on the fact that it's all about the fans, not the money they get for the games.

Hockey is No. 4 among the major sports because the NHL hasn't capitalized on the good things about the game. One of the more exciting times in NHL history could have been the late '90s, but the 1994-95 work stoppage prevented all that.

This is just the next example. Someone, somewhere had the fantastic idea to bring the game outside, as had been done for a college game in 2001, when Michigan and Michigan State played in front of nearly 75,000 people at State's Spartan Stadium. The NHL's ice expert, Dan Craig, devised a way to make a hockey rink work on the crowned stadium surface, and the participants and crowd devised a way not to freeze their behinds off. The best image of the day was Montreal's Jose Theodore, who had a Canadiens toque — complete with fuzzy ball of yarn on the top — stretched over his goalie mask to keep warm.

But the NHL didn't work out TV rights. Nobody thought that maybe the circus that was the entire day would be a good way to sell the NHL here in the States. Of course, Commissioner Gary Bettman and his staff will pump the All-Star game in Minnesota, but the meaningless exhibition doesn't cut it anymore. The Heritage Classic could have given new life to the NHL as a viable sports product. Instead, Canadiens and those fortunate enough to have the Center Ice package saw it, and that was about it.

It might seem ridiculous that a game could be so interesting, but it was more than just another night in the NHL. It was about the heritage of the world's greatest game (bring on the e-mails), a reminder of the spirit of the game, which has nothing to do with ticket sales, luxury boxes or the Collective Bargaining Agreement, and everything to do with the 57,167 people in the stands — as well as some of the players, like Montreal's Jose Theodore — bundled up in coats and toques watching their national sport with passion.

It's really too bad. Capitalizing on the possibilities of bringing the Heritage Classic to the American market would have been the first really smart move the NHL has made in a long time. Instead, hardly anyone in the US will remember the historic game, and the game won't convert any new followers.

Two hundred and ninety-five days until the CBA runs out, they better save the game soon.

Rough start for Minutewomen

GERALD H. LING/COLLEGIAN

Edris Bailey was one of few bright spots for the Minutewomen yesterday, scoring 21 points in a 68-63 loss to Holy Cross.

thought we did that," Gibbons said.

Leading the way for Holy Cross was Maggie Fontana, who ended the night with 20 points, including four clutch free throws nearing the end of regulation.

UMass did well defending against the all-Patriot League guard as she was held to only seven points in the first half. Fontana was coming off of lateral meniscus surgery, which was performed three weeks ago.

Her injury didn't seem to be a factor in the second half, as her aggressive play earned her a team high six trips to the line. Her 12 points from the charity stripe helped a second half rally that put the game just out of reach for the Minutewomen.

"The key thing to the game is we got the ball to the basket and we got to foul line and we outscored them 18-7 from the foul line," Gibbons said. "That's huge in a game like that when teams are playing tough aggressive defense."

One major foul came late in the half when Bailey was put back in the game with four personals to her name. Fontana faked a shot and Bailey took the bid, fouled Fontana for a one-and-one, and put herself out of the game.

Despite the loss, Dacko was pleased with her team's performance. The Minutewomen stepped up their game significantly against a solid, seasoned program.

"I'm extremely pleased, my focus has been improvement and I've got to stay with the whole game and season plan for getting ready for the future," Dacko said, "I want to win but these kids have got to learn it and I can't put the cart before the horse."

Sacred Heart was a wakeup call for the Minutewomen. Dacko knew that her team was a bit nervous, as several of her players had yet to compete at the college level.

"I think at Sacred Heart we were frightened," Dacko said, "There were kids that never played and had game legs and no control."

Part of the problem was that the Minutewomen let Sacred Heart dictate the momentum of the game. As opposed to its game against Holy Cross, UMass only had one player in double digits, with Tamara Tatham scoring 10.

The Pioneers were looking for vengeance after last year's 74-48 dismantling at the Mullins Center. The play was aggressive the entire game, and the young Minutewoman squad was forced to adjust to that level of play.

"The first game the kids were coming off and saying, 'they're pinching me, they're gabbing me,' and you know what? It's fair play," Dacko said. "It's a growing process I told them to be more aggressive, I told them to dive for every loose ball and they responded in a good way. If they're going to pinch, then pinch back."

Next up for UMass is a trip to Syracuse Tuesday night for a 7 p.m. clash with the Orangewomen.

to rotate around Howard's net. But before he got behind the cage, he slipped the puck back to Solon, who was charging towards the crease. The sophomore from Acton slid a wrister under Howard, and put most of the 6,044 in attendance on their feet.

Although the crowd numbered over 1,000 less than the one that showed up to the Nov. 14 game against Boston College, it was significantly louder.

After Solon's tally, Maine began to storm Winer's net, and hit two posts. But the Black Bears couldn't put one past the sophomore from Stoughton until 19:18 of the second, when the wall he had built sprung a leak.

Michelle Leveille sent a beautiful mid-ice pass to Moore, who went in alone on Winer and fired a high wrister from the top of the faceoff circles, knotting the game and taking away some of the momentum the Minutemen had enjoyed during the middle frame.

"I'm happy with the way we played," Maine coach Tim Whitehead said. "I think a point on the road against [UMass] is a hard-fought point. We played hard, and we fought hard to earn the tie, it was a good effort."

It was the first meeting of the two teams since last season's Hockey East quarterfinal, where the Minutemen swept Maine in Orono to gain the team's first-ever berth in the Hockey East semifinal.

Other than Moore's tally, Winer was stellar, turning aside all manner of attempts, including a penalty shot. Peter Trovato covered up a puck in the crease as the Black Bears swarmed, giving Colin Shields an unabated shot at what would have been the tying goal at 3:18 of the second. But Shields fired a low wrist shot that Winer stopped easily to hold the lead and spark the Minutemen for the majority of the second period.

"Trovato caught the puck, and wasn't too sure what to do with it once he had it, and he was in the crease," Winer said. "When I saw Shields was taking it, he's a really good shooter, so I knew he was going to try to beat me for the shot, so I just tried to cut down the angle as much as I could and make him try to beat me out of my crease."

While Howard wasn't tested quite as rigorously, he was very capable in turning away the chances the Minutemen came up with, including a pair during the tension-filled five minutes of overtime.

As well as his team has performed, Cahoon is reluctant to place it among the ranks of the elite in Hockey East.

"I think you've got to do it for another four or five years, then I'll say we're up there. We're still pursuing that group. I'm real happy with the direction our team is heading in, but they've got flags hanging in their rink, they've got Hockey East trophies on the shelves up there. When we've got a few of those, I'll say we're with them."

Notes: Junior Greg Mauldin was absent from the lineup for the third straight game. He is nursing a leg injury, and has been described as day-to-day, with the possibility of returning for Tuesday night's game against Vermont at the Mullins Center ... The Minutemen have held opponents to under 30 shots for 16 consecutive games.

"Better early than late, though."

Sophomore forward Rashaun Freeman led the Maroon and White with 17 points in his second collegiate game. He was named Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week for his efforts.

All-Big 12 candidate Andre Emmett led Tech with 18 points, while point guard Jarrius Jackson and forward Robert Tomaszek both chipped in with 16 apiece. Devonne Giles also poured in 11 points for the Raiders.

Bobby Knight's squad opened the game up in the first half when it scored on five consecutive possessions to make the score 34-19 with 3:56 remaining. UMass cut the lead to 34-24 with just under three minutes remaining in the frame, but Tech went on to score the last eight points of the half to take a 42-24 edge into the intermission.

"We had good defense in both halves," Knight said. "When you get away and you score, and there gets to be a big margin between two teams, it's pretty easy for a team to get sloppy and give up points."

The Red Raiders put an exclamation point on their lopsided victory when Emmett caught and dunked an alley-oop to make the score 61-30 midway through the second half.

Tech then opened up its largest lead of the game at the 2:44 mark when a LucQuenie White layup gave the Red Raiders an 87-42 cushion.

After a horrendous first half shooting in which they connected on only nine of 24 field goal attempts, UMass picked up right where it left off in the second half, finishing at 20-for-61 in the field against a stifling Tech defense.

"It's impossible to simulate what they do, because what you don't see on tape that you used to see when you live scouted is how athletic they are," Lappas said. "We have some athletic guys, but we also have some guys where the only way they can learn is to get out there on the court.

"I hope we learn something from this. We'll grow from it, but it was a real lesson."

"The Steve Lappas Radio Show," which was previously held at the Hangar Pub and Grill during the past two seasons, has been moved to the Campus Center's Blue Wall Pub. It will take place from 7 to 8 p.m. every Monday night, and will be broadcast live on 100.9 FM WRNX.

Hosted by "the voice of the Minutemen," Bob Behler, and featuring former coach and current radio color analyst Jack Leaman, the show includes Lappas' commentary on both past and upcoming games, as well as player interviews and giveaways.

The Blue Wall will be offering an all-you-can-eat buffet for $10 during the show, and included in the cost will be a parking voucher for parking during the show in the Campus Center parking garage.

Students can enjoy the buffet during the show by using one swipe on their YCMP plan.

"We're excited about having the coach's show on campus so the students can really be a part of it," interim athletic director Thorr Bjorn said. "In having it at an off-campus place that serves alcohol, certain students weren't always able to attend in the past, whereas now we're hoping that the students will come out and offer their support."

"This is a good opportunity for people to come out and interact with coach Lappas and some of the players," Behler said. "It gives students the chance to hear what's going on with the team, and to enjoy the show and the food."

The next Lappas show at the Blue Wall will be Monday, Dec. 1 beginning at 7 p.m.

One for the road

Playoff picks are a travesty

Mike Marzelli

Robbed.

There is just no other way to describe what was done to the Massachusetts football team yesterday afternoon, unless the word "joke" is somehow involved.

A day after setting school records for most regular season wins and most conference wins in a single season, as well as securing their Atlantic 10-record 19th conference championship, Mark Whipple's Minutemen were told they would not be returning to Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium for the first round of the Division I-AA playoffs on Saturday.

Yes, you read that correctly. The team that won nine games in the most competitive I-AA league in the country and can count a 38-7 loss to potential Big 12 champion Kansas State and a heartbreaking 51-45 triple overtime setback at No. 2 Delaware as its only two blemishes on the season, was deemed not worthy of a home playoff game.

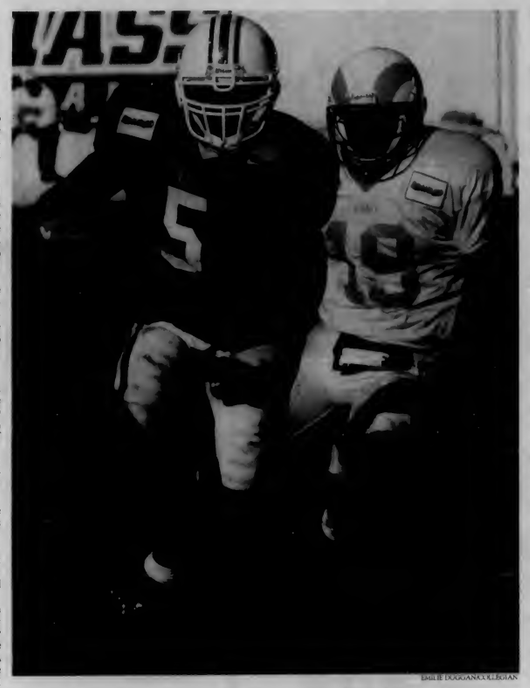
Instead, they will be traveling west to Hamilton, N.Y. for a first-round date with Colgate. At 12-0, the Raiders boast the nation's longest winning streak at 19 games, and are surely deserving of a home game in their own right, but not at the expense of Massachusetts.



"I think it's a travesty for the kids, I think it's just ridiculous," Whipple said. "Our fan base, our band, our people here, we deserve to play at McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

"Eight teams get home playoff berths, how can we not be one of them? We won nine of our last 10, that's at least what we deserve."

So now that it's quite clear that the selection committee in charge of formulating the I-AA bracket believes UMass is not one of the top eight teams in I-AA, despite being in the top seven in every national ranking since Oct. 5, who is?

Among schools hosting first round games, Northern Iowa has one more I-AA loss than UMass, while Bethune-Cookman is currently rated eight spots below the Maroon and White in the polls, and has one more loss at the I-AA level. Western Kentucky has three I-AA losses, and are currently rated three spots behind the Maroon and White in the polls with two Division II schools on their schedule.

UM beats URI, will travel to face Colgate

For the Massachusetts football team, 2003 has been a season that requires many words to describe. However after defeating Rhode Island 31-17 at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium on Saturday, only one is needed.

Champions.

After a school-record 10 regular season wins and eight conference victory, as well as the program's first ever 7-0 record at home, the Minutemen are champions of the Atlantic 10 for the 19th time — the most for any team in league history.

URI	17

"This was a solid game for us," Whipple said. "Our offense played really well in the first half and the defense played well in the second half. Overall it's a great win and it's always good to win a championship."

"[A championship] means a lot," defensive lineman Valdamar Brower said. " ... Last season was a teasing season, so it's good to get it done this year."

UMass (10-2, 8-1 A-10), which will surprisingly be on the road at Colgate in the first round of the I-AA playoffs, shares the A-10 title with Delaware, who was a 20-17 winner over Villanova. The Blue Hens (10-1, 8-1 A-10) will receive the conference's automatic bid on the strength of their 51-45 triple overtime win over the Maroon and White.

One matter of concern for coach Mark Whipple, however, was the health of quarterback Jeff Krohn. The senior tri-captain left the game with a head injury in favor of Steve Howell, and did not return.

Krohn is expected to be back when UMass travels to Colgate.

"We just couldn't take a chance with him," Whipple said. "He was fine, a little fuzzy but everybody was telling me to take him out.

"He's going to be OK."

The Minutemen scored on each of their first five possessions, and their 21 points in the first quarter is the most they've scored in a single period all season. Krohn was 15-of-24 for 219 yards, two touchdown passes and one interception.

No revenge for Maine in tie at Mullins

The Massachusetts hockey team took a big step towards solidifying its spot among the Hockey East elite Friday. But it didn't come easy.

The Minutemen skated to a 1-1 draw with the Maine Black Bears in the teams' first rematch since UMass' shocking sweep of Maine in the Hockey East quarterfinals last March. James Solon scored his second goal of the season to give UMass (8-2-1, 5-2-1 Hockey East) an early edge, but Greg Moore countered with a laser wrist shot late in the second period to knot things up.

The goaltenders became the story, as UMass' Gabe Winer kept things quite clean other than Moore's goal, and Jimmy Howard was solid for the Black Bears (10-2-1, 5-2-1 HEA), though he didn't have to make a large number of difficult stops. Deservedly, both goalies were named to the three stars list.

"Gabe came up huge, the game could have been over in the first 15 minutes, and we have to thank Gabe for reading the situation so well," UMass coach Don Cahoon said of his sophomore netminder.

Thanks to Winer, the Minutemen escaped the first period with the lead, despite playing "scrambled eggs," according to Cahoon. His net protection also allowed Solon to open up the scoring. Stephen Werner streaked up the left wing boards, and went

UMass swept in opening weekend

It wasn't the best way to start the season for the Massachusetts women's basketball team.

In its first weekend series of the season, the Maroon and White dropped games to Sacred Heart and Holy Cross and came away with more questions than answers.

UMass	63

Yesterday, the Minutewomen dropped a 68-63 decision to the Crusaders in a game that had all the makings of an upset. A lack of experience plus consistent foul trouble kept the game just out of reach for UMass.

The Maroon and White, which was coming off an ugly 61-46 loss at Sacred Heart, played an aggressive man-to-man defense against a much bigger Holy Cross team.

The game was kept within reach behind the offensive explosion of junior college transfer Edris Bailey, who had 21 points on the evening. Bailey shot 10-for-13 and scored 13 of her team's 28 points in the first half.

"She has the skill, you have to corral her energy. She brings a level of intensity that you want other players to pick up on," Massachusetts coach Marnie Dacko said. "She's a post player that, if we can keep her in the post and keep her settled, she'll be OK."

Holy Cross was a bit shaken with the aggressive Minutewomen defense. Crusader head coach Bill Gibbons noticed the Maroon and White's intensity and was happy to come away with a win.

"I really wanted this one and I knew we could win it with defense and rebounding and getting the ball inside and I

So much for that.

Amidst budding hope and cautious optimism following encouraging performances against the Harlem Globetrotters in its preseason opener and St. Francis to begin its regular season, the Massachusetts men's basketball team (1-1) was returned to earth in the second round of the Preseason National Invitation Tournament Friday night.

Texas Tech	90

Facing a Texas Tech team fresh off of an 89-58 drubbing of Davidson in the opening round, the Minutemen were completely overmatched by an aggressive Red Raider defense and were hurt by their own inability to shoot the basketball in a 90-50 annihilation before 8,397 at the United Spirit Arena in Lubbock, Texas.

With the win, the Red Raiders advance to the semifinal round of the Preseason NIT, where they will face Utah at Madison Square Garden on Wednesday night.

The Minutemen return to action tonight when they will host Hartford at the Mullins Center at 7 p.m.

"There's no doubt that at some point when you're playing young people, you are going to experience a harsh reality," UMass coach Steve Lappas said. "We definitely got some harsh reality tonight.

Olympic gold medallist aids UMass equestrian team

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Correspondent

Olympic gold medallist David O'Connor visited the University of Massachusetts equestrian team this weekend to convey his expertise to a group of instructors from around the country, including one UMass student.

Sixteen instructors visited the Hadley horse farm to listen to O'Connor and colleague, Eric Horgan, speak and critique them about dressage, a precise form of riding. This elite 16 are in the process of trying to become certified as national instructors for the United States Eventing Association. They will be working to become certified on a specific level of teaching by gaining professional training from O'Connor and Horgan.

Erin Risso, UMass senior, was selected to participate in the workshop. Risso could potentially progress and get certified to become an instructor on the national level. Risso, an anthropology major, taught a demo rider on Saturday, where the topic of the lesson was 'circles and turns.' O'Connor was there to critique her lesson and relay his knowledge of dressage to her and the rider.

"Your job is to make a difference," he urged the instructors "Don't let the horse ride you. You ride the horse," O'Connor told one rider.

O'Connor told Risso to not necessarily point out bad habits of the horse and rider, but replace those habits with other ones that will eventually cancel out the bad ones.

Risso, who is the youngest applicant from around the country, said she was scared and intimidated just being in the same room as David O'Connor. However, after she was able to speak with O'Connor and Horgan one on one, she was able to develop a comfort level that boosted her confidence during the latter half of the workshop.

As for O'Connor and the rest of the instructor panelists watching and critiquing, Risso said she was "trying to block them out completely." She also mentioned though that felt she was able to learn the most by sitting on the panel critiquing other instructors.

She said she felt like she connected with both O'Connor and Horgan.

"They're both so personable and easy to work with, and who can say that they've worked with David O'Connor before?" she said.

Risso is looking forward to passing the certification so that she will be on a standard level of teaching.

The instructors had twenty-five minutes to teach for their lesson where they were asked to accomplish different goals. Each instructor had to pay $375 to listen to O'Connor and Horgan speak and underwent an extensive application program just to attend.

Jerry Schurink, the director of the UMass equestrian team and personal friend of David O'Connor, selected the top applicants to come to the workshop. It was required that each applicant currently teach at a I or II level — which are the lowest levels of riding — as well as be registered in the USEA in the Instructor's Certification Program.

JULIE O'DONNELL/COLLEGIAN

David O'Connor, Olympic gold medalist, visits the UMass equestrian team this past weekend.

"It is like Michael Jordan teaching a workshop on basketball here," said Schurink. "We are trying to fix the problems with novice level and training level instructors, so we can wean out problems for the national level before we get there. The program is five years in the making, in 2003, there have only been four workshops nationwide."

Schurnik said that the vision of these workshops is to "create an internationally

Vote Smart offers student internships

By Kristin Erekson
Collegian Correspondent

A national internship program is offering students at the University of Massachusetts an opportunity to work behind the scenes of the political system, as long as students agree to set their partisanship aside during certain hours.

Project Vote Smart, an organization that strives to maintain the ideals of democracy, created a 10-week internship program for students to learn about the candidates that participate in national elections. The organization will offer scholarships for three to five UMass students interested in doing work on the 2004 elections.

Interns will get the opportunity to do background checks on over 40,000 candidates for President, Congress, Governor and State Legislator.

"We are looking for interns that are, of course, interested in politics," said Lisa Coligan, the Internship Coordinator for Project Vote Smart. "Students should have strong communication skills, be comfortable using the computer, and willing to put their political beliefs aside from the hours of 8 a.m. to 5 p.m."

Students also must have good standing with the University, be eager to commit for 10 consecutive weeks and will be expected to maintain the facility, in order to be accepted into the program.

Interns will work at the Great Divide Ranch Retreat and Research Facility, which is situated in the Rocky Mountains close to Phillipsburg, Mont. The internship director will choose the designated department the intern should be placed in based on his or her "individual applicant skills, departmental priority, and projects available," according to the organization's Web site.

Jobs available for interns include news assistant, research and hotline assistant, national political awareness test assistant and information technology assistant.

"Some interns will basically sift through a big database full of voting records, biographical information, public statements, and speeches on candidates," said Coligan. "The information on the candidates is then provided on 'a user-friendly voter's self-defense system' found on the Web site and on our toll free number."

Speeches are obtained directly from the candidates' Web sites and the discourse is reiterated exactly so as to not alter the context of the piece. The main goal of Project Vote Smart is to provide a resource in which "relevant and well-organized information about candidates for public office [is] in the hand's of voters before Election Day," the Web site.

The organization is run independently and will not accept financial contributions from lobbyists, governmental organizations, corporations or businesses. Project Vote Smart is able to provide unbiased information about candidates through private donations from 45,000 members as well as from grants from charitable organizations such as the Carnegie, Ford, and Pew foundations.

In order to provide the most democratic, non-partisan information to voters, Project Vote Smart moved its office from Boston, Mass. to the Montana Rocky Mountains to avoid being in a place that is a political hot seat. The positive side to having the organization located in Montana is that students and members get to enjoy the ambiance of the "great outdoors" and appreciate the scenery.

"Though we can't afford to pay our interns or other workers, we can send you on a trip to Montana, which is

Amherst bookshop helps out UMass

By Nathan Chomsky-Higgins
Collegian Correspondent

The Jeffery Amherst Bookshop in Amherst Center is donating 10 percent of its sales to the University of Massachusetts WEB Du Bois Library this Thanksgiving holiday, Nov. 28, 29 and 30.

For the past 10 to 15 years, the Jeffery Amherst Bookshop has dedicated the first Saturday of every September to help raise funds for the Jones Library in Amherst. This year, because of budget cuts on the UMass campus, they have decided to also use the weekend as another chance to raise money for a local library.

The WEB Du Bois library is open to the public; anyone in the community can receive a library card to take out books and use the resources available. In addition to copious amounts of books and reference materials, the library also has computer labs, with both PCs and Macintoshes.

The library's acquisition department uses the Jeffery Amherst Bookshop to purchase many of its general readerships books. According to the bookshop, the budget cuts have caused the UMass library to cut back on its purchases. They hope that this new fundraiser will help the library to continue to buy more books.

Jeffery Amherst deals in trade titles, such as those reviewed in the New York Times, as well as travel books, children's books, fiction and non-fiction. The bookshop also has the largest Emily Dickinson section in the country, according to manager Marie Dunford. Jeffery Amherst also takes special requests and orders for any books that aren't in stock.

Behind the main bookstore is another building, the Jeffery Amherst College Bookshop, which sells textbooks many professors require, college apparel and college paraphernalia.

The Jeffery Amherst Bookshop, located at 55 South Pleasant St., Amherst, is open Friday and Saturday 8:30 a.m. to 8 p.m. and Sunday noon to 5 p.m. Any sales from orders taken during this time, including mail and phone orders, and anything purchased in the college bookshop, will donate 10 percent toward the WEB Du Bois library.

"We hope everyone comes out and supports the library," said Dunford.

Holiday travelers brace for crowded roads

By Helena Payne
Associated Press

The busiest travel time of the year was expected to be a bit busier this year as Americans hit the roads, rails and airlines to celebrate Thanksgiving with friends and family.

The AAA travel group expected 36 million people nationwide would travel 50 miles or more from their homes over the holiday weekend — the highest number of travelers in the past five years, a spokesman said.

Despite a new terrorism warning from the government, air travel was expected to be up this year, according to AAA, which predicted that 4.6 million people, or 13 percent of all travelers would fly. That's up 1 percent from 2002 but still 10 to 15 percent lower than pre-Sept. 11 levels.

"Since Sept. 11, the entire travel landscape has changed," AAA spokesman Mantill Williams said. "The whole travel pie has shrunk."

Two days after the region's first significant snowfall, people were moving briskly yesterday through Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport. Lines were short at checkpoints.

Marissa Iden, 26, and Mike Boulware, 25, chose to fly yesterday rather than today to save themselves grief, and their flight to Greenville, S.C., was on time.

"We only got 4 inches," Boulware said. "This is Minnesota. It is going to take a lot more than 4 inches to delay an airplane."

Officials at Boston's Logan International Airport expected 75,000 to 80,000 passengers per day on the peak travel days of yesterday, today, Sunday and Monday.

"We're expecting long lines," said Phil Orlandella, spokesman for the Massachusetts Port Authority, which runs the airport. "Sunday after the holiday will be the busiest day and Monday is expected to be busier than normal."

By rush hour on yesterday, Boston's South Station was bustling, as professionals, students and others dashed to catch trains that were twice and three times as full as regular trains, station manager Athie Tschibelu said.

"I think it keeps getting more and more crowded," said Leah Cimmelli, a 21-year-old senior at Boston University who was on her way to New York. "I had to book my ticket four days in advance. Usually I'll come the same day and get on the train an hour or two later."

Teresa Carvalho, a 41-year-old veteran commuter from Somerset, Mass., said the holiday traffic was a nuisance.

"I take this train everyday. I feel like I should have a seat over everybody," Carvalho said.

Following last week's bombings in Turkey, the government warned of an increased risk of terrorist attacks on Americans at home and abroad, but the nation's terror alert status remained at yellow, the middle level.

The Transportation Security Administration has offered tips to save airline passengers a few minutes in line. These include storing all metal items in a carryon bag, taking laptop computers out of their cases so they can be quickly inspected, and taking off coats and shoes before reaching the front of the line.

"You'd be amazed at what people have in their bags," TSA spokeswoman Ann Davis said. "If they'll just check the list, most of these items are fine in a checked bag."

Officials at Hartsfield-Jackson Atlanta International Airport expected 250,000 passengers to fly out of Atlanta on Sunday — the airport's busiest travel day.

"As long as you can keep people moving, it's not that bad," said Willie Williams, Atlanta's TSA director. "People don't mind the security. They want a safe ride."

Despite the uptick in air travel, the vast majority of Thanksgiving travelers will still take to the nation's roadways this weekend. AAA predicted that 31 million people, or 86 percent of all holiday travelers, would reach their destination by car despite a national average gas price of $1.51 per gallon — a nine-cent increase in gas prices over last year.

"Even if gas prices are high, it's still a relatively cheap way to go," said Art Kinsman, a spokesman for AAA Southern New England.

Some travelers weren't waiting until the last minute to get to their destination. Sherice Muhammad, 31, of Detroit, headed home from Atlanta on Monday to beat Thanksgiving traffic, just in case.

"I used to work for the airlines," Muhammad said. "So I knew I wanted to get out."

absolutely gorgeous, for 10 weeks," Colgan said.

The Great Divide Ranch Retreat and Research Facility is about three miles from the Continental Divide. The area offers fly-fishing rivers, hiking and horseback riding during the summer months in addition to ice fishing, skiing and snowmobile during the winter months.

Students will live in lodges that house between two and six people. A full-time lodge manager that lives on the property prepares meals and assigns the interns weekly cleaning and maintenance chores, the Web site said.

The organization was created in 1992 by 40 national leaders, including previous Presidents Gerald Ford and Jimmy Carter. The goal of the founders was to bridge the gap between voters and the irresponsible coverage of political campaigns by the mass media.

Project Vote Smart strives to provide "just the facts" to the voter, so the voting process will be less difficult, frustrating and time-consuming, according to the project's Web site.

The organization also made strong connections with newspapers and broadcast organizations, such as CNN, MSNBC, PBS, the Chicago Tribune and Washington Week and Review. Political editors and news directors also help the organization revise the National Political Awareness Tests, which are "issue-oriented questions" given to candidates for President, U.S. Senate, Governor, U.S. House of Representatives and State Legislature.

Project Vote Smart has also included an educational program on their Web site titled, "Vote Smart Classroom," for students in kindergarten through high school. The Web site provides classroom activities and ideas for teachers by "fellow educators" that suggest how to teach students at a young age about the electoral process.

In regards to hosting the elite riders such as O'Connor and Horgan, Schurnik said, "It is enormous. You just wouldn't find this type of opportunity to see two internationally acclaimed riders."

Horgan of Ireland represents the top equestrian in his country. He participated in the 1976 Olympics and was a 1978 world champion.

Amanda Yurof, a UMass student who participated as a demo rider, was nervous but excited to be coached by such a celebrity. Horgan encouraged the importance of an instructor developing a relationship with the rider and constantly assessing his or her work.

This first workshop is the initial step for the instructors to become certified. In April, UMass will host O'Connor and Horgan again for a similar workshop about jumping.

Next fall, Jerry Schurink hopes to host the testing and actual certification final step. Those who performed well this weekend will be invited to the workshop in April, and the best instructors there, will be invited to take the test to become certified.

O'Connor, who was the Sydney Olympics 2000 gold medallist, was scheduled to show in Australia, but canceled last minute after breaking his leg and wrist when he fell off his horse while jumping.

Sylvan fire put out

A fire broke out in Cashin dorm in Sylvan living area Sunday night. According to Patrick Archbald, deputy chief of the University of Massachusetts police department, the UMPD received the call at 9 p.m. reporting a pulled fire alarm.

Officers arrived on the scene at 9:04 p.m. and reported flames coming from the building's lobby window on the south side. The Amherst Fire Department also responded to the call.

An Amherst firefighter reached the lobby to find a burning 10- by six-inch plexie-glass strip stuck to a cement wall. The fire was extinguished with a portable fire extinguisher.

"The extinguishing probably took less than 30 seconds," said Archbald.

"We've spoken with several local residents. We don't have a suspect. We have no information as to how [the fire] started. Nothing in the building would indicate why it started," said Archbald.

According to Archbald, the objects may have been lit on fire. The damage to the building totaled $250.

Medicare bill passed

By DAVID ESPO
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Republican-controlled Congress sent President Bush historic Medicare legislation yesterday, combining a new prescription drug benefit with measures to control costs before the baby boom generation reaches retirement age.

Bush is expected to sign the bill with a flourish, then trumpet its enactment during his bid for re-election next year. "Because of the actions of the Congress, the actions of members of both political parties, the Medicare system will be modern and it will be strong," he said in Las Vegas shortly after lawmakers broke years of gridlock on the issue.

But within hours of a 54-44 Senate vote, Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle introduced legislation to repeal several of the bill's most controversial provisions and to allow the importation of lower-priced prescription drugs from Canada and Western Europe. "This debate is not over, it's just beginning," said the South Dakota Democrat.

Apart from a new prescription drug benefit, the legislation invites private firms to sell insurance coverage to 40 million Medicare beneficiaries.

While some supporters praised the bill in glowing terms and some critics denounced it with equal vehemence, many lawmakers said the far-reaching legislation had confronted them with a difficult choice.

"This was not an easy vote for me," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California, one of 11 Democrats who supported with the bill on final passage. "I know there are doubters out there. ... All I say to them is, give it a chance to work."

The complexity of the 681-page, $395 billion measure — and the two-year delay in implementing the new drug coverage —has made it subject to competing claims and uncertain estimates.

For seniors obtaining drug coverage through a stand-alone plan in 2006, for example, officials estimate a benefit with a $35 monthly premium and a $250 annual deductible, followed by 75 percent coverage up to $2,250 in costs. There would be a break in coverage over that level until costs reached $5,100 — a gap of $2,850 — before benefits resumed and began paying 95 percent of remaining costs.

But an official forecast by Congress' budget experts envisioned a steady increase in premiums and deductibles as well as a widening of the coverage gap in the following years, with insurance payments growing as well. By 2013, according to the estimates, the monthly premium would be $58, the deductible would reach $445 and the beneficiary would be required to pay all costs between $4,000 and $9,066 before coverage resumed.

Seniors who choose a new private health plan, either an HMO or preferred provider organization, would receive drug coverage as part of a combined benefit.

The legislation was an attempt to balance competing interests in a Congress sharply divided along party lines. On one side, the measure includes a costly new prescription drug benefit for 40 million Medicare beneficiaries, with subsidies for low-income seniors and billions of dollars to discourage corporations from dropping existing coverage for their retirees. Also included is $25 billion in additional funding for rural hospitals and other health care providers.

At the same time, the bill reflects the eagerness of many conservatives to give seniors the option of private insurance coverage, a step they argued could lead to more modern and efficient health care coverage. Still other changes are aimed primarily at controlling costs.

With the first members of the baby boom generation due to reach Medicare eligibility age in 2011, several lawmakers argued that fundamental changes were required to maintain the program's finances. By 2029, according to Census Bureau figures, all 78 million baby boomers will be age 65 or over.

For the first time, seniors earning more than $80,000 a year would be required to pay higher premiums than other beneficiaries for their Part B Medicare coverage. Part B covers doctor visits and other out-of-hospital services.

Another provision would increase the annual deductible for Part B coverage from $100 to $110 in 2005, and tie future increases to the growth in overall non-hospital spending under Medicare. The deductible has not changed since 1991.

Conservatives, in particular, pointed to a series of other changes in the legislation that they said would curtail costs over the longer term — and each of them drew sharp criticism from Democrats eager to defend the existing government-run program.

One would require the president to recommend changes in the program if spending exceeded predetermined levels. The legislation includes rules designed to guarantee votes on the House floor on alternatives as diverse as cutting benefits or raising taxes. The same rules are designed to prod the Senate to act, but do not guarantee a vote.

The bill's most controversial feature would begin a limited program of competition beginning in 2010 between traditional Medicare and the new private plans. Conservatives who support the provision argue it would help hold down costs. Democratic critics, backed by estimates produced by the Medicare program's actuaries, argue it would lead to increased premiums for seniors who remain in the traditional benefit program.

Some of the Republicans who voted for the bill sought assurances in advance from the administration that cities in their states would not be chosen for the competition.

Local schools face troubles

By KEN MAGUIRE
ASSOCIATED PRESS

MALDEN, Mass. (AP) — Holyoke and Winchendon parents and leaders rallied to defend their schools yesterday after the state Board of Education voted to declare the districts "underperforming."

"We are not a failure," said Maureen Provost, who has four children in the Winchendon schools ranging from pre-kindergarten to 10th grade.

"We are fed up," she continued. "This is a small town and a poor community. Yet, when the state cut our money, we voted to take $1 million from the stabilization fund and put it into our schools. We care. And we are not a failure."

The unanimous vote triggers a process that could lead to full state takeover if those districts fail to improve. It was the first time a district has been declared underperforming in Massachusetts, and may not be the last.

The board also placed the North Adams and Keefe Technical School districts "on watch." They could face an underperforming vote in a year or 18 months if they do not improve. Fall River, New Bedford, Boston, and Lawrence are up for reviews in the next year.

State officials may not be prepared for the realities of Holyoke, Mayor Michael Sullivan said. More than half of Holyoke students live in poverty, one-quarter have special needs, there's an annual transiency rate of 39 percent, and the district absorbed $14 million in education cuts over the past two years, he said.

"I'm not completely confident," he said of the district's prospects to improve. "I certainly think the challenges are far greater than (education officials) suspect. They have to go in and understand the student population."

Sullivan pledged to work with the state, and was not surprised by the vote, but was clearly miffed.

"I've been insulted by better people," he said.

Holyoke parents were similarly upset.

"I feel bad for the teachers in Holyoke who are busting their tails," said Linda LaRose, a Holyoke mother of four, including a fourth grader and sixth grader. Her older children, including a son in medical school, also attended city schools.

"We have a lot of great teachers who are doing their best," LaRose continued. "I see them still at school at 7 o'clock at night and they are working hard. There is a lot of poverty. And I don't think the state coming in and taking over is the solution."

India, Pakistan armies cease fire

By NIRMALA GEORGE
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW DELHI (AP) — India and Pakistan began a cease-fire between their armies at midnight yesterday — the first such accord in 14 years.

The agreement, however, did not cover Indian security forces and Islamic militants in Kashmir, and there was no indication how long it would last or how effective it would be.

The two nations' armies — which trade machine-gun and mortar fire almost daily — would observe the cease-fire along their entire frontier, the governments said. That includes the international border that covers several western states in India, the Line of Control dividing Jammu-Kashmir, and the frontier at the Siachen Glacier.

The start of the cease-fire coincides with the Eid-al-Fitr festival that ended the Islamic holy month of Ramadan.

In Islamabad, Pakistan Foreign Ministry spokesman Masood Khan confirmed military chiefs agreed on the cease-fire, which he said was indefinite and "a positive development."

Neither side specified how long the truce would last. India said Monday an enduring cease-fire would depend on Pakistan ending the infiltration of Islamic militants into India's portion of Kashmir.

The largest Pakistan-based militant group battling in India's portion of the divided Himalayan province said its men would keep on fighting.

"This will not make any difference for mujahedeen activities," Salim Hashmi, a spokesman for Hezb-ul-Mujahedeen, told The Associated Press from Muzaffarabad, the capital of Pakistan-controlled Kashmir. "The mujahedeen will continue their operations."

In contrast to the Kashmiris, who were joyful over the cease-fire as they crowded bazaars for their Eid shopping, Salim said it was "not something to get excited about."

India has accused Pakistan of using artillery fire as a cover to help militants sneak into Jammu-Kashmir to attack government forces and civilians in the past 14 years, and more than 65,000 people, most of them Muslim civilians, have died in the fighting.

"Certainly to that extent, the infiltration will be a more risky proposition for those attempting it," said G. Parthasarthy, former Indian high commissioner to Pakistan, commenting on the cease-fire.

"In terms of atmospherics, it is a good development. The litmus test of Pakistani sincerity would be an end to infiltration." Parthasarthy said.

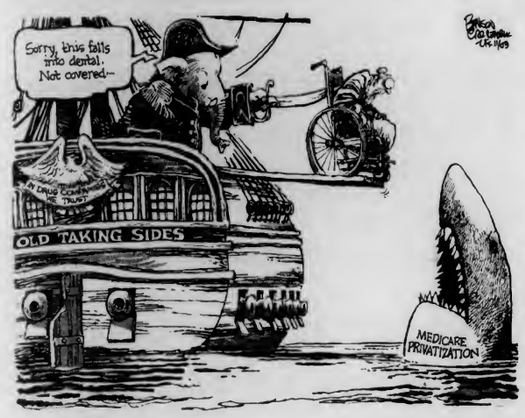
Thanksgiving: a time for appreciation

At this time of year, it's hard to remember to be thankful for anything. Most of us are struggling to write papers, pass exams and piece projects together while somehow keeping our heads above water. This is one of the most stressful times of the semester. By the end of November, most of us are so lost in our work and our approaching finals that little else seems to matter.

But tomorrow is a time to forget about all of that. There are no classes, no professors or grades, no dining halls or anything else that plagues us as college students. Tomorrow, the fourth Thursday of the month, is set aside as a day for eating, drinking, watching football and parades, being with family and appreciating all that we have.



There's a lot of debate over the true origins of the holiday: who was really there, what they really ate, how it all actually came about. The truth is that no one will really ever know the truth, and it doesn't really matter. Once upon a time, some people of different cultures got together, apparently ate dinner, and gave a toast to the prospects of a new life. The importance lies in how that occasion has evolved.

In our society, where everything is about work and being on-the-go, it's important that we have at least this one day to remember to take a breather. Even if Christmas has been commercialized and Columbus Day is practically ignored, at least this one holiday remains sacred. It is still a day for catching up with old friends, spending time with family and relaxing. It's a day to simply enjoy the company of others and the things we've managed to acquire.

Whether you usually enjoy Thanksgiving or not, take this year to give it a second thought. Take the time to truly appreciate what this past year has brought you. Even if the past year hasn't been the greatest for you, there is always at least one thing to be thankful for. Forget about the mundane stressors of everyday life for a change, and remember to express your gratitude to those around you. It's the one time of year when there's no excuse not to.

So as you're loading up your cars with laundry and fighting traffic to return to the place you call home, remember what it is all for. These few days of vacation time to spend with loved ones and recharge our batteries comes at a much-needed point of the semester, and that, if nothing else, is something to be thankful for. With that in mind, the Massachusetts Daily Collegian wishes everyone a safe and happy holiday filled with good company and good thoughts of how lucky we all truly are. Happy Thanksgiving everyone!

Amherst's unlikely entrepreneur

Ben Feder

It's a place that exists three nights a week for two hours and then disappears; a place that few Amherst residents know about, but where many college students frequent on their weekend nights; a place encompassing a pizzeria, a bar and a small expanse of sidewalk where a food vendor unfurls the umbrella over his cart while waiting for his nightly business at Club Sidewalk to pick up.

Mike McGale, better known as the sausage man, pulls his pick-up truck alongside the sidewalk outside McMurphy's Uptown Tavern in downtown Amherst. Hitched to his truck is a large cherry red trailer with gold leaf lettering displaying the words "Mike's Hot Dogs and Sausages." Upon opening the trailer's large metal door, he wheels a 24-gallon propane tank, a grill and a condiments stand with a large Blue Seal brand umbrella past the metal fencing separating the road from the curb and onto the sidewalk.

Once McGale has all his equipment gathered, he adjusts a few more valves on the grill, shifts the pieces of the cart around, and affixes a light to the umbrella pole. Taking a long drag from his cigarette, McGale steps out from the cart and looks over his work. After rubbing a smudge of grease off the menu board, he glances at his watch and sees it's 11:15 p.m. It'll be another 15 minutes until the streets fill with college kids, rambunctious after a full week of classes and studying.

After parking the truck and trailer further down the road, McGale returns to the cart to prepare the food. With a set of tongs, he places 10 pre-boiled Italian sausages onto the grill. He then grabs a 6-pound can of onions and peppers, dumping it into a large skillet next to the grill. The skillet hisses and steam immediately rises into the air while McGale toasts a few hot dog buns.

"It's for the customer," McGale explains as he prods a dangling onion back into the pan. "It might not do much in this weather, but at least it'll keep their hands warm and their stomachs hungry."

College students and town officials alike refer to the locale surrounding McGale as Club Sidewalk. At a stretch of sidewalk that extends from Antonio's Pizzeria down to the Monkey Bar, where once the bars close around 1 a.m., people spill out onto the sidewalk, buying food and enjoying the night air for a little longer before going home.

This is where McGale thrives as a businessman. Some people see a food vendor and see a simple job that doesn't take much in entrepreneurial or business skills. At least not anything a membership into the School of Management would need. But for the sausage man, his business is a work of art.

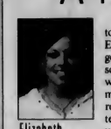
"I'm a decent person, with quality food, in a decent atmosphere," McGale explains. His main business philosophy is that he cares about his product as much as for the people he sells to. It doesn't matter if you're selling something simple, like sausages to drunk kids, or you work in an office building in the city — you need to do the best job you can do.

McGale continues by explaining that it takes a lot of money, hard work and planning to get into food vending and to own your own self-reliant business.

You "can't just get into the business. A lot of people think it's easy and that you can buy a couple books and you're all set. It's those kinds of people who don't make it. People say drunken kids can't taste lousy food, and it doesn't matter if you put your best into what you do. But if something tastes lousy and you're drunk, you know it."

This dedication shows in the way people come up to McGale and praise his food. Stand by him for 15 minutes, and you will see people from as far as Springfield who came to Amherst just to buy one of his Italian Sausages. Ask anyone who has waited in line to get into McMurphy's and they will tell you about what a "drunk sausage" tastes like.

To become such a free spirit took a lot of navigating through red tape and a certain amount of bureaucracy. McGale needed to get a lunch cart license, food handler's permit, Board of Health state license, and a hawker and peddler's license. After taking a 6-hour course for the Board of Health he needed to find a base of operations to properly refrigerate his specially ordered food, and to properly clean and sanitize his equipment.



"All this just to cook sausages, which are hard to screw up," McGale says.

The reason I painted this picture of the "drunk sausage" man is because he is a remarkable individual that few people recognize as such. He treats everyone he encounters as a close friend and will talk to you about whatever you want, whether it is a friendly ear to tell your nightly story to, or as an advice giver.

So next time you are at Club Sidewalk, stop for a second and talk to the sausage man. You may be surprised at what he has to say; your appetite will definitely be pleased you did.

A miscarriage of justice

Elizabeth Carter

For the past two weeks, I've had to attend the Residential Alcohol Educational Program. Last year, I got into a bit of trouble with a somewhat surly Resident Assistant who happened to live next door to me. This week, REAP requested I read and write a response to a letter written by Jeff Levy, who's son was killed in a drunk driving accident. In the letter, Levy supports students who drink in moderation, yet also supports a strict crack down by campus officials on binge drinking. Seeing as I am no binge drinker, yet for some reason I am being punished by a system I see as failing, this is what I wrote in response to his letter:

As a current University of Massachusetts student and a person who feels I have been treated unjustly by the current drinking rules in place, I began reading your letter with a somewhat skeptical point of view. Despite the sorrow I feel for you and your son, I'm afraid I cannot agree with the solution you have suggested for preventing such incidents from happening.

I for one am a student with a high GPA and numerous extra-curricular activities. I am a responsible person and am quite often the designated driver for my friends when we want to go out and have a good time. Binge drinking is not something I often do, although I do drink.

So as you see, I am a part of that condoned majority you spoke of that does not binge drink. Many adults drink in moderation and that is not frowned upon at all. As a 20-year-old woman, I don't see why it is that I should be condemned for actions which people who are but a year older than me are encouraged to do.

I hate to say it, but what happened to your son will happen to other people. It is an unfortunate inevitability. Yet the solution to this is not to try to control and restrict people in their actions, for when you do that, it only makes the restricted item more desirable.

Rather, we should educate our children. One of the foremost lessons my parents have always imparted up on me is that you never, ever get into a car with a drunken person. I'm sure you gave your son that lecture too. However, if he did not take it to heart, there's really nothing else you could have done. Sometimes when we drink, we forgo our better judgment and that is one of the perils we all must be aware of. I say we try to educate our children, not to control them. Control only leads to backlash and resentment.

I, for one, am resentful of a system that supposedly tries to weed out those terrible binge drinkers. However, last year when my RA saw me with empty alcohol containers, there was no deliberating over the situation. I was a condemned woman, so to say. This was a situation, in which I was neither drunk nor disorderly, but rather I was sitting in a room with a few empty cans.

The second time trouble found me, I was totally sober, but a 21-year-old friend left my room, drunk, with a few bottles of tequila. I wasn't aware he had brought those bottles into my room. Although I was sober and he was falling over drunk, somehow I am the one who now has to go to three classes that are three hours each and pay $100 to do so.

Now, I cannot do as much of my homework as I would like on those nights, because for some reason, which I cannot logically discern, I am stuck in a room with nine other people, all of us wondering where the justice is in this backward system. It is a system that is happier to pin the problem of binge drinking on scapegoats, rather than those that cause the actual problems.

I am responsible for my behavior, yet because of the lack of due process in the judicial system at this school, my individual case was not looked into or weighted in relation to the reality of just what had gone on those nights.

I pose a question to you, Mr. Levy, and to all the readers out there: What justice have I received for being a responsible drinker?

When you unfairly punish the innocent, they begin to question the reasons they had for being so good to begin with.

Were I a different person, maybe I would take to an alcohol problem so that I could feel justice was done, rather than having just been slighted by a system I have to, for some reason, adhered to. Within rules and laws lies a distinct paradox. If you punish the guilty, they may learn to reform. Likewise, if you punish the innocent, they may learn to rebel — if for no other reason than simply for justice's sake.

A need to fight the fat

Faith Leonard

It is simple: We Americans love food and are eating ourselves to death. Obesity is increasing dramatically nation wide. Besides the food consumption, the average American doesn't get his lazy butt up off the couch to exert even the slightest bit of energy. The calories are high and feelin' the burn is very low.

There is a plethora of excuses one could make to justify our lack of physical movement. However, what it basically boils down to is a skewed idea of what a balanced diet is. In addition, Americans should get a minimum of 30 minutes of cumulative moderate exercise daily — and even that isn't enough.

Convenience is another thing we Americans love. Ready-to-eat snacks are all over the place to assist us with our hectic schedules. As you stroll through campus take a look at what's available to you when your stomach growls. Vending machines stockpiled with junk. Everything on the other side of the glass is loaded with fat, sugar, and preservatives, which also provide no nutritional value.

If you are really fatigued and need a snack to pick you up, the vending machine is close and convenient. Without making a second thought you pop your money in and reach for that Snickers bar or bag of Cheetos. These snacks will ultimately raise your sugar levels slightly and then you crash. Plus, you didn't even give yourself one fraction of the daily amount of any vitamin or mineral. You just packed on some calories, my friend. And that is just the snacks.

Americans are the fattest people in the world. Obesity is becoming an epidemic.

The dining commons on campus provide students with a few items that are there every day. It is convenient to grab that slice of pizza, cheeseburger, hotdog and mound of French fries. Not to mention that as soon as you enter the cafeteria the grease stares you in the face as opposed to the salad bar, which is hidden around the corner. Again, it's convenient and takes less time to grab the unhealthy stuff.

In our dorm rooms, it's hard to keep anything but convenient foods. Fruit, yogurt, pretzels, tuna fish, carrot sticks and string cheese are some healthy options. Plus you can take them on the go for a between class snack.

If we don't stop making poor food choices, with our high fat and empty calories, there might not be many years ahead. Asthma, diabetes, hypertension (high levels of blood pressure), heart attacks and coronary heart disease are just a few possible side effects of too much fat.

Americans are the fattest people in the world. Obesity is becoming an epidemic. One good sign that America is at least attempting to become a healthier nation is the fast food restaurants. McDonald's and Burger King are following Wendy's and creating low-calorie, healthier choices. Now, even though we have crazy lifestyles without much time, we can grab something quick and still watch our waistlines.

Exercise is a perfect match to healthy eating if you want to shed the pounds faster. For us students, walking instead of taking the bus is a good idea, especially if you don't go to the gym regularly. Also, take the stairs to your dorm room. There is nothing better than the sore feeling you get because you know you worked your muscles.

So, like I said before, get up off your lazy butt, eat a bit healthier and breakin' a sweat couldn't hurt either.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

OPPOSITION TO GAY MARRIAGE

I am addressing this letter to Becky Martins, the author of the Nov. 25 column "Same Sex Marriage: an important step."

Martins' column argues that legalizing same-sex marriages would promote equal social treatment of homosexuals. "Thus, they could see the importance of acceptance and understand why these individuals deserve every right a heterosexual person possesses." Her argument is, however, based on a fundamental flaw — that flaw being that somehow anyone's acceptance of a person is based upon acceptance of that person's lifestyle. Martins equates accepting the idea of homosexuality with accepting homosexuals. I do not accept homosexual marriage, but i do accept homosexuals as being fellow human beings.

Martins also say, "it is clear that people are not treated equally in this country, both legally and socially." This is a sad truth to some extent in that women and minorities still face problems of discrimination. But in terms of homosexual behavior, we must recognize very fundamental idea — the idea being that not all ideas are equal. Some are good, some are bad; some are right, and some are wrong. But because someone has a wrong idea, or at least what I perceive to be a wrong idea, does not make that person any less of a person. If you agree, or disagree with what I am saying, then you have proven the point I just mentioned. If you agree with me, you are saying that the opposing view is wrong. If you disagree with me, you are saying that my view is wrong.

Why are same-sex marriages a bad idea? Simply put, such marriages would violate natural and divine law. If one is an atheist or naturalist, one must recognize that homosexual relationships do not exist in the naturai world. And if somewhere they do exist, it is some sort of anomaly and is certainly not behavior that helps natural creatures live. If one is a theist, one sees homosexual marriage as a violation of natural law and divine law. In both cases, the outworking of homosexuai marriage is not only wrong but also unhealthy. In her column, Martins claim, "In some cases, marriage may also solve emotional issues children face when parented by a same sex couple."

Let me assure you now that this is entireiy not the case. A good friend of mine is the child of a lesbian couple and it has caused him no end of emotional and social problems. When we accept same-sex marriage, we also imply that there are no essentiai definitions of man and woman, or how they relate to one another. And my friend struggles deeply with just those problems. He does not know what it means to be a man, nor does he know how to interact with or relate to women. Furthermore, research shows that children raised by same-sex couples also face these same problems.

Banning the legaiization of homosexual marriage is not discrimination. It is compassion. It is denying something that would be harmful for people to have because it is not good for the couple, nor good for any children they might raise. We have laws in place that make it illegai to participate in behavior that is harmfui to the self.

'GOTHIKA' FAILS TO FRIGHTEN AUDIENCES

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

"He opened me like a flower of pain, and it felt goooooood."

It takes a mad genius — or a screenwriter of amazingly misplaced chutzpah — to begin a movie with a line as florid and purple as that. "Gothika," a sort of low-rent gloss on the uber-solemn likes of "The Sixth Sense" and "The Ring," unfortunately settles for the latter option.

Screenwriter Sebastian Gutierrez pens dialogue as if he's in a contest to string together the most baroquely asinine script of the year. Every other pronouncement seems to be the most club-footed of metaphors that could be thought of.

Those that thought the previously mentioned, better supernatural ghost stories took themselves too seriously, should wait until they get a whiff of "Gothika," a thuddingly obvious 'am-I-really-seeing-ghosts?' spookfest that practically begs for respect. Why, it even has an actual Oscar winner, Halle Berry (apparently still tear-streaked), shrieking and sobbing at the center of its madness. But all the movie asks of Berry is that she, well, shriek and sob.

This is a movie that wants to be taken seriously, but it can't muster the energy to properly disturb and alarm. But since it doesn't want to revel in its own B-movie excesses either, it becomes stuck between two poles. "Gothika" is a movie too silly to be taken without a grain of salt, but too puffed-up to be enjoyed as an amusing little thriller.

"The Sixth Sense" and "The Ring" at least had a sense of artistry powering them, which gave the eerie revelations an unnerving kick. "Gothika" on the other hand comes from the Dark Castle production company, which specializes in slickly packaged, unpretentious and often lowbrow, mainstream horror efforts.

This too is another slick, stylishly shot ghost story — but the first to wander away from Dark Castle's haunted house gimmick, which served them three times to diminishing returns — yet this time, those involved have imagined the film as being some sort of living nightmare in the same league as the M. Night Shyamalan film. Sorry to break the news, but its not even in the same league as "The Others."

Which isn't to say that director Mathieu Kassovitz doesn't attempt to crank the tension. The French filmmaker, best known stateside as the love interest in the foreign hit "Amelie," works alongside cinematographer Matthew Libatique to create a palpable mood that at least promises a living nightmare. They photograph dark, deep shadows and stormy nights — longtime horror conventions — as if they had just discovered them. The atmosphere they create may be second-hand, but it's so thick and wrought that it still manages to work. Kassovitz and Libatique are smart enough to keep the flashy camera tricks to a minimum. The sparse effects grant the movie a disorienting chill.

But like a pierced balloon, the air begins to leak out of the movie. Gutierrez's baroque dialogue, with its stilted, inflated self-importance, hardly helps matters, but neither does Kassovitz's apparent love for foreshadowing.

Horror movies rely on the element of surprise to work, but Kassovitz has a knack for setting up his omens long before his scares. Only gullibility will allow for fear in "Gothika" because the director billboards when the scares are coming.

Berry, slumming in a role that should have gone to a B-starlet, plays Miranda Gray, a "brilliant" psychiatrist (evidenced by the fact she actually acts like an idiot) at a creepy mental health facility. Penelope Cruz — the poor girl who has to utter that ridiculous line — is one of the patients, a spacey young woman who thinks she's being raped by the devil. After getting out of a session with Cruz, Gray heads home in the pounding rain when she's run off the road by the wraith-like figure of a scarred young woman shivering in a clingy dress. After witnessing the strange, gibbering woman spontaneously combust, Gray awakens to find herself a prisoner in her own hospital, accused of butchering her husband and fellow doctor (Charles S. Dutton) with an axe.

What does this ghost have to do with Gray's newfound home in the grimy hospital, which has lights that are always apparently kept on flicker mode? Why is the mysterious message "Not alone" appearing carved in the good doctor's arm, and what does her deceased husband have to do with all this?

Let's just say that when Gray tells her flirtatious colleague — Robert Downey Jr., doing what he can with a limited role, "logic is overrated," someone on the creative end of "Gothika" took that lesson to heart. It makes no sense that Gray would wind up in the same asylum as her patients, especially when that asylum only exists to be the setting for a horror movie. As Gray comes closer to solving the mystery, the movie grows more ludicrous, more overwrought, until it gives up on trying to scare the audience.

Kassovitz still pulls off a couple of truly nerve-wracking scenes, such as Gray's fiery initial confrontation with the specter and a ghostly attack in the woman's shower, which has a vicious nightmare charge. But the scariest thing in the movie may be Dutton's face-sucking, open mouth kiss with Berry, which isn't saying much.

Kassovitz begins "Gothika" by promising chills, but it's a promise that ultimately goes undelivered.

New Cash tracks 'Unearthed'

Compilation to feature unreleased material

By David Balder
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — Fans of the late Johnny Cash have a lot to keep them occupied: A box set being released Tuesday contains a staggering 64 never-heard-before recordings.

The five-disc box, "Unearthed," is all material recorded during the last decade, during Cash's fruitful partnership with Rick Rubin, who had been known best as a rap and rock producer.

Cash died Sept. 12 at age 71 of complications from diabetes.

"It seems like a nice punctuation," Rubin said. "It seems like a bookend with the beginning of his career and the Sun (Records) work. It's a beautiful way to sum things up."

The set includes a duet with the late Joe Strummer on Bob Marley's "Redemption Song," and collaborations with Fiona Apple, Nick Cave, Carl Perkins and Glen Campbell. Cash tackles two Neil Young songs, "Heart of Gold" and "Pocahontas," as well as material by Kris Kristofferson, Dolly Parton, Steve Earle, Roy Orbison, Chuck Berry and Willie Nelson.

The Cash-Rubin collaboration seemed like an odd one: a long-haired, somewhat mysterious impresario who was one of rap's behind-the-scenes pioneers and a music legend who had been largely written off as a contemporary recording artist.

But a mutual love of music enabled them to overcome differences. Cash responded to Rubin's desire to record him largely unadorned, and their musical open-mindedness took them down intriguing paths.

"When he was too ill to continue being on the road, that affected him," Rubin said. "It was a large part of his life, communicating with people on a regular basis. He took all that energy and put it into record-making. It was his reason to exist."

Cash participated in the making of "Unearthed," finished just before he died. He offered reflections on each of the new songs in the liner notes.

Rubin would send Cash CD after CD of song suggestions before each of the recording sessions, and they tried a lot. (Not every idea: Rubin, unsuccessfully, kept trying to get Cash to make a version of Radiohead's "Creep.")

This meant a huge amount of outtakes, and they fill three of the five "Unearthed" discs. A handful can rightly be called failures; Cash misses the essence of Earle's "The Devil's Right Hand," for instance.

But many were cut simply because they didn't fit the concept of a particular album. On most of the second disc, Cash is backed by Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers, and he works with three members of the Red Hot Chili Peppers on Young's "Heart of Gold."

The fourth disc is an entirely new gospel album, "My Mother's Hymn Book," which Cash describes in his liner notes as "my favorite album I've ever made."

"I nailed it," Cash said. "That was me. Me and the guitar, and that's all there was in it and all there was to it. I'm so glad that I got that done."

The fifth disc is the only one with previously released material: a collection of highlights from the four-album American Recordings series.

"It's a lot of material," Rubin said. "Most box sets are mostly a collection of material that's already been out. This is like getting four brand new albums all at once."

At some point, Cash's record company may break up the box set into smaller, more affordable chunks (list price is $78.98), but there are no clear plans for that, Rubin said.

Cash may soon rival Tupac Shakur as one of the most prolific posthumous artists. In preparation for the fifth disc in the American Recordings sequence, he recorded some 50 new songs after his wife, June Carter Cash, died in May. None of these songs appear on "Unearthed."

"I think he would have continued doing this for a long time," Rubin said.

Fledgling Warner Music Group sold for $2.6 billion

By Alex Veiga
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES (AP) — A consortium of investors led by former Universal Music chief Edgar Bronfman Jr. said Monday it struck a $2.6 billion deal to buy Warner Music Group from Time Warner Inc., edging out Britain's EMI Group PLC, which withdrew its bid at the last minute.

The deal, which also includes Time Warner's Warner/Chappell Music publishing business, would create one of the world's largest independent music companies and include some of the industry's biggest artists, such as Madonna, R.E.M. and the Red Hot Chili Peppers.

Bronfman, who oversaw a great expansion at Universal as its chief between 1995 and 2000, will lead the company. Bronfman sold Universal before the impact of digital technology and the Internet helped spur a three-year slump in CD sales industrywide.

Bronfman sold the company, a unit of his family's longtime liquor business, Seagram Co., to Vivendi in 2000. He tried to buy back Vivendi this year, but lost out to General Electric Co.'s NBC.

"Warner Music Group is one of the world's greatest recorded music and music publishing companies, and we have great faith in its potential for growth as an independent company and in the long-term opportunities of this industry," Bronfman said. "We have brought together a highly sophisticated and well-financed group of investors to support the business."

Current Warner Music chairman Roger Ames was slated to take the No. 2 spot at the new company. More details on senior management and the composition of the board were to be announced later.

The deal was expected to close in January, according to the Bronfman investor group, which includes Boston-based private equity firms Thomas H. Lee Partners, Bain Capital and Providence Equity Partners Inc.

Hollywood billionaire Haim Saban, who initially was part of the investor group, pulled out of the consortium over the weekend after it became clear he would not be allowed to have a direct, controlling role with the company, according to an entertainment industry source who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Under terms of the deal, Time Warner would retain an option to buy back up to a 15 percent stake in the new company during the first three years after the sale closes, or up to a 19.9 percent stake at a favorable price if Warner Music were to merge with another music company, according to a source familiar with the deal.

The deal would also extend Time Warner's current music publishing agreements for four years and retain Time Warner's affiliation with Warner Music through its America Online digital music business.

The deal gives the giant media conglomerate a way to exit the embattled music business while raising billions in cash toward slashing its net debt.

"The cash is really the thing that makes the deal," said Michael Goodman, media and entertainment analyst at the Yankee Group. "One of the biggest things Time Warner needs to do is pay down their debt. They're getting out of a business that is in decline for them."

The Bronfman-Time Warner deal was expected to slash Time Warner's net debt by about $2.6 billion, the company said.

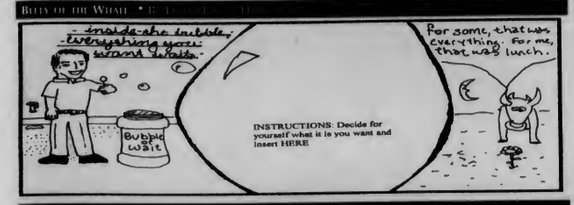
"I'm very pleased that we are putting our music company in such capable hands," said Time Warner Chairman and CEO Dick Parsons. "Despite my personal fondness for the music business as well as for all of our wonderful managers and music group employees, I believe that this transaction is clearly in the best interests of our company's shareholders."

Time Warner put its music business up for sale in late summer, conducting exclusive talks with BMG, a unit of the German media conglomerate Bertelsmann. BMG ended up inking a tentative merger deal with Sony Corp. earlier this month.

EMI, the world's third-largest music company, approached Time Warner, eventually offering an estimated $1.5 billion cash and stock deal for Time Warner's recorded music division, but excluding the music publishing business.

EMI appeared to be the front-runner as late as Wednesday, when EMI officials publicly described the negotiations as having reached "an advanced stage." But a day later, Time Warner's board focused in decidedly on Bronfman's consortium, giving them until the end of the weekend to finalize the deal, the source said.

Time Warner's board ultimately concluded the Bronfman deal would have a better chance of winning approval quicker from antitrust regulators than a merger with EMI, particularly in light of the merger agreement between Sony and BMG, the source said.



EMI, whose artists include Robbie Williams, Kylie Minogue and Radiohead, failed previous attempts to merge with BMG and Warner Music the past three years.

"They're low man on the totem pole," Goodman said. "In a declining business you don't want to be on the bottom, because you're the one who is going to get impacted most significantly."

So far this year, Warner Music Group has 17.91 percent of overall market share, second only to Universal Music's 27.99 percent, according to data compiled by Nielsen SoundScan.

Sony Music Entertainment ranks third with 14.86 percent and BMG is fourth with 14.63 percent. EMI Group ranks fifth with 10.8 percent.

Round one is afoot

Whipple is A-10 coach of the year, now must prove it

By MIKE MARZELLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On Monday, Massachusetts football coach Mark Whipple was named Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year. Now, he must apply what earned him that distinction to what might be his most difficult task this season.

After a befuddling turn of events that has the No. 5 Massachusetts football team on the road in the first round of the Division I-AA playoffs, Whipple must now refocus his squad on playing football. Beyond that, he must also have it prepared to face off against the team with the nation's longest winning streak: Patriot League champion Colgate.

"Bottom line is that Colgate is a very good football team," Whipple said. "They have the nation's leading scorer in Jamaal Branch and a very good quarterback as well.

"There's no doubt about it; we're going to need to come to play."

For the Raiders, it all starts with Branch. Currently ranked seventh on Colgate's career rushing list, the junior from Mashpee needs 182 yards to move into sixth place.

Last week against Holy Cross, Branch carried 30 times for 280 yards to break a 35-year-old school record for rushing yards in a game. He has also broken the school record for consecutive 100-yard performances this season with 11.

Last but not least, Branch is also the nation's leading scorer, with 25 touchdowns on the year for a school-record 150 points. He also needs just 376 all-purpose yards to break the single-season school record.

"He's just a really good back," Whipple said. "It's going to be up to us to stop him, and we're going to have to be ready both mentally and physically. There's no margin for error against a player of his caliber."

The weapons do not stop there for the Raiders, however, as junior wide receiver Luke Graham is also putting together a strong season.

The Hamilton, N.Y. native has caught a pass in 26 consecutive games, and currently has 57 receptions for 882 yards and six touchdowns on the season.

For his career, Graham sits fourth on Colgate's all-time receiving yardage list with 2,190 yards, as well as fourth in career catches with 132. He needs just 12 more catches to move into third place.

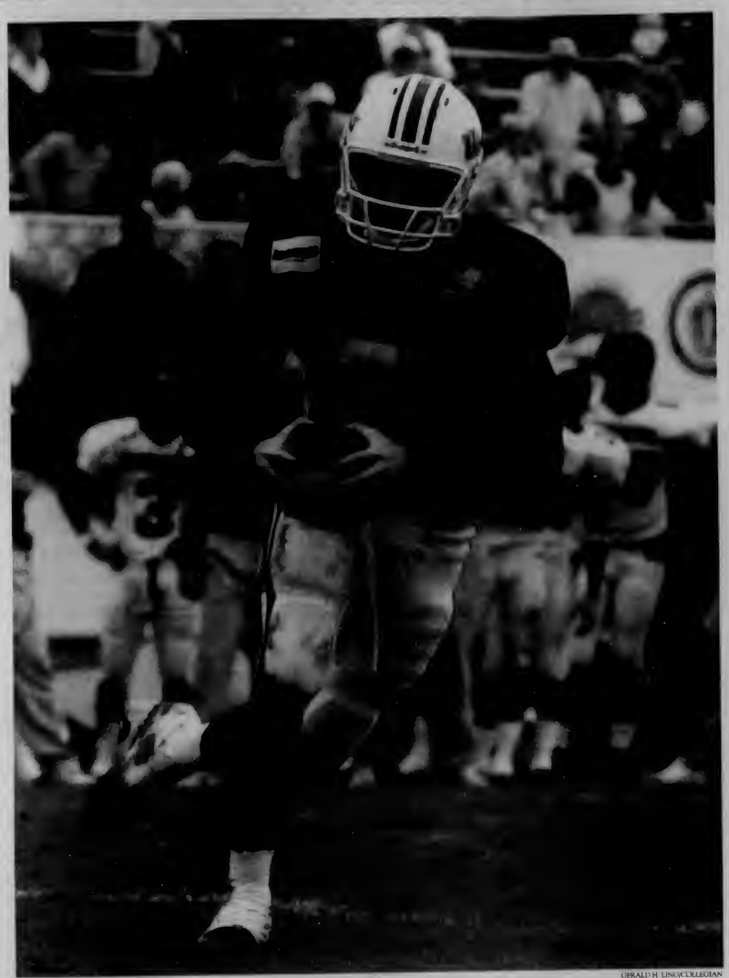
J.B. Gerald gives Colgate another solid wideout as well, as he is second on the team in catches (56) and receiving yards (651). The Lanham, Md. native has also caught a pass in 24 consecutive games.

At the quarterback position, junior Chris Brown is 15-0 as a starter. He has completed 163 of 280 passes for 2,116 yards and 15 touchdowns. He has also carried the ball 121 times for 414 yards and eight touchdowns.

Brown also finished fourth in the Patriot League in total offense, averaging 210.8 yards per game.

"[Brown] is a solid player," Whipple said. "He's another guy we're going to have to prepare well for and be ready to compete against."

Defensively, the Raiders are tough against the run. Currently third in Division I-AA in rushing yards allowed (89.8 per game), Colgate has held opponents under 100 yards rushing 41 times over the last eight seasons, and are 39-2 when they do so.



Defensively, the Minutemen will likely benefit from the return of senior lineman Doran Davis and junior cornerback Steve Costello, who have both been out for an extended period with a high-ankle sprain and an abdominal strain, respectively.

Quarterback Jeff Krohn, who left the regular season finale against Rhode Island with a head injury, will also return to action and should feel no ill effects of the injury.

Nonetheless, Whipple knows his football team needs to prepare to come to play on Saturday.

"Basically, we just need to focus on football and play our game," he said. "Nothing that happened between administrators was in our control, so now we just need to get back to what we do and that's compete."

Saturday's kickoff is slated for 12:30 p.m. at Andy Kerr Stadium in Hamilton, N.Y.

GERALD H. LING/COLLEGIAN

Quarterback Jeff Krohn will try to lead the Minutemen into the second round of the NCAA Division I-AA playoffs Saturday. UMass takes on Colgate (12-0) in Hamilton, N.Y. for the first round of the playoffs, and will be helmed by the Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year, Mark Whipple.

Jarman scores two as UMass downs UVM

By ANDREW MERRITT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In the words of Massachusetts hockey coach Don Cahoon, last night's game between the No. 7 Minutemen and the Vermont Catamounts "wasn't all bad, and it wasn't all good."

For UMass, the good outweighed the bad, as it downed UVM 4-2 in front of 2,918 at the Mullins Center. The non-conference win boosts the Minutemen to 9-2-1 overall, while the Catamounts fall to 0-10-2.

Freshman Kevin Jarman (Aurora, Ontario) busted out for two goals and classmate Garret Summerfield (Endicott, N.Y.) scored the first goal of his collegiate career in his third game at UMass.

The win didn't come easy, though, as the Minutemen showed signs of a letdown in their first game against a non-Hockey East foe since a 2-1 win over Holy Cross on Oct. 24. While the Catamounts never really took control of the game early, the third period had them making a strong push to even things up.

"We played well enough in the first two periods to control the game," Cahoon said, "but then we were on the brink of despair in the third."

Jarman's second goal of the evening turned out to be the game winner. Senior Thomas Pöck's slap shot from the point rebounded first to Mike Warner, and when his stuff attempt was stopped, Jarman banged the second rebound home to make it 3-0 UMass.

Jarman, who played for the Stouffville Spirit of the Ontario Provincial Junior Hockey League prior to coming to Amherst, began to show signs of fulfilling expectations last night, something that has taken time through the transition from Canadian Junior A to American collegiate hockey.

"Just the thinking aspect is different," Jarman said. "Obviously the guys here are stronger and are quicker with the puck, but it's a lot about having your head up when you don't have the puck."

Jarman's solid play also allowed Cahoon the luxury of keeping junior Greg Mauldin out while he continues to nurse a leg injury.

"Kevin's play gave me the confidence to know I didn't have to bring Greg back prematurely."

According to Cahoon, Mauldin will make the team's trip this weekend for a two-game set at Nebraska-Omaha, though his playing status is still up in the air.

Garret Summerfield scored his first collegiate goal when he made a nifty move on UVM goaltender Matt Hanson just in front of the crease, and backhanded it home for a two-goal advantage at 14:00 of the first.

Stephen Werner also got in on the fun when Vermont's Jeff Miles coughed up a puck at his own blue line. Werner, on a mild forecheck, made the steal and went in alone on Hanson, wristing the puck below the goaltender's glove from the mid-slot at 17:43 of the second.

The Catamounts made things interesting in the third, when Joey Gasparini scored on a feed from Ryan Gunderson after a bevy of penalties were called following a scrum in front of Winer. The Cats added another on a beautiful pass from Brady Leisenring to Art Femenella in the slot, but they couldn't add another goal.

The Minutemen will play two games at UNO's Qwest Center, starting Friday night.

While the Minutemen's 5-2-1 Hockey East record won't be in jeopardy, Cahoon highlighted the importance of the weekend matchup.

"One of our goals is to be in a position to be a strong candidate for the NCAA tournament, and in order to do that, we've got to win a lot of games. With three non-conference games in a row, if we want to stay high in the rankings, we've got to win at least two of the three. That's why tonight's game becomes consequential."

Massachusetts passes gay marriage

UMass reacts to controversial ruling

By RACHEL SMITH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court ruled in favor of same-sex marriages last week, inspiring debate among legislators at the State House, and students at the University of Massachusetts.

However, for UMass graduate student Nancy deProsse and her partner, Flo Stern, this debate is not just academic.

The couple shares three adopted children: two teenaged daughters and a 19-year-old son. They consider themselves an average New England family, although the Massachusetts legislature has yet to recognize their union.

"We have three kids, a dog, a house and a minivan," Stern said. "How much more traditional can you get?"

Although public opinion is still divided about same-sex marriage, a majority of Massachusetts' residents believe that deProsse and Stern deserve the same civil benefits as heterosexual couples.

According to a public opinion poll by the Boston Globe and WBZ-TV — the first conducted among Massachusetts residents since the Supreme Court decided in the Goodridge v. Dept. of Public Health case — 50 percent of the 400 people surveyed supported the ruling while 38 percent disagree with the decision. A Massachusetts Daily Collegian survey conducted among 200 University students garnered much different results; 76 percent agree with the Goodridge case ruling, while 17 percent disagree with the decision. Seven percent said they didn't care.

Among the 17 percent who disagree with the Supreme Court ruling are members of the Republican Club, and members of the religious community, including Father Richard Cleary of the Newman Center, a Catholic community center and chapel.

"My feeling is you're redefining what marriage is," Cleary said. "Marriage is between a man and a woman."

Father Cleary went on to say that he supports civil unions and has "many good friends" that are gay and lesbian. However, he is taking the position of the Catholic Church and "cannot condone homosexual activity."

According to the Vatican's statement on same-sex unions, marriage exists to facilitate procreation among men and women, and same-sex unions don't serve God's plan for humanity. Cleary and the Vatican cite the passage in the Old Testament where God commands man and woman to "be fruitful and multiply" as evidence for their positions on same-sex marriage.

Members of the Republican Club echoed many of Father Cleary's concerns, but also expressed dismay over what they believe is judicial legislation.

"[The Supreme Court has] overstepped their bounds," said David E. Peterson, Republican Club President.

"Hopefully a constitutional amendment will be passed." Peterson went on to say that around 95 percent of his club's members are also against the ruling.

"It's not marriage," said Olaf Aprans, chairman of the Silent Majority and a Republican Club member. "No matter what laws are passed."

DeProsse, a graduate student with the Center for Public Policy, responded to charges of judicial legislation and redefinition of marriage.

"We have a three-part government for a reason; they all have a role," she said. "The Supreme Court's role is to interpret the law. That's what they did. They told the legislature 'you need to change the laws,' but they [the court] didn't change anything."

"It's not redefining marriage," Stern said. "It's interpreting the state constitution. The constitution doesn't say that marriage is between and man and a woman."

Dave Mason, President of the University Democrats, said the Supreme Court acted appropriately and the legislature should fulfill its responsibility to create same-sex marriage legislation within the court's 180-day deadline.

"This is a civil rights issue, plain and simple," Mason said. "By denying human beings the right to marry, we are allowing the state to create a second-class of citizens. We don't do it based on race or gender, we shouldn't do it based on sexual orientation, by cloaking bigotry with family values."

Stern also views same-sex marriage as a civil rights issue.

"This kind of debate went on about interracial couples, but that has become a non-issue at this point," Stern said. "Gays and lesbians have to take up the gauntlet. I hope this will be a non-issue as well."

UMass responded to inequities between same-sex domestic partners and heterosexual married couples by extending as many benefits as possible to gay and lesbian couples while remaining within state law.

Currently, domestic partners who reg-

Romney vetoes $10 million for UMass

By FERRON SALNIKER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachusetts Governor W. Mitt Romney vetoed $80 million from state bills designed to ease budget cuts and increase economic development, including $10 million set aside for the University of Massachusetts system.

Romney did approve key portions of two bills, including $34 million in promised pay raises for 13,000 higher education employees. However, the governor sparked flames with public higher education advocates and union officials by admitting that the salary increases would only be a one-time payment and would not necessarily be extended.

State Representative Ellen Story applauded Romney last night for not vetoing the raises, but was disappointed that governor implied that salary increases would not be in next year's budget.

"I'm grateful that he didn't veto the raises," she said, but she continued to criticize the governor for disregarding the contracts.

Under the contracts, which were approved three years ago, the employees are due nine to 15 percent raises Jan. 1. The raises reflect the annual 3 to 5 percent increases the contracts have called for since 2001.

Frank Olbris, grievance officer for the United Staff Association blasted Romney last night for not acknowledging the contracts.

"It's bad business practice, it's unfair to workers who aren't making enough money," he said. "It badgers the imagination as to what Romney is thinking about to cut education."

Story said the obstacle that supporters of the bill face now is Speaker of the House Tom Finneran.

"The Speaker is not a fan of public higher education," she said. "The only person that can initiate the override is the speaker of the house."

Legislators can override the veto with a two-thirds vote in each branch.

According to Romney, the cuts were needed to make sure the state doesn't spend too much, as it faces another potential gap in next year's budget.

"If we add another $200 million in spending now, I'm concerned that will mean more cuts next year," Romney told the Associated Press.

The UMass budget was slashed $80 million for the fiscal year that began in July, including $40 million for the Amherst campus. Chancellor John V. Lombardi told the The Republican in Springfield last week that the $10 million is essential to the success of the University. He said he wants to use part of the $10 million to hire faculty and staff to fill open positions created by early retirement.

According to The Republican, Romney said he rejected the $10 million for UMass because he didn't feel that it was necessary.

Senator Stanley C. Rosenberg, D-Amherst was disappointed with the governor for rejecting the $10 million.

"This is obviously a big disappointment, I'm hoping we can get the house to override it, if we can get the house to do it then we can get the senate to do it," he said last night. "The governor says he wants to make UMass a shining star and give it the support it needs but in every opportunity that he gets he does the exact opposite."

Rosenberg said that he and other legislators will fight for an override when formal sessions begin in January.

"The legislature needs to deliver a clear message that we understand that public higher education is important," he said.

UMass students protest in Miami, one hurt

By NATHAN CHOMSKY-HIGGINS
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Two days of protest against the Free Trade Area of the Americas late last month in Miami, Fla., drew thousands of people, including dozens of University of Massachusetts students, one of which was arrested and hospitalized after an encounter with police .

Activists were met by thousands of police in riot gear as they assembled near speakers. The total number of police for the protests, which started on Nov. 20, was estimated at 2,500 to 4,000, according to FTAA Independent Media Center and various eyewitness accounts.

A 10-foot wire fence was also erected between the protesters and the Intercontinental Hotel, where the talks took place.

The protest quickly turned violent, as activists were shot with rubber bullets, tear gas, sound bombs, a new pepper-spray type of chemical weapon, tazers and other forms of non-lethal weaponry.

"There is no way to prepare your self for that," said Emma Lang, a UMass freshman, who was present at the protests.

She described both intense feelings of community amongst the protesters and incredible tension between the police and the assembled protesters.

Lang and her affinity group, which is a small group of people who stick together for protection at protests, made the decision to act as medics during the protest. Carrying gauze, bandages, and Liquid Antacid Wash (LAW) to counter pepper spray and tear gas, they helped numerous activists who were hurt over the weekend.

Lang's group began the day on Nov. 20 avoiding the police by merging with the AFL march and pretending to be union workers.

She said that after hearing reports of protesters being beaten by police, they made the decision to head to the Wellness Center, the primary medical care facility for those involved in the protest.

Once at the Center, they began administering eyewashes and checking for more serious injuries that needed to be treated by trained medics inside the building. Police began to march toward the Wellness Center, pushing activists back, causing all those outside the Center to retreat. Lang also said police sprayed pepper spray into the center itself.

Lang said that dozens of people, including those who were unable to see after being sprayed with pepper spray and tear gas, began running up North Miami Avenue. Medics stopped whenever the police paused in the chase to continue administering aid, before starting to run again.

Other students had similar stories from their experiences in different parts of the city. Tomi Faust, a sophomore at UMass who was also present at the protests, had comparable experiences on Biscayne Blvd.

"We saw our people get sprayed. Their eyes and faces were burning and in pain," he said.

He said he was also particularly dismayed with the force shown by police to the protesters. "The police were there to protect the interests of multinational corporations that benefited from the FTAA. It wasn't about protecting people," he said.

Though the number of those arrested during the protest remains disputed, estimates range are at more then 200, according to the Associated Press. Among those arrested was Edward Owaki, a freshman Japanese studies major at UMass.

Owaki was somehow separated from his affinity group. None of the members of his affinity group were present at the time of his arrest.

According to an interview with Owaki in the Miami Herald, he hit his head against the concrete ground sometime during his arrest on Nov. 20. He was brought to Jackson Memorial Hospital where he was given Tylenol and then brought to jail.

As reported in the Miami Herald, while in jail he complained of dizziness, and an inability to keep any of his food down. He was brought in front of Judge Ivan Hernandez on Nov. 21, where he tried to accept a plea, which would have released him for medical treatment. The judge was forced to deny the plea since Owaki was incapacitated at the time. His bond was set at $500.

Lang, who was present at Owaki's release, said his friends were able to post bond and have him released from jail on Nov. 21, over 34 hours after his arrest. A medic waiting outside the jail immediately tended to him, and sent him to the hospital after noticing something was wrong. He was admitted to the hospital in stable but guarded condition in the neurological intensive care unit of Jackson Memorial Hospital.

A Miami police spokesman told the Miami Herald that he could not locate Owaki's arrest records, but that the department in general used as much restraint as possible in dealing with and

Pozar lectures on communications

University of Massachusetts professor David M. Pozar will present a lecture today in the Massachusetts Room of the Mullins Center entitled "Wireless Communications and the Pleasures of Engineering."

The lecture will take place at 4 p.m.

Using electromagnetism and other scientific principles, Pozar will explain how the technology used in popular modern wireless devices such as cellular phones, communication satellites and wireless information networks function, and how that technology may be used in the future.

Pozar believes that with an increasing percentage of people using wireless communication devices, a basic understanding of such technology is important. Pozar will also speak about the safety of using wireless devices, addressing issues such as the conversion to high-speed wireless Internet access, as well as more abstract topics, such as the spectrum of certain frequency broadcasts outside of our solar system.

In addition, Pozar's lecture will discuss the roles of engineers and scientists. Historically, scientists have developed operational models and theories, while engineers have been the creative minds responsible for finding practical applications of scientific information.

Pozar's most recent research involves antenna and circuit design for wireless systems, and ultra-wideband (UWB) devices for communications purposes.

Pozar earned his doctorate degree in electrical engineering from Ohio State University in 1980, and has received numerous awards, among them the "Presidential Young Investigator Award" from the National Science Foundation in 1984, and the Third Millennium Medal awards from the Institute of Electrical and Electronics Engineers (IEEE) in 2000.

Pozar also spent time in 1988 as a visiting professor at Ecole Polytechnique Federale de Lausanne, in Lausanne, Switzerland, and more recently in 2000 he authored the textbook Microwave Engineering.

After the lecture Pozar will receive the University of Massachusetts Chancellor's Medal, given to individuals for outstanding service to the University.

The Distinguished Faculty Lecture Series is sponsored by the UMass Office of the Chancellor and the Office of the Provost.

ister as such with the Dean of Students Office are eligible for family housing, tuition waivers, family sick leave, bereavement leave, family and medical leave, university child care, use of library facilities, athletic tickets and use of athletic facilities.

What University employees, other than members of GEO and undergraduate students, are not eligible for is health insurance. Associate Dean Eileen Stewart said state law bars the University from giving insurance benefits to same-sex domestic partners who are employees. Since student employment benefits are under the control of UMass rather than state law, domestic partners of University students are covered by their significant other's school health insurance plan.

DeProsse is currently a graduate student, and therefore, Stern is covered by her health insurance and other University benefits. However, the couple is concerned about moving after DeProsse graduates from UMass.

"I'm going to be hospitalized in Boston and only members of my immediate family can visit me — Nancy isn't considered part of my immediate family," Stern said. "This isn't a problem in Amherst, but it is other places."

DeProsse said she feels limited in her options since most employers do not grant domestic partnership benefits to her family.

In light of the Goodridge decision, couples like deProsse and Stern might find they have new and varied employment opportunities, at least in Massachusetts. The Federal government passed the Defense of Marriage Act in 1996 that defines marriage as between a man and a woman, and provides that no state has to recognize same-sex marriages or unions that take place in other states.

The Massachusetts legislature has six months to decide the fates of thousands of couples like DeProsse and Stern, and they may not decide on marriage. Charles J. DiMare, director of the Student Legal Services Office, said the legislature will probably agree to something more like the civil unions in Vermont.

"[That's] making a big assumption...that lesbians, gays will be able to get married," DiMare said. "That might not be what happens. What's more probable are civil unions."

DiMare added that he hasn't read the case thoroughly, so he couldn't comment on the specifics of the decision.

Judith Holmes, Legal Studies professor and a former defense attorney, disagrees.

"It doesn't appear in this case that civil unions would apply," she said. "This is a good, positive step, but all the case says is the legislature cannot deny couples access to a civil marriage."

Holmes has added the latest Goodridge v. Dept. of Public Health decision to the required reading for her legal writing course, although same-sex marriage cases have been part of her curriculum for several semesters.

While the political, moral, religious and legal debates over same-sex marriage and the Goodridge decision continue in the State House, classrooms and living rooms, deProsse and Stern are planning their wedding; a rabbi at the Jewish Center of Amherst will perform the ceremony.

"Our kids are excited," deProsse said. "They started talking about who will be the maid of honor ... it has been a real legitimizing experience."

arresting protesters.

As of Saturday Owaki was unavailable for comment.

On Nov. 21, hundreds of activists participated in jail solidarity protests at the two main jails in downtown Miami where protesters were being held. At one of the solidarity rallies, after speakers spoke to a crowd of several hundred about police brutality and their experiences, the crowd marched to the jail chanting for the activists to be freed.

"The purpose of this solidarity action was to show our support for our people in jail, as well as to protest the injustice of the police," said Faust, who was at the solidarity protests.

Despite what some call excessive police brutality, many activists wanted to move past it to the issue of what the protest was truly about.

"I'm really angry that the emphasis has been on police brutality and that the police were so brutal," said Lang.

"This is federal money being used to put down the voices of people who are simply trying to raise awareness of an organization that will effect people from Baffin Island to Tierra del Fuego."

There are numerous lawsuits and complaints pending against the Miami police by activists at the protest.

The rally and march was organized by the American Federation of Labor - Congress of Industrial Organizations, unions and other organizations.

The FTAA is an extension of the North American Free Trade Agreement to the entire Western hemisphere with the exception of Cuba. NAFTA was implemented in 1994 as a plan to link the economies of Canada, Mexico and the United States. It promised job growth and an increase in the standard of living for all involved.

Many organizations have criticized NAFTA, arguing that it has done nothing but increase poverty, wear down consumer protections, and promote inequality while allowing violations of workers rights to continue. Opponents also point to a reduction in environmental laws and enforcement as another failure of NAFTA.

One instance that is often cited by opponents of NAFTA as an example of its failure and misuse of power is the case of the U.S.-based Ethyl Corporation. According to the FTAA Independent Media Center, under NAFTA, Ethyl Corporation forced Canada to not only drop its ban of the dangerous toxin MMT, but also pay them $13 million in damages for lost profits.

According to the FTAAIMC, the federal government appropriated $8.5 million to the Miami police to counter this protest. They said the money was part of the $87 billion Iraqi reconstruction bill.

The motives behind Bush's visit to Iraq

President Bush spent his Thanksgiving in Baghdad this year, much to the bewilderment of the American press back home. White House officials told the press Bush would be spending Thanksgiving at his ranch in Texas, and didn't learn of the President's surprise visit to Iraq until Air Force One was already in the air, heading back to the States. Bush didn't arrive at his ranch until early Friday morning.

With the visit, Bush became the first president to step foot on Iraqi soil. Once there, Bush read a morale-boosting message to American soldiers, dished out some mashed potatoes as part of a Thanksgiving meal, and, along with national security adviser Condoleezza Rice, met with members of the Iraqi governing council.

A trip such as this one required the highest degree of secrecy and security, and the President himself has said that he was skeptical of the trip's success. This leads people to wonder why he even attempted the trip to begin with. The simple fact is, the trip will prove to be a huge ratings boost for the President. With the 2004 election right around the corner, the timing of Bush's trip to Iraq makes the whole thing seem like one big public relations move.

Only a handful of reporters and photographers were privy to the information regarding Bush's trip. This, along with the hectic nature of the holiday season, resulted in an otherwise lack of coverage of the event. The same wire photo was used on several websites and newspapers the following day, showing the President holding a Thanksgiving turkey, strolling through a crowd of soldiers wearing an Army jacket on his back and a huge smile on his face.

This image is exactly what President Bush needs to boost his campaign for the upcoming election — a campaign which has received a great deal of flack in recent weeks for the steadily increasing number of Iraqi casualties since the war ended back in May. By sneaking to Baghdad, boosting the morale of the troops, and sneaking back to Texas, Bush has given his hopes of reelection a great boost from a PR standpoint.

In recent weeks, Gallup polls have shown Bush losing ground in public opinion. This is due in large part to, as several television and print reporters have put it, the "mishandling of the post-Iraq situation" and the fact that troops overseas were said to be losing morale. By visiting Iraq on Thanksgiving, Bush was trying to prove to the American public that everything in Iraq is under control.

The situation in Iraq is clearly the biggest Achilles heel for Bush heading into the election year. Visiting the country will undoubtedly change some people's opinion of not only Bush, but the whole Iraqi conflict as well. But will it be enough? Can one trip make up for the hundreds of lives lost since the war started?

Time will tell what will happen, but the trip is a clear indicator that the election is less than a year away. PR moves such as this one will certainly become a common occurrence in the months to come.

Public access to AEDs more than necessary

Allison Edles

In today's world, people very much fancy what is easy and fast. We have very much become a "Quick Fix" society, with much emphasis placed on fast, easy pleasure with little regard for extreme consequences.

As such, many Americans have taken a liking to smoking, drinking, and overeating. With these factors contributing to high blood pressure and cholesterol, it's no wonder that the leading cause of death in America is heart disease.

Strokes and heart attacks, which stem from increased cholesterol and blood pressure, can be stopped using an automated external defibrillator (AED) by healthcare professionals. However, there have been recent trials conducted by the American Heart Association that show there may be great benefit in placing AEDs in stores, offices, and even around college campuses and teaching laymen how to use them properly. Making AEDs as common as fire extinguishers and training people to use them properly is a smart and effective way of saving lives and should be practiced in most public arenas.

According to the AHA, most sudden cardiac deaths are due to an overly rapid heart rhythm known as ventricular fibrillation. The key to fighting this condition is to shock the heart back into a normal rhythm as quickly as possible. The AED is a machine connected to two paddles containing electrodes that are placed on the patient's bare chest: one paddle below the right shoulder and the other along the patient's left side.

Once activated, the AED reads the rhythm of the heart and is able to detect whether it is in fact shockable or not. The only two rhythms that are shockable are ventricular fibrillation and ventricular tachycardia. The first entails that the lower two chambers of the heart, the ventricles, are beating too fast. The second entails that all four chambers of the heart are beating too fast.

Between 20 and 25 percent of cardiac deaths occur in public places where bystanders are available to offer assistance until emergency medical services arrive. When it comes to the heart, time is very important and if there are people available to use the AED on a patient in the time that it takes the EMTs to arrive on scene, that patient's life may depend on it. The longer the heart goes without oxygen, the lesser the chance is that the patient will survive.

With the advancements in medical technology, the AED is designed so that a person with little prior knowledge of the equipment can use it with little to no difficulty. The AED tells the user what to do, when to shock, when to check for a pulse, and when to resume cardiopulmonary resuscitation. With the instructions being repeated during the process, it would be relatively easy for any laymen or bystander to be trained in using the device.

"At this point, a prescription is required to obtain an AED, but we believe the likelihood of harm is very minimal," said Joseph P. Ornato, professor and chairman of the department of emergency medicine at Virginia Commonwealth University/Med-ical College of Virginia in Richmond, according to the American Heart Association's Web site. "These devices have been engineered so that it would be very difficult to shock someone who doesn't need to be shocked."

With the amount of deaths increasing in America due to heart disease, it is imperative that more people know how to use an AED properly, and that they are more commonly located in places such as stores, offices, and college campuses.

Today, many public places such as Shop Rite and many fitness gyms have an AED available in case of an emergency. They train their employees on how to use them properly and what to do until the emergency medical services arrive.

With the amount of deaths increasing in America due to heart disease, it is imperative that more people know how to use an AED properly, and that they are more commonly located in places such as stores, offices, and college campuses.

Just as more and more people are becoming trained in the use of basic CPR, more and more stores and locations should be carrying AEDs. It is a good safety precaution that can increase public survival rates, and for someone in cardiac arrest, it could mean the difference between life and death.

The epidemic of "coupledom"

Kimberly M. Johnson

I would like to mourn the loss of one of my best "gal pals." Recently I lost her to what seems to be an epidemic — coupledom.

Everyone knows who they are. They are those boyfriends and girlfriends that seem to be virtually attached to each other. Whether it is at the DC, in your lectures or (for some) the room next door, they are inescapable. In fact, you may even personally know a few people who have fallen victim to this apparent tragedy.

Sure, you have to admit that they do look cute together. But for anyone who is forced into continuous contact with these couples knows how that "cuteness" quickly turns into a sickly sweetness that makes you queasy. Frankly, all those funny habits he has about his food and the pet names that have been made may be endearing, but I really would prefer not to hear about it all the time. As for the PDA, get a room, and preferably not mine. It's hard to hang out with "the girls" when there is a guy around, and I don't want to cut off all contact with my friend, but he has got to go when girl talk time comes around.

Another problem I have found when trying to find some time with my friend is that she tends to only hang out with other couples, leaving me as the infamous fifth wheel. I am not about to go on a double date with them, not only because it is awkward, but also because it makes me want a guy of my own!

For anyone who is forced into continuous contact with these couples knows how that "cuteness" quickly turns into a sickly sweetness that makes you queasy.

And needless to say the moment I mention that, well, these couples have "the perfect guy" for me. "Run, run away as fast as possible," I tell myself. Not that there is anything wrong with having a significant other (I would like one some day), but as for now it seems like they are wasting of a lot of good opportunities to meet other people or get involved with school because it cuts into "their time."

I know I probably just offended many couples out there, but don't get me wrong — I don't want a break up. I just more time with my friend! Less "makin' bacon" and more girl talk and long awaited trips to the mall. That's all I am asking for, but even if I cannot fit into her schedule I will never give up hope. I will always be there for her, don't doubt that, and will have a pint of Chunky Monkey ready for her introduction back into the single life when necessary.

Alcoholism: How much is too much?

When asking a typical college student what they did or planned to do over the weekend, most would reply with a form of drinking — whether it be in the so-packed-you-can-hardly-move fraternities on frat row, in out-of-control Southwest, or at a small gathering of close friends at an off-campus house party.

There is no denying that UMass students drink, and drink well. Personally, this is what I look forward to the most and it is probably one of the most enjoyable pastimes of the week. However, the problem lies when students find themselves with nothing to do during the day and start drinking seven days a week, at all hours, no matter how hung-over they are.

Ashley Vellante

In high school, my friends and I were the party. We raged. We raged hard. Or so I thought. We would drink two nights a weekend, not returning home either night — we definitely thought we were tough. My favorite part was gossiping with my girls the next day about what I had said or how I had acted, because it was all news to me.

While social drinking is the favorite pastime of a vast majority of college students, a small number realize the monumental damage it can do to their mental health, grades, and legal and social aspects of life.

Anyone who has been drunk knows the immediate side effects, the kind that make drinking fun. Slurred speech, dizziness, blacking out, increased confidence, and vomiting on your best friend after proclaiming how much she means to you are all things every drinker has experienced. Drinking both nights of the weekend and even Thursdays will not, typically, cause major damage to one's mental health. However, everybody reacts differently to alcohol.

"Where are you Ashley, why didn't you come back?" he asked, staring me directly in the eyes with a drunken glaze. He had got out of bed and found me hiding in a room full of guys who I knew would protect me.

"I already told you, I don't want to see you anymore. Leave me alone." I yelled in an upset tone.

He turned, running through the house, punching holes in every wall on his way out the door. I darted towards the angry beast.

"Stop. Stop. Please stop," I shrieked. I tried to pull him off the door that he had cracked in half, but with all of his rotten might, he forced me off, shoving me to the floor, and took off out onto the streets of Worcester, not to be seen for the rest of the night.

I was so scared. I thought he was going to hit me. He had a big problem with alcohol and was a violent drunk, I knew ending things with him by myself would not be the best idea. He was always drunk. That was three years ago, I haven't spoken to him since.

Alcoholism as defined by Webster is a chronic disorder marked by excessive and usual compulsive drinking of alcohol leading to psychological and physical dependence or addiction. In real terms, an alcoholic is anyone who's drinking causes problems, big or small, in their lives.

However, there are numerous personality traits to spot in alcoholics. Most alcohol abusers undergo major emotional changes, with transformations in their personalities; they experience major mood swings and extremely low self-esteem issues with a deep sense of self-worthlessness.

They frequently are insecure and, due to this fact, isolate themselves and eventually becoming loners. Alcoholics oftentimes are clinically depressed, and have suicidal thoughts. There are several other warning signs that lead to alcoholism. These include: missing meals, missing important appointments, missing classes, violence, physical and verbal abuse, getting into fights and getting in trouble with the law.

Many alcoholics are troubled with mental illnesses, and experience feelings of deep depression, anxiety, and self-worthlessness. While alcohol affects people psychologically, it also affects them socially, and even legally. A survey conducted by the U.S. Government concluded that 80 percent of all sorority women, and 86 percent of all fraternity men are binge drinkers, consuming five or more drinks an hour every time they drink.

From a more legal standpoint, alcoholism has a positive correlation to legal issues. Sixty-six percent of all assaults, 50 percent of all murders, and 50 percent of all arrests stem from alcohol abuse.

While social drinking is the favorite pastime of a vast majority of college students, a small number realize the monumental damage it can do to their mental health, grades, and legal and social aspects of life.

Before you go out partying, sit down, count how many times you drank this week. Is it more than four? Why are you drinking again? Have you experienced any of the warning signs? Will you place yourself, your friends or others in danger?

If you can't answer, or you answered yes to any of these questions, think again about going out tonight. Take it easy. It is much better to chill for one night than to become or prove the statistics. The next time you do go out, have fun, party; but be sure you can handle what you are doing.

A different approach to voting

Steven Hoeschele

A guy walks up to the poll on Election Day and sees four names on the ballot. The poll worker says, "Vote for only one candidate." So the guy says, "Only one? But there are four candidates. What kind of democracy is this…?"

It sounds like the start of a bad joke, huh? (Most political jokes are…) Except this type of thing happens all the time. Let's say you're in this situation, and the candidate you like most doesn't really have much chance of winning. Yeah, you could vote for your second choice candidate who actually has a shot at victory. Or you could insist on the underdog, but risk "swinging" the election to the candidate you absolutely despise.

This might sound familiar because a lot of voters thought this same way in the 2000 presidential election. Unfortunately, what ensued in the media and political discourse was finger pointing at candidates, rather than a deep look into the system that caused the problem.

Enter Instant Runoff Voting: an electoral process used in Ireland, Australia, London, San Francisco, and at American universities from Harvard to Berkeley. With IRV, the voters rank candidates by preference, and if no candidate receives a majority of first-choice votes, an elimination process begins. The candidate receiving the fewest votes is dropped, and his/her second choices are divided among the remaining contestants. This process continues until one winner emerges with a majority.

The great thing about IRV is that it ensures majority rule, while eliminating costly runoff and primary elections.

You might think: But if someone's second choice is counted, that voter actually gets two votes! This is true, just like anyone voting in a primary and then the general election gets two votes… except it's all done on one ballot.

See, the great thing about IRV is that it ensures majority rule, while eliminating costly runoff and primary elections ($5,000 in my Northampton city council race; millions in the 2002 Louisiana Senate runoff). Additionally, the ranking process most closely reflects the voter's preference, and he or she doesn't feel compelled to vote "strategically."

Sure there are theoretical complexities that can't be covered in one editorial opinion piece, but for the voter it's as simple as 1-2-3. Surely any UMass student can handle that.

I'm writing this as the student government chancellor of elections, in order to make students aware that this novel system may be in store for the spring SGA elections.

Over the next several weeks, as part of a larger examination of SGA election policy, your student government leaders will be discussing this method of voting for campus elections — elections in which the current student trustee won with 39 percent of the vote, and the president with 35 percent.

If you want to educate yourself on electoral systems and policy, you can visit the Center for Voting and Democracy at www.fairvote.org. Even better, to get involved in your SGA, visit room 422 in the Student Union.

Pat McGee set to 'Save' music

By Meghan Healy
Collegian Staff

When Pat McGee came through Northampton recently to play the Iron Horse Music Hall, he was not accompanied by his usual band mates, John Small, Chris Williams, and Chardy McEwen. Instead, McGee gave the audience a performance that was stripped down — just a man, a microphone and an acoustic guitar.

Although Pat McGee Band is known for their lively and creative performances, it was refreshing to see the poetic front man on his own. Without the trimmings of a full ensemble, the audience was able to appreciate the essence of PMB — the complex guitar work and searing vocals of McGee.

McGee is a charming and capable solo performer, but he was quick to assure the crowd that he was far more comfortable fronting PMB. "I just wanted to get out and do some shows," he said.

The rest of the band was likely occupied with making arrangements for the group's second major label effort, "Save Me."

"Well, the next few months for gigs [are] pretty quiet," McGee said. "But don't be fooled. We are busy with Warner Brothers [the company putting out the new record] setting up everything."

Although hesitant to let go of their underground status, McGee and his band mates see the move to Warner Brothers to be a huge step in the right direction. In an open letter to fans posted on www.patmcgeeband.com in July, McGee wrote "a big label like Warner Brothers Records can break a band like us wide open if they are focused on it and, most importantly, if they believe in it."

Despite optimism about the future of PMB and "Save Me," McGee could not have anticipated the many bumps and detours along the way to producing a big label backed album.

"There are lots of things, such as meetings — and more meetings — about every aspect of the marketing and strategy behind releasing our record," McGee said.

The process has been harrowing, marked by a long delay in the release of "Save Me," much to the consternation of PMB fans.

Yet McGee remains confident that the extra time Warner Brothers is taking with the album will only make it that much better. "It would take me a while and be quite boring to you to understand why this is a 'good thing' for us, but trust me on this one."

With a release date sometime in early 2004 inching increasingly closer, it would be understandable for the front man to have some fears or reservations, but Pat McGee has neither.

"I know a lot of artists have said this, but I really am proud of this record and hope that people can get into it, but if they don't that doesn't change what the band feels," McGee said, unaffected by the thought of failure in the mainstream music scene.

McGee also remains unconcerned about the prospect of getting lost on the sea of male, acoustic-based pop-rock flooding today's airwaves.

"I don't really worry about stuff like that. I think the music stands on its own for this album. One thing I have learned is you really can't worry too much about where people categorize you — it comes down to whether they like the music or not."

He is not unwilling to recognize the facts; the ever-growing popularity of the likes of John Mayer, Howie Day and now Damien Rice, certainly tips the odds in favor of a musician like McGee. However it just doesn't seem to matter to him. Pat McGee simply wants to make music on his own terms.

It is curious to think that PMB may be lumped together with Day, Rice and co. This is a band with such an extensive touring history and a massive fan base that in the past eight years, it has spread out from northern Virginia and across the country.

By McGee's estimate they have played "over 1,500 shows in 44 states in the U.S., plus some shows in Canada and a recent USO tour to Greenland." Relentless touring has earned PMB the honor of sharing the stage with the McGee's musical heroes, the Allman Brothers, and highly respected Blues Traveler front man John Popper.

"Back in the early days of the band we had [Popper] come out and jam with us one night. That was when they were a huge band and the crowd went nuts when he walked out and started playing on our songs," McGee recalled.

The Virginia native and Longwood College graduate lists "'classic rock majors'" like the Beatles, Bruce Springsteen, Led Zepplin, James Taylor and Bob Marley along with Popper and the Allman Brothers as musical influences, though he is the first to admit his tastes vary.

"Honestly I go in phases of listening to nothing but heavy music to stages of listening to acoustic stuff," said McGee.

This vast taste in music shines through in PMB's original material and is even better highlighted by the near-legendary arsenal of covers that the band performs in their live shows. Dave Matthews Band and Simon and Garfunkel songs along with tunes like "Walking in Memphis" and "Piano Man" are regulars in the Pat McGee Band set lists.

Provincetown playwright honored

By Johanna Crosby
Associated Press

PROVINCETOWN (AP) — Award-winning playwright Sinan Unel of Provincetown is stretching his parameters far beyond Cape Cod.

Several of his 18 plays have been produced in New York, Boston, L.A. or Europe. In 1998, "Pera Palas," debuted off-Broadway at the Lark Theater and earned rave reviews from the New York critics. His play, "Single Lives," was staged by the Boston Playwrights' Theatre.

Recently, Unel was one of four Boston-area playwrights awarded the Stanford Calderwood Commission from the Huntington Theatre Company. It's a project aimed at developing new plays in Boston. "It was a total surprise and a great acknowledgment," Unel says.

Unel immediately came to mind when the theater was choosing Huntington Playwriting Fellows, says literary manager Ilana Brownstein.

"Our goal was to get writers from different backgrounds," she says, and Unel, who was born in San Francisco and raised in Turkey, fit the bill.

Unel, 45, is a vital addition to the diverse group "because he has a different take on the world and a very unique voice," Brownstein adds. "He also writes incredibly good plays and has a very theatrical style."

The commissioning of a group of writers is an unusual undertaking, Brownstein says, adding that "it's rare to have a program that gives writers the artistic freedom to stretch and grow as artists."

Over the course of the season, Unel and the other writers will become an active part of the life of the theater, which will support them artistically with workshops and readings of their plays.

The commission came at an opportune time for Unel, who admits he was feeling isolated by spending too much time alone writing in his home office.

"It's a good outlet to be around people who are going through the same writing issues," he says. "We are all different writers, but we are there to help each other."

Unel and the other playwrights — John Kuntz, Melinda Lopez and Ronan Noone — meet every two weeks to discuss their work and read each other's plays.

"I like it when people who know what they are talking about are honest and give good feedback," he says.

Unel has another vehicle for developing his craft: teaching playwriting. Currently he's giving a workshop, "The Craft of Dramatic Structure," at The Schoolhouse Center for Art and Design in Provincetown.

"Teaching helps me understand more about structure," he says.

But he learns more about his craft during those solitary hours of writing every day.

"Every time you sit down and write a play, you learn the whole process all over again," he says. "Most playwrights struggle and the work is a struggle."

Unel admits he's driven to write.

"It keeps me sane and it makes me crazy," he says with a laugh. "It's the only thing that has grabbed my imagination."

Unel planned to become an architect when he was attending the University of Kansas. But an English professor, who was also a playwright, inspired him to try writing plays.

"The first time I sat down to write a play, I knew this was what I wanted to do," he says. "It was one of those magical moments. Writing dialogue came naturally."

After college, he moved to New York City hoping to break into theater. Instead, he discovered the harsh reality of trying to make a living while working at his art. He moved to Provincetown a year later. Unel's "The Three of Cups" was produced in New York in 1986. Other plays followed, including "Tolstoy's Den," "Blue Marilyn," and "Thalassa, My Heart."

Unel credits living in the Cape-tip town for boosting his career. Several of his plays were staged by the Provincetown Theatre Company.

"Provincetown is a real art community that has been very open to my plays," he says. "That was a good learning experience."

"Provincetown is a good place when you want to be quiet and write, especially for young playwrights to grow," he adds. "The community is very supportive and there are lots of opportunities open to them. But at one point you have to move beyond Provincetown."

Eight of his plays and his screenplay "Race Point," which won first place in the 2001 New Century Screenwriting Contest, are based in Provincetown.

Unel has no special agenda as a playwright. Instead, he says, his job is primarily to entertain. His dramas contain an element of humor.

"I like it when people laugh," he says. "That's a great reaction. It's an affirmation."

Beyond inspiration Identity, mortality, death and the afterlife are common themes in his work. His plays often deal with how experiences and time change people.

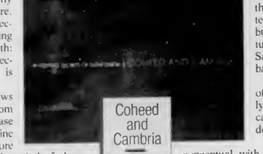
Some of his plays contain an autobiographical element, including the subjects of AIDS and homosexuality. Unel, who is gay, is a longtime AIDS survivor.

"But I'm healthy now," he says. "It's always easier to write plays you are close to, but it's also dangerous."

Currently, Unel leans toward writing plays that don't involve himself.

"As you mature as a writer, you write not so much out of inspiration. It's not enough," he says. "You also run out of things to write about your own immediate life."

Although Unel's made a name for himself by winning various awards, he acknowledges that his success has been "spotty."



"I'm not very big on selling myself," he says. "The work should speak for itself. But in this age you have to be able to promote yourself."

Yet, Unel is driven more by the desire to grow as an artist than by the need for public recognition.

"It's a very competitive field and I'm very lucky with the amount of acknowledgment I have had. People enjoy my work and I do it whether I have success or not. You can't plan your life around whether you are going to be famous. This is a gift."

Music's best kept secret

It is a rarity to come across an underground band with both the power and prominence that Coheed and Cambria exude. They hail from New York with a sound that cannot be pigeonholed and should not fall victim to the three-letter word currently undermining a genre. The release of their second CD, "In Keeping Secrets of Silent Earth: 3" shows the new direction that the band is taking.

"In Keeping" draws many aspects from their debut release "Second Stage Turbine Blade" but takes a more in-depth look into the mind of singer, Claudio Sanchez. Each song is an individual epic, beautiful, yet disturbingly dark.

COURTESY EQUAL VISION

With their latest release, Coheed and Cambria challenge modern music.

Sanchez takes listeners on a musical journey and gives them a chance to be privy to the adventures of make-believe characters Coheed and Cambria that take place on a seemingly distant world.

"This sequel is based around a premonition that one of the characters has during a dream, but that dream slowly turns into a nightmare," Sanchez said on the band's Web site.

This is seen on many of the tracks that initially appear hopeful but carefully unravel into desperation.

The record is largely conceptual, with shreds of fantasy interwoven into each track. The lyrics are intelligent and at times incoherent, but it is this uncertainty of a foreign world that makes their sound so unique. Sanchez's voice can reach unusually high pitches but also showcases a darker ability to scream with the best of them. The production value on this album is also higher than their debut, adding to the quality of "In Keeping."

The framework that Coheed and Cambria are built around is a relentless touring schedule, playing with the likes of Thursday and Thrice, and an amazing live performance. "In Keeping" is disc for anyone with an appetite for unique new music. If they continue to produce music of this caliber, Coheed and Cambria will be a mainstay on the indie scene, and inevitably influence an array of genres, bringing music to a new level.

Gallery exhibit shows 'Aftermath' of Sept. 11

From now until Dec. 12, 2003, the University Gallery is hosting a special kind of exhibit entitled "Aftermath: Images from Ground Zero."

The photographical display consists of images marking the two-year anniversary of September 11th and highlights the bombing of the World Trade Center. The exhibit's photographer, Joel Meyerowitz, began shooting film on site on September 28, 2001.

According the to University Gallery's Web site, Meyerowitz is the only photographer who has been allowed unrestricted access to Ground Zero in Manhattan.

Those who think art galleries are uninteresting or even boring will find that the University Gallery comes alive with the images presented within this ephemeral exhibit.

The exhibit is located in Herter Hall, across from Bartlett Hall, and is in close proximity to the Southwest Residential area and the Fine Arts Center.

The Gallery is open Tuesday through Friday, 11 a.m. to 4:30 p.m., as well as Saturday and Sunday from 2 p.m. to 5 p.m. For more information, please visit the Gallery website at http://www.umass.edu/fac/calendar/universitygallery/index.html or call 413-545-3670.

Being a true fan of music helped McGee find his way into the business but it was a raucous neighbor that drew him into to the music world.

"I have to credit my neighbor for influencing us McGee's to start up," he said. "He was a bit older than my brother, and I can recall him taking his guitar out in the street and smashing it on the pavement ... very rock 'n' roll of him."

That rock 'n' roll influence has served to define McGee's musical mission.

"'How would you describe your music?' That's the hardest question a musician gets asked," he said. "[I'd say] rock ... I like to think we rock. We're not Metallica, but we're not Peter, Paul and Mary."

for 209 yards and a pair of touchdowns on 17-of-37 passing.

For UMass, quarterback Jeff Krohn was 12-for-36 for 199 yards and one interception in his final game in a Minuteman uniform.

Sophomore tailback Steve Baylark gained 84 yards on 20 carries for the Minutemen as well, while junior Rich Demers carried only twice and fumbled on a crucial fourth-down conversion.

The Minutemen's special teams produced the game's first points when defensive back Leroy Brooks broke through and blocked a Jason Sutton punt, which freshman James Ihedigbo returned 25 yards for a touchdown and a 7-0 UMass lead at the 6:43 mark of the first quarter.

A questionable pass interference call then swung the momentum towards the Raiders, as UMass' Shannon James was flagged after knocking away Brown's desperation heave down the sideline on fourth-and-16 from the UMass 31. Two plays later, Brown took advantage of the break when he hit Gerald with a 13-yard scoring strike to even the score at seven with 9:44 remaining in the half.

"That was a huge play," said Whipple. "Our guys were coming off the field. I thought we had intercepted the pass. That was a big swing. We didn't respond as well as we should have."

The Minutemen went three-and-out on their ensuing possession, and freshman punter Christian Koegel was unable to handle the snap from center, forcing him to fall on it at his own 6-yard line and return possession to Colgate.

It took the Raiders only a pair of plays to capitalize on the miscue, as Branch found the end zone from two yards out to give Colgate its first lead of the afternoon. The extra point was no good, and the Raider lead was 13-7 at the 8:14 mark of the second quarter.

Facing the same deficit to start the second half, Whipple elected to kick off and take the wind at UMass' back, but the Maroon and White offense was unable to get untracked.

After driving down to the Colgate 13, Baylark lost his footing on a first down rush and three consecutive incompletions followed, ending what was UMass' lone credible scoring threat in the second half.

The Raiders were then able to ice the game, as Umass tight end Mike Douglas lost the handle on a first down reception, and Colgate's Ioth Wurst recovered it at the Minuteman 30.

Brown then found Gerald for a 30-yard touchdown pass on the next play, making the score 19-7 after a two-point conversion attempt failed.

The game marked the end of the collegiate careers of 20 Massachusetts seniors, as well as a season that saw the Minutemen set new school records for regular season wins (10) and conference wins (8).

The Maroon and White will open its 2004 schedule on Sept. 11 against Colgate at McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

GERALD H. LING/COLLEGIAN

Jason Peebler had three catches for 70 yards in the Minutemen's 17-9 loss to Colgate. Peebler finishes the year with 50 catches for 1,003 yards and 13 touchdowns.

A disaster from the start

Mike Marzelli

HAMILTON, N.Y. — What a mess.

It probably should not have come as a surprise to anyone that Saturday's Division I-AA first round playoff game at Colgate University's Andy Kerr Field was played in conditions similar to those that wiped out the dinosaurs, because there was no question that the contest was doomed from the start.

Ever since the nice folks on the I-AA selection committee decided the only way they could make sure chairman Wayne Hogan's Montana Grizzlies would be playing in their house was to deny the Minutemen the home game they earned, UMass fans have had an uneasy feeling in their guts.

So while 9-3 Montana hosted Western Illinois despite having allegedly lost to Missoula High School, the 10-2 Fighting Minutemen were busy putting their lives on the line trying to navigate their way through the land of lake-effect snow just to arrive at their first-round date.

Regardless, there was still a football game to play, yet therein lies the problem for those who follow the Maroon and White. Despite being victimized by administrators, the weather and a near-death experience, the white-on-white Minutemen not only had a legitimate chance to down the Raiders, they should have handily beaten the Patriot League champions had the game been played on anything but four inches of snow and mud.

Call me partisan, jaded or a homer, but in the opinion of a writer who has witnessed every snap of the 2003 season, the Minutemen are superior to the toothpaste crew in every single facet of the game.

Don't believe me? In looking at the final statistics, UMass bested the 'Gate in total yards, rushing 38 times for 100 yards in Siberia, and coming one square-out short of equaling the Raiders' air yardage.

Sure, I'm required to be impartial, and I think I've done a decent enough job of it all season long despite covering a team of whom I will admit I am a diehard fan. But this is my 100 percent, totally honest view of what I saw through the foggy windows of the Kerr Stadium Press Box (which, if I may add, is the lone impressive aspect of the entire Colgate athletic facility), and let me tell you, it's frustrating.

Needless to say, the 2003 campaign was a great one despite its sour ending, and these Minutemen have a lot to be proud of. In a matter of weeks, they will likely find out their future in regards to a move to Division I-A, and in case you didn't recognize Colin Stoetzel in the picture that dominated the Boston Globe's Sunday sports section, word is getting out about how good this program truly is.

Still, I won't deny that this loss really hurts. For the first time since the semester began, there will be no Minuteman football this Saturday, and that will take some getting used to. But before we know it, August will be here and a new Day will dawn in Amherst, one loaded with the nation's premier backfield, and all memory of what was truly a snow job will (hopefully) be forgotten.

McGinest returns to stifle Colts in last minute

By Michael Marot
Associated Press

INDIANAPOLIS (AP) — Willie McGinest refused to let a bad knee slow him down Sunday.

With 14 seconds left and the Colts one yard away from completing another fourth-quarter rally, McGinest got around the right side of the offensive line and caught Edgerrin James in the backfield to preserve New England's 38-34 win.

The Patriots won their eighth straight game, the longest streak in the NFL, and improved to 10-2 for the first time in franchise history. McGinest's game-saving tackle typified the Patriots' charmed season.

Colts	34

"When it came down to it for the gusto, our guys came with it on the goal line," said McGinest, who saved the game just two plays after limping off with a knee injury. "That's how you want to win it."

Indianapolis (9-3) dropped out of first place in the AFC South, at least momentarily, for the first time this year. Tennessee plays the New York Jets on Monday night.

As for the Patriots, each week they seem to find another player to fill in, and another way to win.

While Tom Brady played well Sunday, it was kick returner Bethel Johnson who turned the game and McGinest, the once feared Pro Bowl-caliber linebacker, who secured it despite the knee injury.

"I wasn't going to sit on the sideline," McGinest said.

Even before Manning tapped his rear end, telling McGinest it was a run instead of a pass, the Colts were in trouble.

James ran for one yard on first down from the 2, then went nowhere on second down. Manning tried to connect with rookie Aaron Moorehead on third down, but Moorehead got tied up on the line of scrimmage.

Manning called timeout to set up the final play and when he got to the sideline, he realized the predicament.

"We didn't have the goal-line offense," Manning said. "Everybody was in street clothes over there."

The Colts tried to run anyway and McGinest blew it up. All Manning could do was slap the field in disgust.

The Colts gambled with 3:27 to go by kicking a 29-yard field goal to make it 38-34, hoping Manning would get one more chance to win it.

New England obliged. Brady, surprisingly, threw on each of the next four plays, taking just 30 seconds off the clock. And when Ken Walter's punt went just 18 yards, the Colts had a chance.

But with time running out and the Colts facing fourth down at the New England 1, McGinest almost single-handedly snuffed out the rally.

"It was a pretty good goal-line stand," coach Bill Belichick said. "I'll put it up there, with the game being on the line."

Colgate ends UM's run in blizzard game

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

HAMILTON, N.Y. — The members of the Atlantic 10 champion Massachusetts football team have triumphed over adversity all season long.

However when they needed to most — in the opening round of the NCAA Division I-AA playoffs — it was adversity that ultimately triumphed over them.

Forced to compete in blizzard-like conditions that featured temperatures as low as 14 degrees Fahrenheit and winds as strong as 40 miles per hour for most of the game, a UMass (10-3) offense that averaged 30 points per game was shut out. Numerous slips, slides and drops sealed the team's fate, as Patriot League champion Colgate triumphed 19-7 in front of 4,197 at arctic Andy Kerr Stadium.

With the win, the Raiders (13-0) extend the nation's longest winning streak to 19 games, and also become the first team in Patriot League history to post 13 wins. They advance to the quarterfinal round of the I-AA playoffs, where they will host Western Illinois — winners of a 43-40 double overtime thriller at Montana — on Saturday.

After practicing in a driving rainstorm on Friday afternoon, the Minutemen opted to stay at a hotel in Syracuse, some 50 minutes west of the Colgate campus. Departing the hotel at 9:30 a.m. for what was scheduled to be a 12:30 p.m. kickoff, the team buses skidded off the road in the blinding snow, and did not arrive in Hamilton until 11:30 a.m. As a result, kickoff was delayed until 12:45.

"They called the state police and we were wondering if anyone was coming to get us," said UMass coach Mark Whipple, who has made no secret of his beliefs that the game should have been played in Amherst. "I didn't know if we were going to get there or not."

Nonetheless, tri-captain Anton McKenzie felt the Maroon and White simply did not play their caliber of football, regardless of the conditions.

"We knew we had to come in and play, no matter what conditions," he said. "We knew we had to come out and play our style of football, and we didn't. We just didn't come out and play."

The Maroon and White offense was held without a touchdown for the first time since a 31-6 loss to Hofstra in September of 2001. It was also the first time in Whipple's six seasons that the Minutemen have held an opponent to fewer than 20 points and lost.

"It was a great win today for Colgate and a great win for the Patriot League," Colgate coach Dick Biddle said. "This is a very good football team. This is the best defense I have seen from this team."

Running back Jamaal Branch, the nation's leading rusher, was largely ineffective for the Raiders, gaining 59 yards on 25 carries a week after a 280-yard performance against Holy Cross. It was his lowest rushing output since being inserted into the starting lineup in week two.

Quarterback Chris Brown was able to pick up the slack for Colgate, however, as the junior threw

Senior Jeff Krohn was held to 12 completions on 36 attempts, and despite throwing for 199 yards, couldn't put the Minutemen in the endzone. UMass' only score in Saturday's 19-7 playoff loss to Colgate came at the hands of freshman Amherst native James Ihedigbo, who returned a blocked punt 25 yards for a score.

Thomas Pöck's first-period goal ensured a 1-1 tie with the Nebraska-Omaha Mavericks Saturday night, a day after the Mavs rolled over UMass, 7-2.

OMAHA, Neb. — The Massachusetts hockey team (9-3-2) spent its Thanksgiving weekend in the heartland of America, but was not shown warm and friendly hospitality by host Nebraska-Omaha, losing and tying in a pair of non-conference games.

The Minutemen avoided a sweep on Saturday night at the Qwest Center, significantly improving their defensive play in game two against the Mavericks (4-8-2), skating to a 1-1 tie. Friday was a far worse spectacle, as the No. 7 Maroon and White was embarrassed by the hosts in a 7-2 debacle.

Saturday's game highlighted defense for both squads, though the Minutemen significantly outplayed the Mavericks through two periods, outshooting their opponents 16-9. But UNO sported an impressive comeback, and tied the game with just over 10 minutes remaining in regulation.

Maverick forward Scotty Turner broke up a UMass pass in his defensive zone and brought the puck down ice for a 3-on-2 break. Goaltender Gabe Winer (20 saves) stopped a handful of UNO shots on the play, but David Morelli put a final rebound above Winer's pads and into the back of the net at 9:21 of the third.

The Minutemen got on the board in the first period on a wild sequence in front of the net. Greg Mauldin put a shot on goalie Chris Holt (26 saves), but Holt left the rebound sitting loose and Thomas Pöck finally knocked it loose, and the puck slowly trickled across the goal line to give UMass a 1-0 lead at 15:09.

The defensive performance by the Minutemen was a stark difference from Friday's game, when a low-energy outing by the Maroon and White led to UNO breaking out for seven goals, snapping UMass' seven-game road winning streak and 11-game non-conference unbeaten streak.

Senior Andrew Wong scored a hat trick and freshman Kaleb Betts had two goals and an assist in the contest, as the Mavericks tallied four power play goals on eight attempts. Betts scored the game winner at 11:55 of the second period — with Mauldin in the penalty box for the second time in the frame — on a one-timer from Jason Krischuk that beat Winer low to the left side.

Just over six minutes before, the Minutemen found themselves on the short end of a five-minute penalty, as Mauldin was assessed a major for hitting from behind. On the man advantage, Jason Krischuk's shot from the point hit Wong, who was screening Winer, and trickled into the net to give UNO a 2-1 lead.

Providence College transfer John Luszcz brought the Maroon and White to within one at the 12:27 mark of the second, on his first goal in a UMass uniform. Luszcz took a pass from Tim Vitek and buried it past Holt high to the glove side, but that was as close as UMass would get.

Wong got his second goal of the game in the waning minutes of the second period. The senior moved in on a partial breakaway, but had the puck pokechecked away by Winer. The puck then caromed off freshman Garrett Summerfield's skate and past Winer to all but put the game away for the Mavericks. UNO added a trio of goals in the third, with Wong finishing things off at 18:41 on yet another Maverick power play.

Kevin Jarman got his third power play goal in two games in the first, beating Holt on a rebound of a Pöck shot from the point. Marvin Degon also assisted on the goal that tied the game at one 8:40 into the first.

Dan Hacker started the scoring for UNO in the first period, finishing off a pair of one-time passes by depositing the puck between Winer's legs on the power play at 2:00. Brent Kisio and Mike Gabinet assisted on the goal.

UMass (5-2-1 Hockey East) is off until Sunday, when it travels to Boston University (2-3-2 HEA) for a matchup with the Terriers at 1 p.m.

UMPD releases safety alert: Arsonist reported in Sylvan

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Police Department will release a public safety alert to the residents of Cashin Hall and residents of the Sylvan Residential Area today, concerning reports of someone burning items such as bulletin boards and leaving burn marks inside elevators in the area.

"We want people to keep their eye out for anyone who looks suspicious," said Pat Archibald, deputy chief of the UMPD. "Our preference is that the person stop putting themselves and others at risk."

The second fire in a series of fire-related incidents in the Sylvan Residential Area was responded to by UMPD and the Amherst Fire Department last Wednesday.

The fire department extinguished a bulletin board that caught fire near the elevator on the sixth floor in Cashin Hall. At the same time, a second bulletin board was set on fire on the third floor of the dorm. The flames were extinguished and the area was secured as a crime scene.

"Someone is getting enjoyment out of doing this," Archibald said. "We are taking reports on all these incidents. It's malice, and it's risky behavior."

Another fire was reported in Cashin Hall on Sunday, Nov. 23. Flames were reported coming from the fifth floor lobby window on the south side; a 10-by-six-inch Plexiglas strip stuck to a cement wall and a two-by-six-foot glass window above the flames were burned, with damage totaling $250.

At 8:25 a.m. on Sunday, Nov. 20, UMPD responded to an elevator with burn marks on the wall inside McNamara Hall. Then, at 9:30 a.m. the same day, there was a second report of burn marks in an elevator. The burning had damaged the plastic strip between the metal panels of the wall.

"We are talking with Housing about removing the plastic strip," said Archibald.

More elevator burn marks were reported in McNamara the next day. "We believe the [burn marks] were made with matches or a lighter," Archbald said.

A five-inch-long line was burned in an elevator in Cashin Hall last Tuesday with a lighter. Again, slight damage to the plastic wall-strip was done.

"McNamara and Cashin are so close to each other. We are getting a little bit concerned," said Archbald. "We are working with the fire department and the fire chief. A detective has been assigned to the case, as well as a fire fighter who is used to dealing with [serial fires]."

Two more reports of burn marks in elevators one and two in Cashin were reported yesterday.

Both Housing Services and Environmental Health and Safety have been notified and are expected to speak with residents.

Information Technology minor gains campus-wide support

By Liz Thompson
Collegian Correspondent

For the first time, every University of Massachusetts academic college dean has contributed financially to a new interdisciplinary minor that prepares students for contemporary job markets and has inspired cooperation toward educational enrichment campus-wide.

The deans of all nine academic colleges and schools at UMass contributed a total of $58,000 this year to help maintain and support the growth of the new Information Technology minor in the fiscal year 2004, according to Glenn Caffery, chair of the IT Task Force, which developed and manages the IT minor.

Caffery called the unanimity of the deans' contributions to the IT minor "a statement of universal support for the program."

"The dean sets the tone for the school, and faculty then follow suit," he said.

In its second year at the University, the IT minor unanimously passed by the Faculty Senate in May 2002 "to a round of applause," according to Bill Israel, a journalism professor and chair of the IT Task Force's curriculum committee.

Israel said the minor, which includes more than 55 courses in departments across the campus, is an innovation in IT education because it takes a generalist, rather than a specialist approach — aiming to give more students a comfort level with IT and the chance to use IT to innovative in their own disciplines.

"This program finally fills a void in putting out students ready for the world," said Cleve Willis, dean of the College of Natural Resources and the Environment, and lead dean of the IT minor.

"What applies to my college applies to the University," Willis said. "IT is such an important part of what the people who graduate in all kinds of areas — from nursing, to the School of Management, to humanities and fine arts, journalism and so forth — will do."

Recalling the comments of students from a variety of departments who were the first to graduate from the IT minor, Willis said, "With students, the theme that kept coming up was 'this minor is what makes my education special, and will make me special.'"

Willis said each one of the students said that the IT minor was what was going to aid them in landing a good job.

Israel said the implementation of the IT minor comes at a time when demand for IT graduates is high, citing U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics figures, which say that eight of the 10 fastest growing occupations are in IT.

Massachusetts' information technology workforce needs are also growing rapidly, according to the Massachusetts Board of Higher Education, which mandated improvement in computer and information science and technology programs in public higher education, spurring formation of the Commonwealth Information Technology Initiative (CITI), from which the IT minor was born.

An initial grant of $1.7 million from the Board of Higher Education funded a three-year CITI initiative involving all Massachusetts state colleges, community colleges and the campuses of the University of Massachusetts. UMass Amherst received $400,000 for development of IT curriculum.

The IT minor, first tested in the University's honors college in the fall of 2000, was based on aspects of premier IT programs at other colleges and universities, and research of experts in the IT field.

When asked to name deans who have been particularly active in supporting the IT program, Caffery said, "I might end up telling you about all the deans."

After a thoughtful pause, he said, "Yes, I would have to tell you about all of them."

Caffery said the School of Education is among the latest contributors this year.

"We really wanted to show that kind of strong institutional support for what is a really key frontier," said Education Dean Andy Effrat. He described IT as a "vital adjunct and tool in the process of inquiry and discovery," and discussed the importance of infusing IT throughout education programs and practices in the School of Education, in part as a way to model for students what they can do in their roles in the world.

Caffery stressed the financial support of campus deans as complementary to the "essential" support the program has received from departments and faculty.

"Every single one of our courses is taught and supported somewhere else on campus, in one of the nine colleges and schools," he said. "The most popular courses are those that exist because of the public spirit of the departments that offer them. We really depend on that."

The deans' support, financial and otherwise, "is an endorsement of our thinking that everyone stands to gain something from what we do," Caffery said.

Caffery said financial contributions from the deans are particularly significant as statements of support, given the colleges' and schools' severe budget constraints.

"In the past, deans have always had a little pot of money," he said, but this year "they really had to spend every dollar they had to meet basic needs."

Caffery said the fact that deans have scraped together the money based on the perceived benefit of the program means that he feels an obligation to realize that benefit through management and growth of opportunities the program provides.

In addition to making sure students are able to sign up for courses they want, Caffery said the IT Task Force is working to create new opportunities within the minor.

Caffery described the task force's vision to provide all students in the IT minor with an understanding of how IT works in their own disciplines.

"That means a lot of different things for a lot of different people, and we're not out to prescribe for students what they should get out of the program," he said. "We're not one thing for all students but we really try to be a set of resources for all these different students with their unique set of aspirations."

The task force's short-term goals for the IT program focus on connecting students and faculty from different disciplines with each other, and with the IT community outside the university, he said.

In addition, a Capstone project in which students could collaborate on IT research with mentors from within the campus and from the community is currently in the talking stage, he said.

The task force also is developing an informal but regular interdisciplinary seminar series about IT topics, which will eventually become symposia in which students, faculty and those in the IT industry can learn from each other's research.

The task force also seeks to package and modularize IT curriculum to make the minor available to more students on more campuses.

A special research group in the UMass Computer Science Department, led by Professor Rick Adrion, a member of the Task Force, has developed an interactive technology called CD MANIC. The technology, which synchronizes audio and visual display to provide stu-

Pozar lectures on evolution of wireless communications

Collegian Correspondent

Professor David M. Pozar spoke before an audience in the Mullins Center yesterday about the development of, and the science behind, wireless technology.

"Using a little bit of math, a little bit of science and the innovations and intuitions from some individuals, that's how engineers have designed new things," said Pozar, who spoke of wireless electrical engineers and how wireless technology has evolved.

"The actual story of wireless technology begins with scientist James Clerk Maxwell in 1860s, when Maxwell developed several equations that explain the behavior of electromagnetic waves," he said.

He said while physicist Heinrich Hertz later proved the existence of radio waves, neither Maxwell nor Hertz recognized the potential of waves for communication. It wasn't until much later, when Guglielmo Marconi experimented with telegraph signals, that the notion to commercialize wireless communication took shape.

Pozar recalled that when he entered the professional field of electrical engineering in 1980, all market surveys indicated that wireless phones would never be in demand.

While that is not the case today, Pozar said that wireless devices still rely heavily on two main ideas: the law of inverse squares, which governs how antennae radiate power, and its resulting effects on waves.

"These two principles can explain a lot of things in the wireless world," Pozar said.

Because cellular phones operate using these principles, Pozar explained why cellular reception is not always clear.

Partitioning of cellular regions (the geographic areas to which frequencies are assigned) is a large part of making wireless connections. A cellular phone is programmed to search for the nearest cellular region through a Mobile Telephone Switching Office (MTSO), and corresponds with the MTSO every eight-tenths of a second.

Cellular regions are not perfect geometric shapes, and because of this, regions can overlap or not converge at all.

"When a cellular phone cannot locate an MTSO in the nearest region, calls cannot be relayed by the MTSO to the public telephone network," he said.

Pozar said that a cellular call could depend greatly on "line of sight" and other geometry, meaning that a cellular phone needs to make a working connection with an MTSO.

If topography, buildings or movement interfere with the wave path from a mobile phone to an MTSO, the connection can be lost.

"With a clear line of sight, reception should be perfect," Pozar said. "But if the call is bounced off of objects, or if the call needs to change between MTSOs because of movement, that is problematic."

Also, because of wave properties, a non-direct wave connection may be a more stable connection.

"One reason why a call will cancel is noise, generated by thermal energy, electric equipment, the stars, the sun and cosmic background radiation, perhaps still left over from the big bang," Pozar said. "This type of noise can be heard as static on a radio not tuned to a frequency. When the strength of cellular telephone signal falls below that of electromagnetic noise, the signal will stop."

Pozar also said cellular regions limit cell phone use on airplanes because cellular regions are designed for a ground network. Mobile phones do not function as well at high altitudes or while traveling at high speeds; therefore, they will not be able to locate or switch between MTSOs as easily.

The same kinds of waves used for cellular phones are used for television broadcasts and other communication devices.

"These are the kinds of waves used universally today, such as in television broadcasts," Pozar said. "But television operates on a much higher bandwidth."

Pozar believes that in the future, the next big development in wireless technology will be the discovery of a way to implement high-speed data transfer on a large scale. He said that advances in wireless technology are incremental, and often involve trial and error, but that engineers "always look for ingenuity in creating new solutions."

Activists, health workers rally worldwide to mark AIDS Day

By Chris Tomlinson

NAIROBI, Kenya (AP) — Tens of thousands of activists and health workers rallied worldwide yesterday to mark World AIDS Day, and officials hailed new initiatives, new funding and a new pill to fight the disease that has infected 40 million people and kills more than 8,000 every day.

The World Health Organization and UNAIDS promised cheaper drugs, simpler treatment regimens and more money as part of a campaign launched in Nairobi to provide 3 million HIV-infected people with the latest drugs available by the end of 2005 in a $5.5 billion effort.

WHO also certified an innovative, generic drug for treating HIV that combines three essential antiretroviral drugs into one pill to be taken twice a day. WHO and UNAIDS promised to promote international agreements to streamline treatment programs.

"In two short decades, HIV/AIDS has become the premier disease of mass destruction," said Dr. Jack Chow, the assistant director-general of WHO. "The death odometer is spinning at 8,000 lives a day and accelerating."

Medecins Sans Frontieres, an aid agency that has led efforts to simplify HIV treatment, welcomed the announcement but said funding will be critical.

"The treatment has to be free; if the treatment is not free, they will not meet their goals," said Dr. Morten Rostrup, president of group's international council.

Thousands of activists marched and rallied in Nairobi to show support for people infected with HIV and to demand access to essential drugs.

"It is depleting our stock of knowledge and reallocating family and national budgets," President Mwai Kibaki said. "Indeed, this disease could lead to the collapse of some economies in the next few generations. We, therefore, owe it to humanity to fight this disease relentlessly."

Health and Human Services Secretary Tommy Thompson appealed in Zambia for redoubling efforts against HIV. Africa, the hardest-hit continent, cannot fight the pandemic alone, he said.

"This war has caused more casualties than any other war," Thompson said. "We need America, the European Union and everybody. Nobody is going to be spared unless we all come together in the fight against this disease."

Former South African President Nelson Mandela urged the world to fight the stigma associated with HIV, saying it was stopping people from being tested and treated.

"That is a tragic mistake, because when you do that, you make the people that are suffering feel like they are not human beings," Mandela said in Cape Town, South Africa. "Many will die because of feeling less than human."

UNAIDS estimates 3 million people have died this year. WHO says more than 5 million HIV patients need anti-retroviral drugs, but fewer than 400,000 have access to them.

Anti-retroviral drugs allow HIV patients to live a relatively normal life by preventing the development of full-blown AIDS. The drugs improve their health, but they

Hand grenade found in Leach

Lewis housing furniture burned and damaged

police log

compiled by Thomas Coyle

Tuesday, Nov. 25

2:17 a.m. A caller reported that a party had assaulted one person and attempted to assault another in Grayson Hall. The responding officer reported that no assault took place and Housing Staff was notified.

8:30 a.m. Housing Maintenance reported that the wall of the number one elevator in Cashin Hall had been burned. Emergency Health and Safety was notified.

Wednesday, Nov. 26

1:31 a.m. A party reported that a bulletin board on the sixth floor of Cashin Hall was on fire. An officer reported that the fire was extinguished and that the third floor bulletin board was also set on fire.

9:11 a.m. Housing furniture was reported burned and several items were reported damaged in the recreation room (basement) of Lewis Hall.

5:52 p.m. A party reported finding a hand grenade in a room in Leach Hall. An officer determined that it was an inert training device. The item was removed from the room and Housing staff was told to address the issue.

Thursday, Nov. 27

8:31a.m. An officer reported a subject making movies in Lot 50 near Hampshire Dining hall. The subject checked OK.

Saturday, Nov. 29

3:45 a.m. Granby Police Department called regarding documents found belonging to a former employee. Officers confirmed previous report of larceny from a motor vehicle. Granby detectives will follow up with Amherst Police Department.

Sunday, Nov. 30

7:47 p.m. Following a traffic stop on Governors Drive, one subject was arrested. Ashley Ryan Bruce, 20, of 27 Hemlock Lane, Vineyard Haven, Mass., was arrested for operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license, operating a vehicle with suspended registration and driving an uninsured motor vehicle.

For the Record

Clarification: In yesterday's Collegian, the Page One headline "Massachusetts passes gay marriage" was misleading. The Supreme Judicial Court declared that the state constitution guarantees gay couples the right to marry, but no legislation has been passed.

dents with lectures and course materials, and professors with feedback on students' use of the materials, also gives students access to experts in the IT field.

Israel said faculty resources are limited, and the technology will help teachers at UMass and other partner institutions move from being "sage on the stage to being guide on the side."

The task force's collaborative efforts also extend beyond the IT program.

An initiative that began with the library to develop an "information commons" on campus, is also now in the hands of IT Task Force members.

Caffery described the information commons as a relatively new concept developed at a number of universities, involving the integration of library, academic and computing support services, often around a physical space where students can work together and have support. Students in the IT program have expressed "a common aspiration to work with other students," he said.

"[The information commons] will really advance not just how learning happens on our campus, but provide a model for learning on other campuses as well," Caffery said. "Things like this can only happen when people campus-wide work together."

Caffery said he believes the IT minor is generally spurring a spirit of cooperation throughout the campus community.

"The campus has schools and colleges and departments," he said. "But the more we talk across those boundaries the better off we all are."

remain infected and can transmit the disease.

India announced plans to spend $44 million to provide free anti-retroviral drugs to 100,000 AIDS patients, a "significant scale-up" in the fight against the disease in a country that has the world's second- largest number of HIV-infected people. Until now, India has focused on prevention, but starting April 1, 2004, it will offer free drugs at government hospitals.

Health workers hit Beijing's streets to teach prevention in a country whose leaders have promised to fight the disease aggressively. The China Daily newspaper, citing a survey by the Health Ministry, WHO and UNAIDS, said 840,000 Chinese were HIV-positive and 80,000 had developed AIDS.

But Siri Tellier, head of the U.N. Theme Group on HIV/AIDS in China, said it was not known whether that figure was accurate. She said there has been no widespread blood testing in the country, and she urged Beijing to improve its monitoring.

The British government said it will double its funding to UNAIDS next year to $10.2 million.

"HIV/AIDS destroys families and threatens to break down the fabric of whole societies, but I believe the challenges ahead can be met," said International Development Secretary Hilary Benn.

Botswana President Festus Mogae said people must take responsibility for utilizing the free anti-retroviral therapy, HIV testing and the prevention of mother-to-child transmission services that are available.

"Unless we take it upon ourselves to use condoms and prevent HIV infection, we have only ourselves to blame for our plight," Mogae said.

Malawi's government pledged to provide free AIDS medicine to 50,000 people by 2005, paid for by the Geneva-based Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria, Vice President Justin Malewezi said.

In Liberia, which is struggling to emerge from 14 years of conflict, U.S. Ambassador John Blaney called peace the main prerequisite, since AIDS is spread in warring West African nations by troops and the rape of women and girls.

Swedish activists organized a conference called "Hope, Insight and Vision" that included conferences on children and HIV, the medical outlook for a vaccine and treatments.

In Albania, with only 116 registered cases since 1993, scores of high school students marched in Tirana with candles and a banner that read, "Protect Yourself and Others."

Possible sniper copy-cat surfaces in Ohio

Triumph reigned last week for the families of the victims of John Muhammad, who has been convicted of murder for a series of killings that took the lives of 10 people in the Washington, D.C. area. The murders unfolded in places such as gas stations, a park bench, and in the parking lot of a busy Home Depot.

Just when the terror appeared to be over, the nightmare has now begun again — this time in the Midwest. A five-mile section of Interstate 270 in Franklin County, Ohio, has been under attack. Cars and motor vehicles are being struck by stray bullets while driving down the highway. Eleven such shootings have taken place since last May.

Mostly, the bullets have caused flat tires, broken windows and holes in auto bodies. But last Tuesday, two days before Thanksgiving, a bullet struck and killed Gail Knisley, a 62-year-old grandmother.

There are no suspects in this case, and police are hesitant to speculate as to what the shootings might mean, even though ballistic tests have proven that the bullet that killed Knisley was from the same gun as a bullet in one previous incident.

According to USA Today, William Briggs, an Ohio trucker, had his truck struck by a bullet that pierced his driver's side window and "must've gone three inches from my nose," he said.

Authorities refuse to label the Ohio incidents as the work of a sniper. It is currently unknown whether the other 10 shooting incidents are related.

However, motorists are now extremely weary of entering this I-270 area. Some are even changing their driving routes. With holiday traveling underway, this situation holds the potential to end in another tragedy.

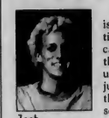
Could these incidents be copycat cases due to the heightened publicity of the Muhammad trial? The most famous "copycat incidents" were seen several years ago after the infamous Columbine school shooting in which two male students gunned down 12 students and a teacher.

There is no clear or logical explanation as to why someone would take pleasure in shooting others for sport, and police have no suspects. In Muhammad's case, there is no evidence that links him to the murders.

Although the shootings on the Ohio highway had been reported before, it took the death of Gail Knisley to activate a state and federal investigation that should have been organized when the first shot was fired.

"Until that poor lady got killed, nobody really reported the shootings," Briggs said.

While the possibility of losing one's life from an unseen, unnamed target is terrifying, J.D. Robinson, a retired prison warden, said, "I'm an old hard-lined guy: you're not going to get me to change my drive just by shooting at me."



However, with the holiday season up and coming, most families would rather take extra security precautions than spend the holiday in tragedy. Until the person or people responsible for these acts of terror are brought to justice, the motorists of the Ohio interstate will continue to drive in fear.

The capture of Muhammad put to rest something described as "the largest manhunt in American history." Hopefully this holiday season will not bring the need for another.

Hail to the UMass band

Zach Oelschlegel

Senior Day is always a time when we can honor those among us who have just completed their final season. It's the time to tip our hats and thank them for the good times. It's the time to hug them and wish them well as they move on with their lives. It's a bittersweet day for players, excited about being able to play one last time, yet sad that this is the beginning of the end.

Nov. 22 was Senior Day at the University of Massachusetts, where we honored those football players that dedicated their last four years to the glorification of our school.

Unfortunately, a few seniors were forgotten, and they weren't the linebackers or quarterbacks. While the football team did have an excellent season, there is a group of people that always has an outstanding season, yet they are typically an afterthought to the ignorant majority of campus. They are none other than our Minuteman Marching Band, the unsung heroes of UMass.

Never before have I seen such a hardworking team of students. They come to school a full week early for band camp (not counting the drummers who come back to school two weeks early and run laps around the field with those big 50-pound drums attached to their torsos).

It's not as if band camp is some easy thing. First thing in the morning, at 8 a.m., is practice, followed by practice, and maybe some more practice, all of which ends no earlier than 11 p.m. The band members wake up for the next six days to do it all again in what is one of the most grueling camps at UMass.

And you thought the athletes were the only ones who had to go through two-a-days.

Then, during the school year, the band has practice every day for an hour-and-a-half, and they will even sacrifice a large portion of the weekend doing what they do best.

Game days begin at 7 a.m., followed by another four hours of practice, and then the band wakes the hung-over students of Southwest with their Saturday ritual of marching through the Quad to play a few ditties at the Pyramids next to John Quincy Adams and Washington towers. On days when the football team is on the road, the band can be found 300 miles away, either at the game or playing in cities as random as Allentown, Pa.

In fact, what they really are is just a group of the most remarkable, fun-loving people you will meet.

Instead of sleeping in lavish hotels, the band usually winds up sleeping on hardwood gym floors. But are there any comments or complaints about their modest sleeping accommodations? Nah. In truth, the band relishes the idea of being stuck inside cramped buses, and the members are proud of their ability to sleep on floors more uncomfortable than Oprah when she wears spandex (unless, of course, the trumpets decide that pelting everyone else with water balloons is a good idea). It all begins and ends with humility.

And that's what it's all about. The band is almost never the main event. They aren't the ones scoring the touchdowns; they're the ones cheering those guys on. There aren't any band prima donnas; the talk around campus isn't about our star tuba section (although maybe it should be). They don't need to pad their stats to prove they are up to snuff.

In fact, what they really are is just a group of the most remarkable, fun-loving people you will meet. They don't put in 15 hours of work a week for a measly two-credit GPA booster or some scholarship; they do it for UMass.

No one shows that they love our school like the band does, and it shows when they strut their stuff on that football field seven times throughout the year. How many people can you point your finger at and say they care more about something other than themselves?

In conclusion, I'd like to congratulate the football team on a great season, and I can't wait to go and cheer for them next season. But I'd also like to tell the football team to go and thank the band for always screaming, hissing and being the only crazy people at the game.

So football players and anyone else that reads this: go and do yourself and your university a favor the next time you hear someone utter the phrase, "band geek." Walk right up to that guy and say, "Hey, buddy, I think you meant band stud."

Those studs have done more for our school than we'll ever imagine. Maybe next time they should be the ones we congratulate for having a dazzling season.

Ignorance leads to downfall

Dan Lamothe

While we were all away eating our turkey, two stories dominated the newspaper pages of Western Massachusetts.

In the first, Adolpho "Al" Bruno was shot dead outside the Our Lady of Mount Carmel Society social club late on Nov. 23. At nearly 58 years old, Bruno was one of the highest-ranking members of the organized crime scene in the Springfield area — a scene apparently alive with energy.

In the second story, Massachusetts Governor W. Mitt Romney vetoed $80 million in funding for economic stimulus programs across the state, including $10 million earmarked for the University of Massachusetts. The vetoed money for UMass would have gone to reversing some of the devastating effects budget cuts have had for the five-campus system over the last two years.

Rather than giving employees a raise — any kind of raise — Romney signed off on a one-time bonus check for employees and washed his hands of the situation. He copped out.

While the two stories are clearly unrelated, state administrators in Massachusetts' government can take a lesson from the tale of Al Bruno. His demise serves as a clear reminder of what can happen when someone ignores the obvious.

Bruno has been labeled a notorious mobster for years, according to The Republican in Springfield. For nearly two-dozen years, he paraded around as a high-profile gangster with style, ducking prison sentences and pistol shots along the way. He dodged long prison sentences on charges of attempted murder and conspiracy to commit murder. He lived to tell the tale after an argument in front of the Mount Carmel Society in 1993 ended with someone firing point-blank gunshots at him.

Each time, he was able to laugh in the face of danger and walk away. Each time, that is, until he was shot fives times as a gunman wrecked a pleasant evening playing cards, and he died bleeding on a cold sidewalk in Springfield. Even a man of Bruno's stature can ignore the warning signs for only so long before it catches up with him.

All of which leads us, albeit indirectly, back to UMass, and that man of the people, W. Mitt Romney.

Romney once again has drawn the ire of just about anyone involved in higher education with his latest veto of funding for UMass — money that was supposed to reverse some of the effects of the budget cuts that Chancellor John V. Lombardi covered the best he could with Band-Aid fixes.

In addition to that, while Romney approved $34 million in payments for higher education workers (effective Jan. 1), he refused to say that the increases in pay would roll over into the next fiscal year, which starts in July.

By doing so, he essentially acknowledged that higher education workers are owed more compensation than they are getting, but refused to concede to contractual obligations the state has already signed off on for workers. Rather than giving employees a raise — any kind of raise — Romney signed off on a one-time bonus check for employees and washed his hands of the situation. He copped out.

To some extent, I feel for a man thrown into the professional situation Romney is dealing with right now. He's in a typical no-win situation; simultaneously, he's balancing the demands of people who want (in no particular order) no raised taxes, raised pay and a balanced budget. All of these demands come at the same time that there's little money to be had now and the threat is there that there could be another budget shortfall next year.

There has been a nasty hitch in the way bargaining for higher education workers' contracts is done, since at least as far back as the days of then-Governor Jane Swift. Every time raises for employees have come up as an issue for the state, state negotiators have taken the easy way out: they've made promises the state can't possibly keep. Three percent, five percent, 15 percent — they're all just numbers until the contract is approved at every level of the system.

All of these things have finally come together at one time: now. The budget shortfall, the fools who negotiated the contracts for the state under Swift, overspending on things like the Big Dig — all of them are catching up to Massachusetts at the same time, leaving Romney with a small pool of options and even smaller room for error.

What Romney forgets, however, is that when he runs from the contract problem, it doesn't go away. It festers. On the books, higher education employees across the state are still owed nine to 15 percent in raises. Those numbers aren't going away anytime soon. It's a great big "I.O.U." note, and eventually the state will have to pay up.

Here's to hoping that at some point, unlike Bruno, Romney learns from his mistakes before it is too late. Here's to hoping he faces the contract issue head-on, rather than dodging it for the rest of his stay in office.

Romney won't end up gunned down in a bloody mob shooting. But if things stay the way they are, it's a matter of time before Romney's mistakes catch up to him.

European pragmatism

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

An interesting thing about studying in Europe: I feel as though I'm getting a much broader view of the world.

I say this not just because any experience of being abroad necessarily expands one's horizons simply by virtue of facing an utterly new set of diverse experiences, but rather on account of the impression that a European education has left me with thus far. This does not imply that the Brusselian school system is somehow more "enlightened" than its American counterpart, only that the scholastic approach to various fields of study, and the instruction of those topics, are much more broadened compared with the United States.

Needless to say, I feel that the lessons I have learned here are not only much more applicable to all sorts of case studies anywhere outside of the United States, but that they are also a much better reflection of the true state of the world in general.

This sentiment has nothing to do with my proximity to European Union institutions that are "at the cutting edge of politics, economics and social policy." On the contrary, the views most commonly expressed by the Eurocrats here in Brussels at times seemingly amount to little more than unsubstantiated optimism in a certain project. By no means are these pieces worthless — in fact they are quite informative — but they do tend to break down into the largely meaningless rhetoric and technical jargon that comprises "Euro-speak." Rather, it is the European scholarly community that so impresses me.

Studies here take a very dynamic approach to their studies, an approach that is based predominantly on pragmatism and factual derivations, as opposed to American views that hail primarily from zealous expressions of morality and unbridled imagination.

Furthermore, it is widely recognized that traditional schools of thought in no way apply to contemporary scenarios because of the augmented number of factors to be accounted for and the diversity of ideological approaches that now exist. European scholars are not necessarily more intelligent or down-to-Earth than those from the States, but the presence of such diverse sociopolitical interests, and government acknowledgement of this variety of perspectives, naturally leads people to incorporate many more positions into their views than generally tends to be the case in the United States.

It turns out that social thought actually does have an impact on political economy, and unlike in America, this interaction is a pillar for European social, political and economic studies.

Many of the same factors exist in the States as well, but are often cast aside by government and pretentious intellectuals as unintelligible, peripheral pish-posh: "the type of liberal, hippie bologna to be dealt with by those under-funded STPEC weirdoes."

It turns out that social thought actually does have an impact on political economy, and unlike in America, this interaction is a pillar for European social, political and economic studies.

For example, green, feminist and multiculturalist theories are not simply regarded as pesky environmental and social movements, but rather as contributive political and economic perspectives. These approaches offer new tools for analysis in practical fields while providing unique solutions that are both productive and viable. It is recognized that without their contributions, European politics and society would not be what they are today.

Of course, the inclusion of unconventional viewpoints such as green and feminist theory into European academia is a direct reflection of the institutional incorporation of such views and the societal relevancy of their assertions. High levels of Third World immigration in the past half-century has further forced scholars to realistically adapt their theory to the setting of diverse demographics and rapid societal evolution.

Indeed, popular support for progressive legislation in favor of racial and gender equality and environmental protection, particularly by the northern European states, has manifested in both domestic and European Community policy at least since the 1970s. It was precisely the importance of this agenda that immediately commanded the attention of the scholarly community in Europe and continues to do so today, thereby giving myself and my American peers here a fortunate opportunity to open our minds to perspectives that often seem to get left out of mainstream American thought and educational methodology.

COURTESY DIMENSION

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

Terry Zwigoff has a fascination with oddballs. His acclaimed documentary, "Crumb," profiled the legendary underground comics illustrator R. Crumb, and his fiction debut, "Ghost World," was the alternately tender and sardonic tale of the friendship between a caustic teenage misfit and a reclusive, 40-something record collector.

Zwigoff continues that fascination with "Bad Santa," a profane, cheerfully skewed dark holiday comedy designed to not bring tidings of comfort and joy. But for those who like their eggnog spiked, then this caustic comedy pours plenty of rum into the mix.

"Bad Santa" opens with a shot of Billy Bob Thornton looking like the world's grungiest rent-a-Santa, puking in a back alley, as the title fades onto the screen. That's when you know you're in a kid-free zone (as if the hard R-rating wasn't enough.)

This willfully nasty movie portrays "Santa" as a surly, loathsome, alcoholic wretch who can barely bring himself out of a stupor to go to drink or pick up women. Thornton, in a brave marvel of a performance, refuses to make Willie T. Soke likable for one moment, remaining as ill-mannered and grotesque as possible to the last frame; Thornton's performance is a symphonic portrayal of lewdness turned heroic.

Willie is a loser, unshaven and uncouth, who spends his days getting wasted until he's roused from his drunken trance by Marcus (Tony Cox), a little person who masterminds an annual robbery scheme: Willie, dressed as Santa, and Marcus, costumed in emerald green elf attire, pose as a team of mall entertainers, saying "ho ho-ho" to snot-nosed kids while plotting to crack the mall's safe on Christmas Eve.

This year, the squabbling pair finds themselves in Phoenix, where the loutish Willie finds himself — of all places — on the tail end of redemption.

In Phoenix, Willie makes the acquaintance of a pudgy young boy (Brett Kelly) with a truly unfortunate name and a cute barkeep (Lauren Graham, as far away from "Gilmore

'Shades' of jazz in Madlib's new album

By Peter Dale
Collegian Correspondent

Madlib's LP, "Shades of Blue," is an instrumental hip-hop album with a unique focus. Madlib is the first hip-hop artist to release an album off the world famous jazz label, Blue Note Records, which has generated music by some of the 20th century's greatest artists, including Miles Davis, John Coltrane, Van Morrison and Thelonius Monk.

Madlib first came on the scene in 1999 as a producer/MC for his group, Lootpack, out of Los Angeles. The group's first appearance on an album came on the Alkaholik's 1993 classic, "21 and Over." Lootpack is signed to Peanut Butter Wolf's Stones Throw Records and is a prominent name in the California underground hip-hop scene.

Madlib 'Shades of Blue' Blue Note

"Shades of Blue" is an attempt to pay homage to classic jazz fusion artists like Donald Byrd, Herbie Hancock and Ronnie Foster. Madlib also delves into lesser-known Blue Note artists like Wayne Shorter and Andrew Hill. Unlike many of the classic early-90s hip-hop instrumentals that sampled Blue Note by focusing on a short loop, Madlib goes more in depth with this project. Madlib focuses on each song and brings you more. It's kind of like jazz reinterpreted for a hip-hop audience.

One standout track was his rendition of Ronnie Foster's classic, "Mystic Brew" (which we all know as the beat to A Tribe Called Quest's "Electric Relaxation"). Madlib gives the listener more of an appreciation for the complexity and beauty of music that hip-hop samples from. For hip-hop fans, this is a great album to pick up to educate oneself about hip-hop's roots. Standout tracks include "Distant Land," "Mystic Bounce" and "Please Set Me At Ease," featuring Medaphor.

If instrumentals aren't your thing, you might be more interested in Madlib's collaboration effort with Jay Dee (a.k.a. J. Dilla): Jaylib Champion Sound.

Jay Dee first emerged in 1995 with his stellar production on Pharcyde's "Labcabincalifornia." Since then he has gone on to establish himself through his work with A Tribe Called Quest, Common, D'Angelo and his own Detroit based group, Slum Village.

In the tradition of Pete Rock and the Large Professor, Champion Sound is an album with excellent beats and subpar lyricism. The original version leaked online over the summer, which prompted Jay and Madlib to head back to the studio, which in turn built up anticipation for the current product.

Champion Sound Delivers with a solid 17 tracks of top-notch eclectic production. It doesn't have "lyrics that burns kitchens," as Madlib suggests in a verse, but the lyrics are decent enough that they don't put a damper on things.

MBTA plans to pit new rules against subway musicians

By Helena Payne
Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE (AP) — Tracy Chapman's journey in music took her through the Harvard Square subway station, where as a Tufts University student she performed for extra cash when she was too broke to get home to Cleveland for Thanksgiving.

Twenty years and four Grammys later, the singer-songwriter worries other artists will be denied the same opportunity to showcase their talent because of new subway performance rules set to take effect in December.

"I would hope that they would have some sensitivity to the musicians and their plight," Chapman said this week in a telephone interview from her home in San Francisco. "There are some people who are trying to make a living exclusively (by performing in subway stations)."

The Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority has unveiled plans to ban all forms of amplified music and any kind of horns from Boston-area subway stations. The revised rules also include a new $25 fee for annual performance permits and a requirement that performers be "neat in appearance" and "wear proper clothing."

Currently, permits are issued free of charge to the roughly 650 artists who perform regularly in MBTA stations. There are no restrictions regarding appearance or amplification.

MBTA spokesman Joe Pesaturo said the regulations are not an attack on subway performers but a safety measure to ensure that musicians do not drown out the public address system, which could compromise safety. A security task force has recommended banning the musicians altogether.

"Some of the people who are criticizing this, they seem to think it's a system of concert venues instead of a system of subway stations," Pesaturo said.

Chapman said performing underground will never make you rich, but the experience can still provide a valuable career boost for musicians.

"We made enough money to buy us Chinese food and get back to school," said Chapman, 39. "(But) it definitely is a way to get noticed by people who might be able to assist in a musician's career."

The Subway Artists Guild has filed a complaint with the American Civil Liberties Union and more than 6,000 people have signed a petition protesting the changes.

The MBTA originally planned for the new rules to take effect Dec. 1, but general manager Michael Mulhern delayed it for a week following a plea from state Sen. Jarrett Barrios, a Cambridge Democrat.

Barrios said he hopes the MBTA can strike a compromise that addresses its safety concerns but still allows for "reasonably amplified live music for the tens of thousands of people

Going with the flow beats cramps

Sex-iversity is a question and answer column designed to provide important information and answers to questions regarding sex, sexuality, sexual orientation, sexually transmitted infections and reproductive rights. Voiced by Julia Kristan, a member of the Voices for Planned Parenthood (VOX) group here at the University of Massachusetts and an active volunteer for the Everywoman's Center on campus, the column is intended to help educate the University community about reproductive health, rights, legislation and responsibilities. Much of the statistical information provided in this column derives from research done through and obtained by Planned Parenthood and its national affiliates.

Sex-iversity
Julia Kristan

Q. I've heard that having sex during a woman's period can ease menstrual cramps. Is this true?

A. Yes, this can be true. It's actually not merely having sex that helps menstrual cramps, but it's having an orgasm that does it. When a woman has an orgasm, she has uterine contractions. These contractions help expel menstrual fluid. (Ladies, this might mean for you an increase in the flow of menstrual fluid following the orgasm.) The contractions relieve tension in the muscles in the uterus.

It is also said that the vigorous activity moves blood and other fluids away from congested areas, which reduces pain. When a man or a woman has an orgasm, his or her body will release endorphins. Endorphins naturally relieve pain and are similar chemically to morphine. How about that for Mother Nature?

With all these positive effects, this home remedy seems nearly perfect. However, bear in mind that the risk of STD transmission increases since menstrual blood is being expelled and will most likely come in contact with the other person. A good way to reduce this risk is to use a condom. If one or both people know they are infected with an STD, it would be wise to check with a doctor before having sex during a woman's menstrual cycle. There may be other recommended precautions.

So ladies and gentlemen, just because a woman is menstruating, it doesn't mean the end of sex for a week. It can be a pain-relieving and bonding experience for both people involved. Keep yourself protected (i.e., don't stop using contraceptives and STD prevention) throughout the week and you have

'Mansion' not much of a thrill ride

By Jennifer Marcoullier
Collegian Correspondent

'The Haunted Mansion'
Directed by Rob Minkoff
Starring Eddie Murphy, Terence Stamp
Walt Disney Pictures
Rated PG
99 mins.
Grade C+

In "The Haunted Mansion," Disney does what it does best: create a perfect fairy tale world that's entertaining to the kids, not offensive to the parents, and sprinkle it with wholesome lessons on life.

"Mansion" is Disney's second movie this year based on a theme-park ride at Walt Disney World. But while the blockbuster "Pirates of the Caribbean" had a bite and brilliance — thanks to Johnny Depp's performance — "Mansion" lacks any such adult-level fare. The special effects are dazzling but most of the jokes fall flat.

The movie begins with a flashback to a gorgeous masquerade ball in a not-yet-haunted Louisiana mansion. It's a tale of star-crossed lovers. A woman apparently commits suicide and her lover arrives too late to stop her. Overcome by his own grief, he kills himself. We see him briefly swinging from the rafters in what could be a disturbing image for the film's younger viewers.

Back in the present day, we meet real estate agent Jim Evers (Eddie Murphy) who appears to have been cloned from the stereotype of a used car salesman. Vintage Murphy fans will inevitably recall his old stand-up routine about how ridiculous it is that no one in horror movies ever leaves an obviously haunted house.

Pretending to be a potential buyer of a spooky home, he mimes how wonderful the place is until the ghosts make themselves known. "Too bad we can't stay, baby!" he says and ushers his family from the house.

COURTESY DISNEY

Jim Evers, played by Eddie Murphy, has an interesting encounter with a crystal ball in Walt Disney Pictures' chiller, "The Haunted Mansion."

Ironically in this movie, Murphy's character is the classic bumbling father who's the last to figure out the house is haunted. His performance in "Mansion" is delivered in voices that belonged to funny bits from his stand-up past but that have little comic value with the material he's given here.

During the film's overly long set-up, we're clued in to what the characters — and hence the audience — will need to learn about life before the credits roll.

Jim Evers is the father who cannot help but chat up potential clients rather than get to an anniversary dinner with his wife, Sara (Marsha Thomason). Their 10-year-old son, Michael (played wonderfully by Marc John Jefferies, who gets most of the laughs), is afraid of spiders and Dad tries to use this phobia to teach Michael to overcome his fears in life. You know there's a character-building moment involving spiders coming up in the near future.

Daughter Megan (Aree Davis) serves mainly to remind Dad of how out-of-whack his priorities are, but does get to help save the day.

Just before the family is to leave for a weekend at the lake, Sara — one-half of the Evers and Evers real estate team — is invited to a mysterious old mansion the owner has suddenly decided to sell. With Dad's promise that this will "just take 20 minutes," the family stops at the house en route to the lake. The mansion itself is a crumbling gothic masterpiece that — this being Disney — looks exactly as one imagines a haunted mansion should look.

Fitting right in with the scenery are the zombie-like butler (Terence Stamp), the ghoulish servants (Wallace Shawn and Dina Spybey), a talking gypsy head in a crystal ball (Jennifer Tilly) and the darkly magnetic Master Gracey (Nathaniel Parker) who seems to have taken way too much of an interest in Mom.

The film tiptoes around the theme of the interracial affair in Gracey's past, which is a shame because that is one of the more compelling aspects to the story.

Instead, "Mansion" keeps to its lighthearted script. A sudden storm kicks up (complete with a scary music crescendo) and the Evers family must spend the night. They're soon separated from Dad, wandering secret passages, Mom being romanced by Master Gracey, and the kids chasing ghosts. But the family has to pull together to solve the mystery of the mansion's curse and save one of its members from certain doom.

Along the way we're treated to the technical virtuosity of Disney's special effects. The mansion, the ghosts and the otherworldly action are all beautifully done and almost make up for the skeletal plot. Several of the scenes may give the under-10 crowd nightmares, but the "gotcha" moments didn't get much audience reaction.

And that's the basic problem with "Mansion." There's nothing to amuse or startle the adult members of the audience. It sticks to a simplistic story and relies on the special effects to carry it. While this will be one of the better movies you'll see with a child, without one in tow you're better off looking elsewhere for entertainment.

on the subway who enjoy this aspect of their commute," Barrios said.

Street performer advocate Stephen Baird said the new rules violate the artists' First Amendment right to free speech.

"Artists make spaces more humane," said Baird, executive director of Community Arts Advocates, a group that supports street artists. "They help people connect to each other."

The MBTA is not alone in establishing guidelines for subway performers.

London's Underground implemented a licensing system this year that requires artists to audition for unpaid performance slots. Previously, street performers — known in Britain as "buskers" — were banned from the Tube.

The New York Transit Authority maintains similar rules, said John McCarthy, a spokesman for "Music Under New York," which promotes street musicians and helps to ease scheduling conflicts in popular performance areas. In New York, however, artists are not allowed to perform on the subway platform itself — a frequent sight in Boston's transit stations.

In San Francisco, musicians are allowed in Bay Area Rapid Transit stations, so long as they do not interfere with passengers waiting for trains and maintain low decibel levels, spokesman Mike Healy said.

Street performers in Washington must remain 15 feet away from all subway property.

"We don't have musicians in our system and they know the rules," said Lisa Farbstein, spokeswoman for the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority. "The folks who want to earn some money tend to be very cooperative."

Sex-iversity: some fun facts you might not have known about sex yourself another remedy for menstrual cramps.

The human body is pretty amazing when you think about orgasms helping cramps and endorphins that are like morphine. Here are some fun facts about humans, sexuality, our bodies and one about bats. These facts may vary from source to source; they are not all official records:

Male bats have the highest rate of homosexuality of any mammal.

A man will ejaculate approximately 18 quarts of semen — containing half a trillion sperm — in his lifetime.

A medical study conducted in Pennsylvania showed that people who have sex once or twice a week have slightly more healthy immune systems. Sex is good for you.

Sex is a beauty treatment. Scientific tests find that when women make love they produce amounts of the hormone estrogen, which makes hair shine and skin smooth. Don't forget all those endorphins, which help mood and relieve pain, either.

The average woman has sex three times a week. The average woman has also faked at least one orgasm (75 percent).

Most men can orgasm within two minutes of penetration, yet most women need between 10 and 20 minutes. The male orgasm will last from three to five seconds, and the female orgasm will last from five to eight seconds.

When done safely and respectfully, sex can be a wonderful thing. Communicate, ask questions and pay attention to your needs and boundaries. And don't ever be afraid or ashamed to say no.

Shins 'narrow' down new LP to indie-pop

The Shins — 'Chutes Too Narrow' — Sub Pop

The Shins are your typical indie-pop outfit, daintily creating very pretty, very fragile melodies that are as soft and delicate as a dandelion puff. "Chutes Too Narrow" is your typical indie-pop album, lush and sweetly lovely, with just a dash of retro influence, a few rustic acoustic guitars and precious lyrics. This is too gentle and unassuming to truly hate, unless you are the cold-hearted type immune to the charms of naive youth, but it's also the kind of harmless piffle that bruises with the slightest brush.

Listening to "Chutes Too Narrow" is like living off a diet of cotton candy: It tastes good, but how much of it can you stand before you get nauseous? The music is so tender that it feels like sacrilege to attack it, as if even the smallest of slights is enough to fatally wound it. But one can't help but be annoyed by this CD, which is the musical equivalent of a little kid begging for water in the middle of the night.

So, I guess that makes me a murderer, because I really do have to fault this tiny little album.

"Chutes Too Narrow" can be appreciated for its simple beauty, but there is no emotional connection to the music. It wafts into the atmosphere and drifts into the ether, with nothing keeping it from dissipating into the thin air. The New Amsterdams and Dressy Bressy both released indie-pop albums this year that had more muscle, more oomph to them. In contrast, "Chutes Too Narrow" comes across as very tasteful, but very boring and mundane.

That's not to fault the band members themselves, who pitch in with some technically accomplished music-making. James Mercer, the lead singer, has a lovely high voice, and the music has a lightly undulating slide. But it's also far too soft to engage. Evanescence, the goth-rock band, named themselves after the process of dissipating into the air. Here's a band to which the moniker would have been more fitting.

Girls" as possible) with a sexual fetish for Santa Claus. Willie sees easy prey (i.e., a new car and home) in the lonely young boy, who attaches himself like a leech to the faux Kris Kringle; but Willie, despite himself, comes to care for the boy, who's being raised by a senile grandmother while his father rots in jail for a white collar crime.

Ouch. Is this yet another story of a jerk who becomes redeemed through his interaction with an alienated tyke? Why, yes it is, but Zwigoff — true to his independent spirit — and screenwriters Glen Ficarra and John Requa (the guys behind "Cats and Dogs") refuse to budge in the direction of Hollywood sentimentality. "Bad Santa" is uncompromising in its vulgarity, misanthropy and genuine disregard for political correctness and social mores. And it's all the more refreshing for it.

It helps that the movie is also truly, shockingly funny, which makes the foul language, copious sexual references and physical and verbal abuse go down easier. It takes a certain adjustment to get into the groove of Zwigoff's slow-burn style, but it also pays off, with the movie delivering some of the biggest belly laughs of the year.

Much — actually, most — of the gags are unprintable, with the movie's language being coarse enough to make even George Carlin blush.

"Bad Santa" often falls into the scatological trap of most movies, but this time there's a curious element to the crude pee-snot-barf jokes. That is, the jokes are connected to the movie, not an element imposed on the film.

Most movies think gross-outs themselves are automatically good for a laugh, but "Bad Santa" — like the far sunnier and relatively more innocent "American Pie" movies — is the rare comedy to realize that crude humor works best when it is used as part of the plot. This movie is close to being the anti-"Santa Clause": a rude, unhinged antidote to the plastic Christmas cheer of most holiday movies.

This is a smartly adult swipe at the forced mirth and resultant stress and rage of the season, and one should cheer that these gutsy filmmakers had the courage to not cave in and make the usual tinsel-coated saccharine pap.

Bernie Mac and the late John Ritter appear, as the stoic mall security chief and the prissy manager, respectively, but their roles are largely inconsequential, as is Graham's vixen. Instead, a demented troika of fine actors makes this loopy, deranged and comically bilious comedy.

Kelly, imploring with a creepy, zombified stare, avoids the "cute-kid" tag and makes his roly-poly loner into a desperate, needy and misguided youth. Cox is as fierce as he was in "Me, Myself and Irene."

But it is Thornton's fearless, vicious and unblinking portrayal of a man well aware that he is on the edge of oblivion that is the real reason to see the movie. Thornton turns Willie into a hero, just by hinting at the desperation and sadness lurking inside his scraggly, washed out frame.

It's a moving and tragic performance, and the fact that it's in a comedy makes it all the more miraculous. It's a performance on par with the tour de force acting exhibited by Johnny Depp in "Pirates of the Caribbean," Jack Black in "School of Rock," and Bill Murray in "Lost in Translation." Who would have thought that comedies would be producing some of the most Oscar-worthy male acting of the year?

Regardless of the game's final outcome, with 12:37 remaining in the first quarter on Sept. 13, the scoreboard at KSU Stadium told a story all in itself.

Massachusetts 7 Kansas State 0.

1.) Shannon James recovers Villanova quarterback Marvin Burroughs' mishandled snap and returns it 39 yards for the game-winning touchdown in a 19-14 victory over the Wildcats.

It will be hard to find a truer example of a miracle on the football field.

Trailing 14-13 with just over two minutes remaining, a 51-yard field goal attempt by Michael Torres sailed short and to the left, and all seemed lost for UMass Needing only one first down to ice the game, Burroughs was faced with second-and-four from his own 39-yardline. With fans heading for the exits, and players reeling from the pain of defeat, what happened will never be forgotten by those who witnessed it.

Burroughs, a true freshman, never handled the snap from center, and before he could bend down to pick it up it was kicked from the pile. There, before any one of the 9,125 at Villanova Stadium knew it, Shannon James came swooping in from his safety position and scooped it up.

With the newly rejuvenated UMass sideline following him in unexpected jubilation, James sprinted down the visiting sideline and into the Pennsylvania night for the winning touchdown.

Unbelievable.

Arizona acquires Brewers' Sexson in nine-player deal

By Bob Baum
Associated Press

PHOENIX (AP) — The Arizona Diamondbacks acquired slugger Richie Sexson from Milwaukee yesterday in a nine-player deal that sends infielder Craig Counsell, second baseman Junior Spivey and others to the Brewers.

First baseman Lyle Overbay, catcher Chad Moeller and left-handers Jorge De La Rosa and Chris Capuano also were dealt to Milwaukee.

In addition to Sexson, Arizona received left-hander Shane Nance and a player to be named.

The deal was finalized after Curt Schilling passed his physical with the Boston Red Sox.

De La Rosa was one of four players sent to Arizona for Schilling, and could not be traded until the Schilling deal was finalized.

The Diamondbacks long had been coveting the 6-foot, 7-inch Milwaukee first baseman as the right-handed power hitter the lineup lacked. With Shea Hillenbrand at third base, Arizona has a pair of solid right-handed bats in what has been, in recent years, a left-handed dominated lineup.

Sexson, 28, earns $8.6 million next year, the final season of his contract. He was the Brewers' most popular player, but with the franchise looking to cut its already meager payroll to about $30 million next season, his salary was too high.

Sexson has a .273 average with 191 home runs in six major league seasons with Cleveland and Milwaukee, and he had 45 homers and 124 RBIs last season.

The Diamondbacks had no player with more than 26 home runs last season.

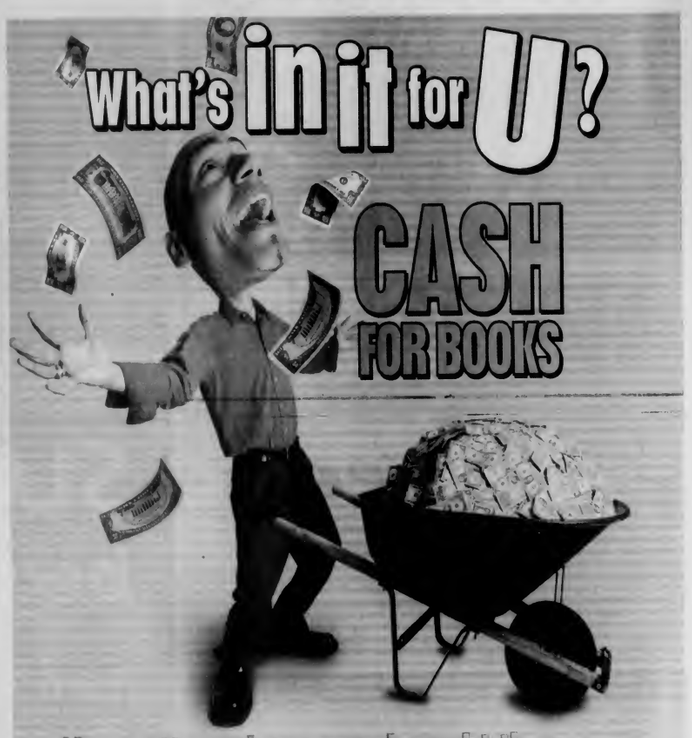
Arizona's weak offense was a major reason for the team's decline last season. Despite the loss of Schilling, the Diamondbacks think they can build a good rotation with Randy Johnson and young Brandon Webb at the top.

Counsell, a scrappy utility player and the MVP in the 2001 NL Championship Series, has been plagued by injuries the past two seasons. He is from the Milwaukee area and still lives there in the offseason. He will earn $3.15 million next season.

Overbay, a left-handed hitter, was given the first-base job by the Diamondbacks as a rookie at the start of last season after a rapid rise through the minor league system. But he struggled and was sent back to Triple-A Tucson to work on his swing.

De La Rosa, whose fastball reaches 94 mph, was 6-3 with a 2.80 for Double-A Portland and 1-2 with a 3.75 ERA for Triple-A Pawtucket last season.

The Diamondbacks have financial constraints, too. Managing general partner Jerry Colangelo wants to cut the payroll from about $94 million last season to $80 million. That meant Schilling needed to go before other deals fell into place.



The team also is believed to be shopping closer Matt Mantei.

did most of the damage in the first half, with Sharpton scoring eight points and Campbell dropping 12. Sharpton was 3-for-3 from the field with two of her shots coming from beyond the arch.

Campbell came right out of the gates with a 3-point play, which would be the last Minutewomen spark before Brown began to take control.

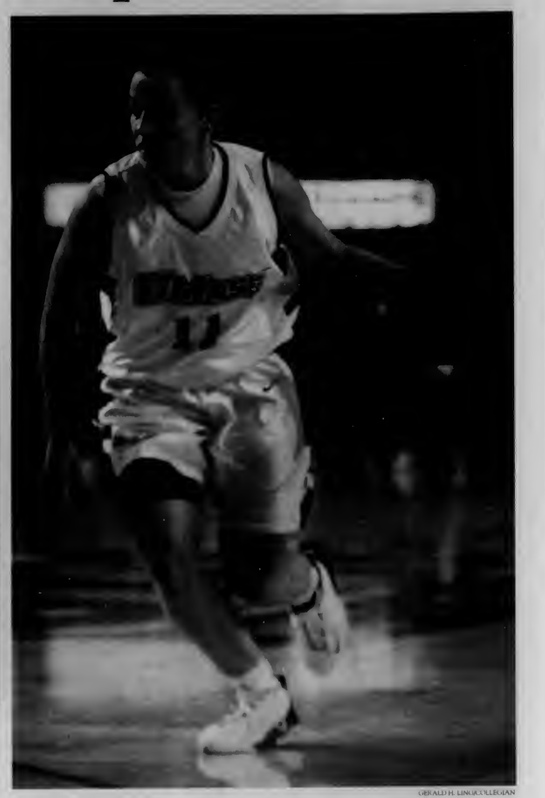
One major issue for the Maroon and White has been its productivity from the charity stripe. UMass was 9-for-15 from the line in the second half and only shot 61 percent for the game. Dacko is frustrated with her team's lack of success in one of the more fundamental aspects of the game.

"We missed free throws and it's inexcusable when you're out-rebounding people," Dacko said. "We're getting to the line now more. We need to convert from the foul line. We've got to make the little things happen."

Tamara Tatham, who has been a defensive stalwart for the Minutewomen, sealed the deal with a jump shot nearing the end of regulation. The Maroon and White scored two more baskets in the game, but relied on its defense to close the deal.

With the first win of the season, Dacko is pleased with her team's performance and is looking forward to continued success.

"You know you get the monkey off your back," Dacko said. "That's huge to get your first W, because until there is proof of a win there is so much doubt in a player's mind."



The win came one day after the Minutewomen dropped a 43-42 decision to Fairfield in the first round of the tournament. The Stags had to pull out the victory in the final seconds, forcing a turnover from Campbell during her last attempt to salvage victory.

Campbell was once again outstanding, scoring 17 points and grabbing 11 boards on the night.

Fairfield slowed down the Maroon and White offense, holding it to .340 from the field. Helping with the offensive burden was Tatham, who dropped 10 on the night after an impressive game in the post.

The Minutewomen had 21 turnovers to the Stags 17 and, along with a dismal .588 percentage from the line, sealed their own fate.

"I'm pleased with our defensive effort; I'm pleased with the rebounding effort," Dacko said, "I'm not happy with the turnovers because they are unforced errors that we are creating."

Minutewomen split weekend, record first win

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team has a few things to be thankful for after the holiday weekend.

The Maroon and White won its first game of the season, squeaking past Brown, 55-52, in the third place game of the Coca-Cola Classic at the Arena at Harbor Yard in Bridgeport, Conn.

UMass	42
Fairfield	43
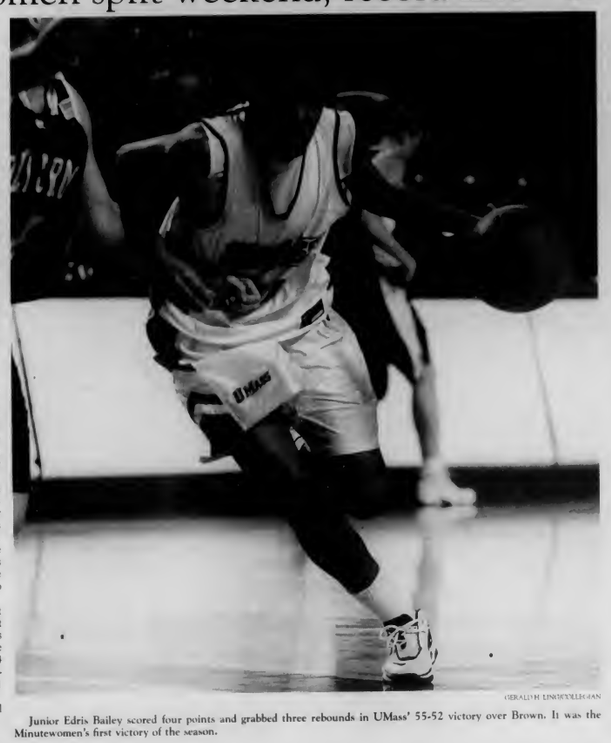
Brown	52

It wasn't perfect, however, as the Minutewomen lost to host Fairfield in the first round on Saturday.

UMass had its fair share of troubles coming into the weekend after blowing a nine-point halftime lead to Syracuse last Tuesday, dropping a 62-54 heartbreaker.



Junior college transfer Brooke Campbell led the way in the Maroon and White's first victory, scoring 20 points and 15 rebounds on the night. Campbell has been the silver lining thus far for the Minutewomen as she has averaged a double-double in her last three contests.

"She's still improving. I think that the coaching staff has focused on her in regards to her playing on her ability," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "Regardless of the outcome of the games, there are things she needs to do to improve upon her game from where she was in Juco to now."

UMass let the Bears come out to a 27-16 lead in the game, but started to emerge offensively as halftime drew near. The Minutewomen went on an 18-4 scoring run in the final seven minutes of the half to take a 34-31 lead going into the break.

Junior Edris Bailey scored four points and grabbed three rebounds in UMass' 55-52 victory over Brown. It was the Minutewomen's first victory of the season.

Football's five most memorable moments

Mike Marzelli

Swagger.

The 2003 Minutemen had it from day one. Beginning in the searing August heat during two-a-days and lasting until the bitter, snow-covered end in upstate New York, every time the members of the UMass football team took the field, they did so knowing they could win.

So while Mark Whipple's sixth season in Amherst saw the Maroon and White bring home its first Atlantic 10 title since 1999 and set new school records for regular season wins (10), conference wins (eight) and home wins (seven), there will always be a slight twinge of disappointment because fans, players and coaches alike knew that this team was capable of, and deserved, far greater.

Nonetheless, no one will dispute that it was one of the greatest seasons the Pioneer Valley has ever seen, and that Massachusetts has re-established itself as a top program both in the A-10 as well as all of Division I-AA.

With thanks going out to coach Whipple, his staff and players for what has been a truly unforgettable experience for this journalist, I give you the five most memorable moments of the 2003 Massachusetts football season:

5.) Jeff Krohn and Jimmie Howard hook up for a 97-yard touchdown pass at Villanova to establish the new Atlantic 10 record for longest play from scrimmage.

Facing second-and-12 from their own 3-yard line in a scoreless game, it was UMass who struck first in this battle of first place teams.

Three weeks after establishing a new school record for longest touchdown pass, Krohn dropped back and lofted a perfectly thrown pass to Howard. Leaping over a defender and snagging the pass at the apex of his jump, Howard took care of the rest on his own, as he raced all alone to the end zone to give the Minutemen the lead and establish a new record that should stand the test of time.

4.) Backup quarterback Steve Howell takes the regular season's final snap and drops to one knee, clinching a victory over Rhode Island and the Minutemen's first Atlantic 10 title since 1999.

It was a scene that many expected to play out on the McGuirk Alumni Stadium turf in mid-November, but few expected to see a knee other than No.7's touch down to signify the end of the 2003 season.

Regardless, with Krohn looking on from the sidelines after being removed from the game following a blow to the head, it was the junior college transfer Howell who took the final snap, setting off a raucous on-field celebration three months in the making.

Then, after he was treated to a Gatorade shower, it was Whipple who was part of a moment that signified what his team was all about in '03.

Standing next to suspended star R.J. Cobbs, a soaked Whipple addressed the McGuirk crowd about how proud he was of the way his team handled adversity all season long, and that they were, indeed, champions.

3.) On fourth-and-goal, Johnson Owumi hauls in a 6-yard touchdown pass in the corner of the end zone to tie the score at 31 and send the Minutemen into the first of three overtimes at Delaware.

It was arguably the best game a Massachusetts team has ever been a part of and, had they won, surely would have produced more incredible memories.

Nonetheless, in a battle for first place that had everything, the catch that sent these two powerhouses to extra frames makes the list in representation the contest as a whole; the best football game this writer has ever seen.

After Dominique Stewart, back in place of the injured Steve Costello, was unable to field a punt at his own 1-yard line, it seemed as if the Blue Hens had inserted the nail in the coffin when they converted the turnover into seven points just two plays later.

However, the Minutemen fought back as they had all season long, using eight plays to march 83 yards, setting up a fourth-and-goal from the Delaware six.

With the game on the line and amidst the most electrifying atmosphere in Division I-AA — 22,000-plus screaming fans — Krohn calmly approached the line of scrimmage. Upon taking the snap, he immediately looked left and lofted the softest of passes toward the corner of the end zone.

There, Johnson Owumi, playing in his only season with UMass, was waiting with his back turned to the sideline. With arms outstretched over his head, he reeled the ball in over the Blue Hen defender and fell on his back, inches from the sideline, to tie the game and silence the stunned crowd.

2.) Jeff Krohn connects with Jason Peebler for a 65-yard touchdown pass on the fifth play of the game to give UMass a 7-0 lead over Big 12 power Kansas State.

When I-A frontrunner Kansas State appeared on the Minutemen's 2003 schedule, it was touted as a learning experience for UMass. As a successful I-AA school looking into the jump to I-A, UMass administrators and coaches had an opportunity to observe a successful Big 12 program firsthand, while the players could test themselves on the field against bigger, faster and stronger players.

However, just 2:23 seconds into the game, it was Massachusetts doing the teaching against the No. 6 Wildcats. Faced with third-and-one from their own 35, and the 'Cats were geared up for the obvious rush in what was a short-yardage situation. Krohn drew the defense with a play-action fake, and fired a

Young Minutemen face stiff challenge in UVM

By Becky Horowitz
Collegian Staff

After a disheartening loss to Hartford at the Mullins Center last Monday, the Massachusetts men's basketball team has spent the past week on the court working on each of the areas it's been lacking, specifically its defense.

After the 72-66 loss, the Minutemen's problems became much more apparent. The young team wasn't able to keep it together long enough to take down the smaller and statistically inept Hawks.

With a week before its next game — tonight at home against Vermont at 7 p.m. — UMass worked vigorously to better itself.

"We spent most of the week working on our stuff, worrying about us," coach Steve Lappas said. "It's been a long week. We spent most of the week just working on the things that we need to improve on and the last two days working on Vermont.

"We worked on our defense really more than anything else. I felt that we didn't play well defensively … You have to pick something and try and correct it and spend time at that and then work on the next thing.

"I think it was good for us," Lappas said of the week off. "I didn't like it while it was going on because after you have a bad loss you want to play; but it was good for us, so we were able to get a lot out of it. I think."

Tonight's game against Vermont will be a true test for the Minutemen, as the Catamounts were Atlantic East champions last season, and entered the NCAA tournament as a 16 seed, before being knocked out in the first round by Arizona.

UVM lost a 68-67 heartbreaker to UCLA Saturday night at Pauley Pavilion, despite a tremendous effort by junior forward Taylor Coppernath.

Coppernath scored 38 points and grabbed five rebounds while also registering five assists in playing all 40 minutes for the Catamounts.

Coppernath was the 2002-2003 America East Player of the Year, as well as the 2001-2002 America East Rookie of the Year.

The Maroon and White will look to shutdown Coppernath as much as possible, but the team knows Vermont has other players to watch out for also.

"Well he's a great player. They've got a big kid who scores 25 points a game," Lappas said of Coppernath. "He played great the other night against UCLA, so we've spent a lot of time [on] stopping him. They also have a couple other guys who haven't played as well lately who are good players.

"[T.J.] Sorrentine, he's a good player. He was player of the year two years ago he was out all last year so he's kind of been a little slow getting started but we're going to keep an eye on him."

Minutemen center Gabe Lee will look to contain Coppernath, and thinks his abilities could pose a problem.

"You can always watch a good player," Lee said. "But most good players don't do everything they can do on every film. He's big and he can shoot the ball really well so it's going to be a big challenge for me."

Another big matchup in this game will be at the point, between UMass junior captain Anthony Anderson, who's averaging 15.7 points a game, and Sorrentine. Sorrentine was out last season with a pair of broken wrists, but is back as a starter and tri-captain for the Catamounts.

With the emergence of sophomore Rashaun Freeman, the Maroon and White have been stronger underneath than expected. Freeman was voted the Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week for the second consecutive time, and is averaging 15.7 points and 8.7 rebounds a game. He is also shooting 59.4 percent from the floor.

Former top Saddam deputy presumed dead

By Miriam Fam
Associated Press

KIRKUK, Iraq (AP) — U.S. troops may have killed or arrested a top former deputy of Saddam Hussein who is suspected of leading the anti-U.S. insurgency, an Iraqi official said Tuesday. Officials of the U.S.-led coalition in Baghdad said they had no information on the report.

Izzat Ibrahim al-Douri, No. 6 on the U.S. list of most-wanted Iraqis, may have been arrested or killed in a U.S. raid in Kirkuk in northern Iraq, a senior Kurdish official in Kirkuk said on condition of anonymity.

"I heard he might have been killed or captured," the official said, citing sources in his political party.

U.S. officials last week offered a $10 million reward for information leading to al-Douri's capture. Aside from Saddam, Al-Douri is the most senior official of the former regime who is still at large.

Last week, U.S. troops arrested a wife and a daughter of al-Douri in an apparent attempt to pressure him into surrendering.

In Baghdad, workers on Tuesday began dismantling four giant bronze busts of Saddam Hussein that have long been a Baghdad landmark.

The workers used a construction crane to take down the busts in the Republican Palace. The U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority announced last month that it would dismantle the 13-feet-high busts. It was not clear how long the operation would last.

A witness said insurgents ambushed American soldiers just south of Samarra, a city where troops and insurgents fought a pitched battle on Sunday. U.S. commanders claimed that up to 54 guerrillas were killed in the clash Sunday, but this has been disputed by residents and hospital officials who say less than 10 people died.

Tuesday's ambush occurred on the road between Baghdad and Samarra, 60 miles north of the capital, witnesses said. An Associated Press photographer said he saw American soldiers using a stretcher to carry a body covered in plastic. It was unclear who the victim was.

A military spokesman said he had no information about the reported clash.

In addition to attacking coalition forces, rebels in recent days have killed a number of nonmilitary personnel, including two Japanese diplomats, two South Korean electrical workers and a Colombian contractor.

Sir Jeremy Greenstock, Britain's chief representative in Iraq, warned that insurgents are now turning to softer targets and urged foreigners to increase security levels.

"People have to be very careful. The Spaniards and the Japanese who were killed this week were not following the strictest possible protection rules," Greenstock told British Broadcasting Corp. radio.

Greenstock said he was confident coalition troops would retain a grip on events and said the coalition backed the aggressive approach to tackling security problems being taken by Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez, the top U.S. commander in Iraq.

During the past month, U.S. troops have pounded suspected guerrilla targets under a new "get-tough" campaign against the insurgency. Despite the crackdown, November has proven to be the deadliest for coalition troops since the war began.

The increasing death toll has raised concerns in some nations taking part in the U.S.-led coalition.

On Tuesday, Thailand's Foreign Minister Surakiart Sathirathai said government leaders will discuss the possibility of withdrawing Thailand's contingent from Iraq if the security situation continues to deteriorate.

Thailand dispatched 422 soldiers in September in a non-combat capacity to help rebuild roads, buildings and other infrastructure destroyed during the war, and to provide medical services.

The fighting in Samarra on Sunday represented a greater level of coordination in the Iraqi insurgency, although U.S. forces said they had anticipated the attacks and blunted them with superior firepower.

Political forum hits CC

By Matt Elder
Collegian Staff

Tomorrow afternoon in the Campus Center, the University Democrats and Mass Voters for Clean Elections will co-sponsor an open forum to raise awareness about unfair elections.

The forum will take place in room 165 of the Campus Center at 4:30 p.m.

Ellen Story, State Representative for the Third Hampshire District, Lauren Mattison, a graduate student and member of the University Democrats and various professors will attend the forum.

At the forum, Mattison will open with a presentation about money, politics and how they go hand in hand.

"It's hard to run a campaign without money," Mattison said. After Mattison's presentation, Story will elaborate on the importance on the connection between money and politics.

Following Story's presentation there will be an open forum. The forum will be aimed at students. Mattison said that focusing on students is unusual, as a lot of students don't understand the importance of clean elections, and that this should be an interesting topic for students.

Mattison said that in 1998 a clean election law was passed that would help out people who had local support but not a lot of money.

Due to budget cuts, the state didn't give the necessary funding to the law. The Supreme Judicial Court then told the legislature to either fund or repeal the law, to which they chose the latter, Mattison said. The law was repealed in June of this year.

"The legislature pretty much broke the law," Mattison said about the decision to repeal the law that was voted in by a 67 percent majority five years ago.

Mattison said that the law was supposed to have spending limits for candidates, and that the limits depended on a sliding scale based on the number of people being represented.

"The candidates who win have a lot of money," Mattison said.

Mattison said that late last year, before it was repealed, some funds were allocated to candidates. However, the money was given out too late to impact the election. She also said that Maine and Arizona have strict clean elections laws, and that many other states are in various stages of passing such laws.

Mattison said that a possible target date for these laws to be voted on by the legislature is in 2006, but that is tentative. She added that to get these laws to pass and stay, we need to educate legislatures on the issue and build more support for clean elections. However, there will always be people who oppose the issue, she said.

Dirty laundry to help charity

By Michelle Dozois
Collegian Correspondent

By donating to charity, college students with dirty clothes may be able to earn free laundry service from Dirty Business, a local Laundromat that is kicking off its first annual "Delivering for a Cause" clothing drive by suspending its regular business today.

Normal service from the company has been suspended for the day so that the business can dispatch its pickup vehicles to the five residential areas of the University of Massachusetts and collect clothing donations from students.

Students living in the UMass dorms are asked to give unwanted clothes and outerwear to the Resident Assistant on their floor. All items collected will be donated to local charities.

Dirty Business will weigh the total amount of clothing donated by each floor, and will award coupons for free laundry to the most generous floor.

"Our goal is to have each floor of the dormitories competing against each other, hopefully generating large quantities of clothing and making this event a successful one," said Robyn DeSarbo, Philanthropic Chair for Dirty Business.

The Dirty Business company is the brainchild of UMass alumni Justin Zucker '02 and Michael Hauke '03, both of whom have degrees in Resource Economics. They created their business as a project for Professor P. Geoffrey Allen's Small Business Finance course, and launched it in 2002.

Dirty Business offers its services to everyone living in the Five College area, but "specializes in alleviating college students of the distracting, time-consuming burden of doing laundry," said Hauke.

Customers arrange a pickup time with Dirty Business, and their laundry is returned to their door washed, dried and folded. Dry cleaning is also available.

"We've spoken to the RAs and are really excited about this event," said Zucker. He and Hauke are eager to give back to their alma mater.

"It can be hard for college students to get involved in community service, because they're isolated from the rest of the community," said Hauke. "We started off as UMass students, and we really want to help show that UMass and the other colleges can have an impact."

Dirty Business will also collect clothing from the Greek houses today.

"There is a separate contest among the fraternities and sororities," said Hauke. "If any other organizations want to take a more active role, they're free to do so."

Students who live off campus, as well as students from the other four colleges in the Five College Consortium, are encouraged to participate as well. Students making donations individually should call Dirty Business to arrange a pickup time.

"Delivering for a Cause" will continue on Saturday. That day, all members of the local community, not just students, are invited to call Dirty Business to have their donations picked up. Dirty Business will once again halt regular business for that day, sending out its vehicles for donation pickups only.

Organizers will also set up a giant "Holiday Hamper" in front of the Amherst Town Hall on Saturday, hoping to attract downtown shoppers and diners. Anyone who participates in the clothing drive on Saturday will receive a matching voucher for free laundry equal to the weight of clothing they donate.

"Anything is acceptable, especially winter clothing," said Hauke.

RAs who collect clothing from their residents today and individuals who wish to donate on Saturday can call Dirty Business at 413-256-3478 to arrange a pickup time.

Hundreds of accidents caused by snow squalls in Northeast

DANVERS (AP) — It was just one inch of snow. It might as well have been two feet.

A powerful line of snow squalls shocked commuters Tuesday, leaving behind a thin coat of snow and black ice that made travel treacherous.

Hundreds of accidents statewide snarled major highways and side streets alike, turning roads into virtual parking lots.

The squalls lasted only a few moments as they blew across the state.

The morning commute lasted into lunch.

"Basically, I just crept along," said Carol Gist, who left her Groveland home at 8:15 a.m. for her 24-mile commute to Wakefield. She arrived at 11 a.m., with a half-eaten lunch.

Commuters in this region certainly have experience driving in the snow; last winter was one of the worst on record for snowfall. But the sudden nature of the squalls, and the timing, made even an inch too much to handle.

"The first snow, even though there's nothing to it, is always, I feel, the worst one," Gist said.

There were no serious accidents reported, and injuries were minor, in part because the snow made traffic move no faster than a crawl on many streets, said State Police Lt. Paul Maloney.

Conditions were perfect for the formation of black ice. The thin layer of snow was easily melted by car tires, then froze again on cold road surfaces, as temperatures did not rise above freezing. And the first flakes fell just before sunrise, as the morning commute began.

"It struck at probably the worst possible time," Maloney said.

Intense snowfall broke out in the Sturbridge area around 5:30 a.m. and quickly swept eastward across the state. The squalls ended by around 7:30 a.m. Visibility was reduced to as little as a quarter mile during the squalls.

Troopers responded to more than 300 accidents statewide, including at least 50 on Interstates 91 and 291 between the Connecticut line and Holyoke. Several of the crashes involved jackknifed tractor-trailers.

The North Shore and Merrimack Valley regions saw the worst of it, but the commute was slow on nearly every route into and around Boston. Because of the heavy traffic, road crews had trouble treating the roads.

And, in a bit of irony, a Statehouse hearing on a dispute between the state and snow plowers had to be delayed for an hour because two buses carrying plow drivers were stuck in traffic. Sen. Robert A. Havern III, D-Arlington, who held the hearing, said drivers will refuse to plow after Jan. 1 if the state continues with a plan to require them to carry global positioning satellite systems to track their location.

Some drivers said they had sand trucks at the ready Tuesday morning, but were never called. The highway department said they will not be used if they don't agree to use the tracking system.

"There's a disconnect between the highway department and the snow and ice operators," Havern said.

About 150 snow and ice contractors who agreed to the satellite tracking were on the roads Tuesday but had difficulty even getting to the supply depots because traffic snarled so quickly.

"It was very unique and it caught a lot of people by surprise," said Jon Carlisle, spokesman for MassHighway. "Rather than flurries that were predicted it was snow squalls."

Compiled by Sara-Megan Walsh

December 3 - December 9 2003

Today

Hampshire College — Marcelius Andrews will speak about affirmative action in higher education in the lecture, "Race, Equality and Scarcity: Affirmative Action and the Diversity Trap as Barriers to Economic Justice." The lecture is at 5 p.m. in West Lecture Hall of Franklin Patterson Hall.

Smith College — The Western Massachusetts Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender Political Alliance, the Project on Women and Social Change, and Spectrum are sponsoring a Same-sex Civil Marriage Panel at 7 p.m. in Graham Hill, Hillyer of the Brown Fine Art Center. Panelists include Jennifer Levi, an attorney with the Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders, Robyn MaGuire, of the Freedom to Marry Coalition and Heidi Norton and Gina Smith, plaintiffs in the same-sex marriage suit before the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court.

Smith College — Daniel Goleman, author of Destructive Emotions, will hold the lecture, "The Lama in the Lab: Buddhism and Cognitive Neuroscience in Dialogue." He will discuss the possible implications Buddhism has on health, well-being and training the mind. The lecture is at 7:30 p.m. in Neilson Library Browsing Room.

Tomorrow

Hampshire College — Lewis R. Gordon, President of the Caribbean Philosophical Association, will give the lecture "Must Revolutionaries Sing the Blues? Some Thoughts on Fanon and the Leitmotif of Modern Life." The lecture is at 4 p.m. in the West Lecture Hall of Franklin Patterson Hall.

Mount Holyoke College — Anne Hendrixson, of The Committee on Women, Population and the Environment, will give the lecture "Beyond the Hype: Toward Justice for Young People." The lecture is at the Five College Women's Studies Research Center located at 83 College St. at 7:30 p.m.

Smith College — At 8 p.m., Michael Ignatieff will speak on "The Lesser Evil: Hard Choices in the War on Terror" for the annual Frank and Lois Green Schwoerer Class of '49 History Department lecture. The lecture is in Theatre 14 of the Mendenhall Center for Performing Arts.

Friday 5

University of Massachusetts — The Student Chapter of the American Institute of Floral Designers is hosting its annual Holiday Bazaar from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. in French Hall 105. Holiday flowers, centerpieces and wreaths will be on sale to help raise money for the students to attend a national symposium in July.

Saturday 6

Hampshire College — The Hampshire College Chorus and Friends will present an eclectic seasonal program at 3 p.m. in the Recital Hall of the Music and Dance Building. A multicultural holiday sing-along and reception will follow the concert.

UMass — At 8 p.m., the Opus One String Ensemble will perform in the Bezanson Recital Hall. Pieces will include Haydn's "Cello and Violin Concertos," featuring Sean Murray on cello and Julia Koo on violin, and Gnatali's "Marimba Concerto" featuring Fabio de Oliveira on marimba and Philip Glass' "Company."

Sunday 7

Hampshire College — From 9 a.m. to 4 p.m., Artistry in Iron: Third Annual Blacksmithing Meet will take place at the Lemelson Center. The blacksmithing conference includes speakers such as Susan Madasci, an accomplished blacksmith whose work ranges from sculpture to architectural decoration as well as functional items, to various demonstrations, workshops and project displays. For more information contact Don Dupuis at 413-559-5346.

UMass — At 2 p.m., Beloved Opera Ensembles-Opera Workshop will be held in the Bezanson Recital Hall. The workshop features alumni and students performing works and pieces from "Rigoletto," "Carmen," "Marriage of Figaro," "Lakme," "Barber of Seville," "Cosi fan tutte" and "Madame Butterfly." Tickets are $5 to $10 and available through the Fine Arts Center Box Office.

Monday 8

UMass — At 7:30 p.m., the Graduate String Quartet will perform works by Mozart, Beethoven and Debussy in Bezanson Recital Hall. The Quartet includes Amanda Burr and Kalila Graef on violin, Stan Renard on viola and Sean Murray on cello.

Tuesday 9

Smith College — Dr. Judith Ramaley, assistant director of education and human resources directorate at the National Science Foundation, will speak at 4:30 p.m. in McConnell 404. In the case that a larger attendance arrives than McConnell 404 can hold, the event will be held in McConnell Auditorium. A reception will precede the lecture in McConnell's foyer.

Smith College — At 7:30 p.m., MFA Grad Event will be held in Scott Dance Studio. The event features a night of dance performances with works by Madelyne Camera, Kelly Parsley, Jillian Sweeney and Mary Vogt.

Random shootings linked by authorities

By Anita Chang
Associated Press

COLUMBUS, Ohio (AP) — Authorities have linked 12 shootings along a five-mile stretch of interstate around Columbus, including one that killed a woman and another that broke a window at an elementary school.

Four of the shootings — three at vehicles and one at the school last month — were from the same gun, Franklin County Sheriff's Chief Deputy Steve Martin said Tuesday.

Although ballistics tests could not link the rest of the shootings along Interstate 270, investigators said they "are comfortable" saying all 12 are connected, he said. He would not elaborate.

Authorities have received more than 500 tips, but would not speculate about who the shooter might be and would not release the type of weapon.

"Collectively, we think it's not good for us to put that information out," Martin said.

The shootings began in May along Interstate 270, the freeway that circles Columbus. Many were not reported until after Nov. 25, when 62-year-old Gail Knisley was killed by a bullet that pierced the side of a car driven by a friend.

The latest shooting linked to the spree was a Nov. 11 shooting at Hamilton Central Elementary in Obetz, about two miles from the freeway.

Superintendent Bill Witman said he believes the shooting was not meant to harm anyone because it happened overnight, but nervous parents expressed concern.

Tiffany Ellis, 32, said her son's second-grade classroom faces the front of the school, where the bullet struck.

"It makes me angry to be honest with you, that I have to drive down the road worrying about getting shot," Ellis said Tuesday.

She said she plans to call Wednesday to see what precautions the district is taking, and may avoid her own living room, which also faces the two-lane road.

"That's kind of scary to think someone could shoot through your window like that," Ellis said.

Greg Mellon said his 8-year-old son "ducked down in the car" on the way to his recreation league basketball practice at the school Tuesday night.

"Of course he's thinking about it," Mellon said.

A house was shot at Tuesday near the freeway, but Martin said investigators have not linked it to the other shootings.

Local businesses have established a $10,000 reward for information leading to an arrest.

Criminal behavior experts have varying opinions on who's behind the attacks. Jack Levin, a Northeastern University criminologist, believes two people could be responsible.

"When I see a crime like this it's almost always two friends who probably wouldn't do this separately, but when they're together there's a certain chemistry, a certain insanity," said Levin, director of Northeastern's Brudnick Center on Violence.

"How do you share the joy of killing or causing problems if you're alone? You can't brag about it or someone will turn you in," he said.

But N.G. Berrill, a psychologist who profiles killers at his New York forensic consulting firm, said the shooter is probably a young male who feels frustrated and generally powerless in his life.

"It's almost an infantile rage is the way I would describe it," he said.

Berrill said the shootings were the work of a person who loves the thrill of causing panic, although he may not intend to kill.

The shooter is likely someone from the surrounding community, said Lou Palumbo, a retired police investigator who runs a private security and investigation organization called The Elite Agency Limited.

Donations: getting in the spirit of giving

Now that the snow has begun to fall, it marks the beginning of the holiday season. While this usually means the beginning of frenzied shopping and overeating, it should also mean that people are beginning to open up their hearts. This is often one of the most difficult times of year for people who are in need, and even the smallest gesture on our parts can make a big difference in someone's life.

Of course, we are all college students, and are, therefore, poor. However, even if you do not have a nickel to spare, there are other ways to make a donation and help out besides giving money. Starting this week, there will be community drives going on for nearly everything — especially toys and blood — and it will all be going on right here in the Pioneer Valley.

The goal of a toy drive is to provide toys for children who would otherwise receive nothing for the holidays. The sponsor collects new or used toys that are in good condition and takes care of distributing them to needy children in the area. This year, News Channel 40 is sponsoring one such drive, and Hadley's Big Y Supermarket is one of the drop-off zones. This is, of course, in addition to the toy drive Coolidge Hall in Southwest is running right here on campus. What a good way for us, as students, to help out the community in which we live.

Blood is another commodity that is needed around this time of year especially. Many families have members whose lives depend on receiving blood, and the Red Cross does its best to supply everyone in need. But without enough donors, there is always a shortage. Giving one pint of blood can save the lives of up to three people, and the process takes less than an hour. There are blood drives frequently scheduled in the basement of the Campus Center. There are other local spots where blood donations will be collected. To find more information on other local drives or to make an appointment to donate, visit www.givelife.org. The greatest gift you can give someone is a second chance at life.

So even though our pockets may be empty, there are still plenty of things we can do to help out the community. So forget about finals for an hour, and get into the spirit of giving. What better time is there than this holiday season? These next few weeks before the holidays are the most crucial for those in need. You alone can make the difference in someone's life, and the organizations in this area could not make it any easier for us to participate. This is the season of giving, so let's get out there and give back to our community.

The feminist epiphany

S.J. Port

The Women's movement has failed to appreciate its success. The feminists of yesteryear predicted that the women of today would embrace the rights hard won for them with open arms, leaving the kitchen in herds to challenge the so-called male world, beginning with its workforce. What they didn't expect was for women to remain in the home and return to traditional care taking positions in society, rejecting the professional for the personal. What they missed was that included in the rights they earned for their daughters was the right to care for future daughters, the right to choose the traditional caretaker role of mother, wife and homemaker.

American women today have rights equal to their male counterparts. We are protected as full citizens under the Constitution of the United States of America. Furthermore, we have options within society born of these legal changes. It is these very options, and the women who opt out of a professional career for a personal one, that beg the question, for the militant feminists of our mother's day, whether the women's movement was successful at all.

The women's movement did not fail: It succeeded in garnering equal rights (although equal pay has yet to be seen) for women in the United States and inspired comparable movements in other nations. The antipode to the feminist success is society's (created of both men and women) dismal failure to recognize the burden placed upon the emancipated woman.

It is considered, incorrectly, "a man's world" simply because certain societal expectations and biological realities make the world a much more challenging place for women.

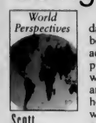
It is considered, incorrectly, "a man's world" simply because certain societal expectations and biological realities make the world a much more challenging place for women. Women carry too great a burden, and often choose to accept this overwhelming burden. The laggard changes to male life across generations continue to impede not only women's development outside the home, but also society's transition to a balanced and truly equal life for all genders.

Traditionally, a man's life is simpler than a woman's. He is born, cared for, educated, raised to provide financially for his partner or family (if he chooses to have a partner and family) and then he dies. This process has remained relatively unchanged for centuries. The static male role's foil is the dramatic change in women's lives; from the conservative and traditional role as first daughter, then wife, and finally mother to the modern female life position of someone with almost too many choices and expectations.

As little girls we are told we can do anything. What we hear is: "you can do everything," and do everything all at once.

As a consequence of new rights, women are expected to perform outside of the home in the workplace. Women can do it all — run the office and the home. Men are equally capable of care taking, however it is still not common that they take on the role, forcing their female partners to do so. (I hope that with our generation this continues to change.) You can be an educated woman, take on the male workplace and lead a company as CEO and have a family nestled securely into the perfect home with a happy and securely masculine male figure standing equally by our side. Many women are realizing that raising children and running a home is a profession unto itself, and giving up their position as CEO. Other women are forfeiting their position as mother, and sometimes also as wife, for their profession, because they appreciate that the years in which one builds a career are the same in which you raise your family.

The world is what we as women make of it: We have laws to protect us as well as an innate and necessary position in society to give us power. How we use this is up to us. The women's movement has proven that whether men play along or not, society is moving towards a shared responsibility for children and the family.



Feminism today is not the ball-bashing, man-hating "ism" it once was. Modern feminism is humanism — the pursuit of equal rights and responsibilities for all people regardless of race, gender, sex, sexual preference, ethnicity or religion.

We have not lost the battles of the feminist movement; new battles have been forged by those we have won.

Going home: A welcome farewell

World Perspectives

Scott Eldridge II

In a handful of days I will again be in Massachusetts, jet propelled from what has been an invariable hold-over of what I can best assume is my life.

I have never felt at home in Alaska, never grown into the comfortable role that lets you sleep soundly every night. Those who know understand the ephemeral feeling I have towards this place. It is not without some odd remorse that I look back at the last four months and weigh every experience unevenly against hypothetical scenarios that could not have been. It is also not without glowing revue that I challenge my mind to examine the time spent in this pause.

Alaska has offered an experience that could not be found in any other locale, not for me. It is isolationism to the greatest but an involvement and an attitude that does little to separate. Usually it holds its separate square, alongside Hawaii and placed wherever there is an open spot on a contiguous map. The lower 48 is a different world when you are here — so much closer to Russia, so much further from the eyes of anyone American.

"What I like about Alaskans is that Alaskans are Alaskans first and democrats or republicans second," said Vernon Smith, a Nobel Laureate economist who has studied this state. The night I met Smith he looked as out of place as anyone could. In his Hope Indian jewelry and southwestern style suit, Smith was an outsider as I was, though I have looked more the part and blended a bit readily. But he was just as much playing the role of interested and genuinely concerned. Smith wants to make Alaska a part of his life, as I did, but is up against the same time frame, the same brevity and an equally slippery slope of acceptance.

If you have been an Alaskan for long enough you are considered a sourdough. That's the name but it doesn't have a strong definition. The name came about during the gold rush of the late 19th century, a label for old-time miners who stuck around after their old time mines dried up. Like some secret club, it seems that you are welcomed into sourdough-dom by other old timers.

I will not be here long enough to get this invite.

In the people I meet, while many are as warm and inviting as any others I've met in my world, there is a look I have become all too familiar with. I imagine Smith saw it too. I think the fact that I'm leaving is synonymous with my not being from here. It's like some Alaskans see me as a quitter; I see myself as quite the opposite. For a state that wouldn't have many of its 600,000 people without people coming from the outside, it has put an intangible wall up against outsiders. To label someone an outsider is to place someone in a category that carries the most incredible stigma no matter which inside you sit in.

While Alaskans trip over themselves to try to choose their state's destiny there is an unwelcome feeling for those who would want a taste.

The problem, and maybe the spark or otherwise fanciful cause: Alaska has long been hampered by outsiders. Whether it was boatloads of laborers from Seattle to work the fisheries, unchecked federal want from Washington D.C. making decisions from afar or some other outside influence (of the many that dot the state's and territory's history) the outsiders are wrong. U.S. Senators don't know what Alaska needs, environmentalists are oblivious to what they are fighting for or against and at the same time there isn't one Alaskan who is "in the know."

There is more disparity between popular opinions as to what Alaska needs than any other political rift and yet every plan is so right. The state needs economic development, but environmental preservation. There is some strange mix of a need to pump oil out but also keep intact the land it is pumped from. There is a tunnel proposal to be built here. The motive behind the construction is to allow more cars to get to a little town at the other end of the rabbit hole. From what I understand, the tunnel allows more cars through it than the town can hold. But as they say, the truth is stranger than fiction.

While Alaskans trip over themselves to try to choose their state's destiny there is an unwelcome feeling for those who would want a taste. For every suggestion that can't be acted upon due to my impending exit, there is another glance:

Alaskans first, everyone else second.

No suicide ever had

Thomas Naughton

You shouldn't be reading this column because I shouldn't have written it — I shouldn't have had to. I'm smiling in the picture that accompanies the print version of my column and I remember well having the picture taken. I'm smiling because normal people smile for pictures, but I'm kind of squinting and leaning forward because I want to try to hide any sign of that "I cried for a real long time last night" look.

I was crying for lot of reasons, reasons that span throughout my life from five or 10 years ago to a few months ago. I should not have pushed myself to this end. I know better than this, I know what is left behind. I watched my classmates doubled over in a hallway in my high school sobbing over the loss of a friend; I listened to my friend Lian describe the pain she felt when her best friend in college took his own life.

However, of all of these reasons why I should not have pushed myself to a place where death seems like a viable option, one remains most obvious to me: I have been there before.

I almost died in high school from anorexia, a kind of suicide attempt. I guess I thought I hadn't got it right the first time. Forgive my humor, it's a defense mechanism I am using to fight the embarrassment I'm feeling at having faced and fought self-destruction only to see it as a way out once again.

I attempted suicide two weeks ago.

Writing that sentence is surreal. I should have seen this coming. Ever since being released from the hospital at 16 I had kept the thought in the back of my mind that I would be close to death again, that I would have a terrible relapse or kill myself somehow. Normal teens that have almost died in the hospital do not think that once they are released.

I avoided issues in my life — my eating disorder, my sexuality, my family by focusing on something that would distract anyone who was concerned. I talked for months with my therapist about a boy, Jon, who had hurt me. I was 17 years old and I was truly hurt by him, but I focused on this pain while fighting with my family, losing weight, and ignoring problems with my sexual persona. I distracted her with stories of my relationship with Jon, and thus therapy remained unsuccessful.

I rationalized: "I'm on medicine; I've gained weight since being in the hospital, I'm fine." Years have gone by and all of these problems have remained joined by more stress and more rationalizing. A terrible break-up this fall devastated me for reasons I can't explain.

Although I care deeply for my ex-boyfriend, considering the amount of time we were together and how horrible he made me feel, there is no reason why I should have been as upset as I was. I had learned from being 17 and in love with someone who couldn't outwardly show love back.

Although I have low self-esteem, I would never normally allow a guy to do to me what my most recent ex-boyfriend had. There was something else. I was doing it again. Jon was too far away in time to rely on as a distraction. This entire semester I have spent in anxious anticipation of some terrible event, or terrible feeling, which I thought was going to be that great relapse I had been promising myself for a good five years. No. This was bigger.

I stood in line at the Hadley Wal Mart with my friend Melissa buying X-Acto blades for my scenic design class and I couldn't keep from smiling. "Good", I thought. "If I need a way out, I have these." I didn't stop to think about that statement. It didn't jar me in the least. On a night one week before Thanksgiving, I reached the limit.

I had been in pain for a long time, but I was severely depressed the entire semester, sometimes missing class because I could not will myself to get out of bed. I had my obligatory fight with my ex, once again trying to hold onto him to distract myself from any real pain I was feeling, but it wasn't working. I called him again and again because I had realized everything, what was happening, what I was doing.

As someone who I talked to on most days for months, he was someone I turned to, but he was busy with someone else and understandably took my calling as more bait for fighting. I panicked when I couldn't reach my friends. I eyed the bag that held my design materials. The rest of the story is private.

The next day after going to the hospital voluntarily, I sat in the waiting room of Mental Health Services at UMass. I was afraid. I almost left twice before being called in. I sat in the room with the therapist and cried for everything bad that ever happened, and it was real crying for these events in my life, not a diversion.

I wasn't rationalizing my sadness as pain of a break-up. I cried because I was trapped by my eating disorder, because of the situations I subjected my family to, because of my deep shame over my homosexuality, because of the fights with my father, because of my ending of friendships after I was hospitalized, because of so many things.

Allowing myself to spill everything out in front of me to a really funny and kind woman began the process which I will continue over break and probably the rest of my life: Therapy. I should never have terminated therapy years ago, but I was too afraid to deal with real issues. I feared that without these issues to churn inside of me and to weigh on me, what would I have? Who would I be? I'm ready to address those questions.

I'm not after sympathy. I feel really vulnerable and embarrassed to have written this, but I needed to deal with this event and the fact that there are people here who are in the same place.

I didn't want to die. I think that is what people misunderstand about suicide. People who want to kill themselves see their death as the only exit from pain, and that is so sad to me because they do not die painlessly and they leave so much anguish in their wake. Sarah Kane, an English playwright who took her own life wrote, "I have no desire for death. No suicide ever had."

Obesity surgery: a growing trend

By Karen Testa
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — Ken Powers knew the potential dangers of having his stomach stapled, but to a man who had tipped the scales at 475 pounds, those risks didn't much matter.

"I had this thought: If I die on the operating table, having the surgery to try to better my life, I thought it was a better thing to do than to live the way I was living, which, in my opinion, I was kind of waiting to die anyway," he said.

By the tens of thousands, morbidly obese people who have failed at diets, support groups and exercise programs are turning to surgery to lose weight.

In 1998, there were 25,800 obesity-related operations, most of them gastric-bypass procedures commonly known as stomach stapling. This year, the American Society for Bariatric Surgery estimates 103,200 operations.

Questions about the risks and growing use of the procedures surfaced in recent weeks after two patients in New England died during stomach-stapling surgeries. However, obesity specialists say the procedure is safer than it has ever been — and that is contributing to the growing popularity.

And for most patients, the risk of not having the surgery is greater.

"It's an operation that helps cure people of this disease which is life-threatening. People see it as some type of cosmetic surgery, when it's not. More patients die waiting for surgery than die after surgery," said Dr. Janey Pratt, a surgeon at the Massachusetts General Hospital Weight Center in Boston, which does about 300 gastric bypasses a year.

The operation involves using staples or stitches to close off part of the stomach to form a small pouch about the size of an egg, which limits how much food the person can eat. A part of the small intestine also is bypassed to reduce nutrient absorption.

Risks include wound infections, stomach leaks and occasionally life-threatening blood clots.

The International Bariatric Surgery Registry estimates one in 1,000 patients will die within four weeks of the surgery, and three in 1,000 will die within three months. Some surgeons in the field put the fatality rate as high as one in 100 who have the surgery.

Powers, 42, of Worcester, was lucky. Even carrying more than 400 pounds on his 5-foot-11 frame, he had not developed many of the common ailments associated with obesity. Still, sleep was fitful, and walking, particularly upstairs, was exhausting. And he lived in a fourth-floor apartment.

Powers underwent laparoscopic gastric bypass surgery in May 2001 and now weighs 280 pounds. He believes the surgery likely staved off the onset of diabetes, and he has had no complications.

Surgery is not used to treat minor obesity. Candidates must be 100 pounds above their ideal body weight and have failed at other attempts at weight loss.

Still, an estimated 15 million people would qualify for the surgery, said Dr. Scott Shikora, head of bariatric surgery at Tufts-New England Medical Center in Boston. Tufts, which has the city's largest obesity surgery program, closed to new patients for nearly six months earlier this year to catch up with its backlog of patients. At one point, there was a waiting list of 500 patients, Shikora said.

"It's no longer considered snake oil or some out there treatment that doesn't work," Shikora said.

Brit rockers stun Boston

Stereophonics makes the most of small venue

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — Stereophonics, one of the most popular acts in the United Kingdom, came through Boston Saturday to play an acoustic set as part of a brief trip through the United States.

The band mixes classic rock and brit-pop influences along with modern American alternative rock to create a unique sound that has proven to be more interesting than most other current bands, in the U.K., the U.S., or anywhere. At the Avalon, the band, singer/guitarist/songwriter Kelly Jones and bassist Richard Jones (no relation), along with touring musicians Steve Gorman (drums), Tony Kirkham (keyboard), and Scott James (second guitar) played a more stripped-down, laid-back set than the band was used to. The 'Phonics seemed to be a bit off-guard — the show was announced more than a month ago, but the fact that it was acoustic was just made public this past week and it seems the band didn't get much more notice than the audience — but put on a great show for an audience that doesn't get to see them all the time.

A few weeks prior to the show Richard Jones called the Collegian from Exeter and, amongst other things, made clear that not only is breaking America important, but that Boston is a very important city to them.

"Boston is one of the markets which is really good for us at this moment in time," Jones said, "I think Boston is probably the first show we ever played in the US back in 97...we opened for The Dandy Warhols. It's a really good place; we've always had a good reception there."

When the band took the stage on Saturday they seemed to be happy to be playing to the crowd, despite the fact that the not-quite sold out 1,500 capacity Avalon was much smaller than the larger venues and stadiums the band is accustomed to playing in the U.K.

"The smaller venues are good," Jones compared, "it actually feels like a gig. When you're on the road or you're doing the big shows you can actually make them into the same thing; you just add more production so the size of it gets bigger. The stage is bigger, the P.A.'s are bigger so it is exactly the same just on a bigger scale. But from a bands point of view I think the small clubs are probably the better place for an atmosphere or an actual vibe on stage but we're happy to do everything. If that's the situation we're in, we enjoy ourselves. It's cool."

The band certainly got a good vibe and made the best out of the situation of the no-scale production of the show. Where hard rockers such as "Help Me (She's Out Of Her Mind)" from the band's latest, and best, album "You Gotta Go There To Come Back," and "Vegas Two Times," from 2001's "Just Enough Education To Perform" would go, the band played mellower songs such as "Hurry Up And Wait" from 1999's "Performance & Cocktails" and "I Miss You Now", another track from "You Gotta Go There...".

The band even took hard rockers like "Madame Helga," also from "You Gotta Go There..." and "The Bartender And The Thief," also from "Performance & Cocktails", and changed them. "Helga" became swampier and stompier, with more reliance on groove than on the arena-rock guitar of the album version; "Bartender" was also a lot more laid back and smoother than the fast-paced original.

One thing about the band's setup that was obvious was the fact that the band — a three-piece on their albums — had a second guitarist and a keyboardist. Jones says that being able to bring an expanded touring band gives the band more room to write bigger and more experimental songs.

Knowing you can bring extra musicians with you on tour "doesn't restrict you when you're in the studio, sometimes you do think 'oh, how are we gonna replicate it live.' " Jones explains, "but than when we were recording ['You Gotta Go There...] we just thought 'f it'. We go in there and do whatever's necessary to make the songs the best songs possible. ... Sometimes it is a nightmare trying to do the songs like the record, cause we put strings on certain songs, and horns on different songs so when we play those songs live now we gotta do a different version." The audience at the Avalon was treated to a much calmer rendition of "Climbing The Walls" a song from the new album about boredom that, on the record, is laden with brass instruments, but live was focused on Kelly Jones, his guitar, and his distinct, scratchy vocals.

The audience also couldn't help but notice the man sitting behind the drum kits. Between the last time the band was in town and this stop drummer Stuart Cable exited the band. On the brief US tour this past fall ex-Black Crowes drummer Gorman was playing in place of the sick Cable, but now Gorman has become a replacement, at least for now, for Cable, who has been with the band since its inception.

"It was a difficult time for us and the issues and the reasons behind why Stuart left - I don't think people do need to know the reasons why. But the reasons why we had to do it is 'cause if we didn't do it we probably wouldn't be here now," Jones states matter-of-factly. "The determination and the commitments and what-have-you of touring and an album you've gotta be 200% committed, and the way me and Kelly felt was; in order to push this album and the band as far as we could push it that would be a decision we had to make, basically." Still, Jones obviously is upset that himself that an old friend had to be kicked out of the band. "Hopefully we can keep a friendship with Stuart. I mean, obviously its going to be a difficult time for the next coming

APC exceeds all expectations

By Nick Romanow

PROVIDENCE — The lights went down last Monday at the Providence Performing Arts Center to signal that art-rock super-group A Perfect Circle was taking the stage. When the lights came up it was the massive four-sided curtained platform in the slight rear of center stage that drew the most attention. Behind it, a silhouetted figure was banging on two tom-toms and chanting, along with the rest of the band, "disappear, disappear." These tight, perfect beginning moments of the song "Vanishing" from the band's second, and latest, album "Thirteenth Step" merely previewed the treat that the audience was in for.

While A Perfect Circle is notoriously a great live band this show exceeded any possible expectations and surpassed all past area performances from the band. However, the audience was most delighted when, after "Vanishing" the curtains dropped to reveal — well, somewhat reveal — singer Maynard James Keenan on the raised platform. While he still remained fairly obscured in darkness, and would stay so for most of the show, the crowd — many of whom are fans of Keenan's other band, the harder rocking but not less creative and artistic, Tool — let out deafening applause.

To make things clear, though, this was most definitely not "The Maynard Show." Guitarist/songwriter/band leader Billy Howerdel and drummer Josh Freese (who also plays with punk band The Vandals and works on dozens of other projects) showed off talent that was beyond proficient. They are both among the best musicians currently working. Guitarist James Iha, formerly of the Smashing Pumpkins, and bassist Jeordie White, known as Twiggy Ramirez when he played with Marilyn Manson, are new to the band, but both made their way through APC's songs with ease and grace.

The band made its way through most of the new album, with Keenan emoting and pouring himself into stand-out tracks like "Blue" and the album's first single, "Weak and Powerless," while Howerdel was able to truly demonstrate his guitar chops on the epic "The Package." White frequently found himself walking out toward the edge of the stage, interacting with the crowd, while Freese pulled drumming maneuvers and played beats that most stickmen wouldn't be capable of even attempting. Iha, like Keenan and Freese, was up on a riser toward the back of the stage, adding subtleties to songs that brought new life and gave different dimensions to the songs. The band was clearly having fun as Keenan gave Iha the mic to tell a joke — "Where do penguins keep their money? In a snow bank!" Keenan altered the lyrics to "Orestes," one of the most compelling songs from the band's debut album, 2000's "Mer De Noms," and White was allowed to step up to the mic himself to sing a song, an interesting little ditty, "Fred's Got Slacks," which was ostensibly about, well, a guy named Fred and his slacks.

The band rounded out the set with other songs from "Mer de Noms," and while the album wasn't quite as focused on as "Thirteenth Step" was, the band covered most of that album's greatest songs — the aforementioned "Orestes," "Thinking Of You," "Magdalena," "The Hollow" and of course the two big singles, "3 Libras" and "Judith." The high point of the night — whether most of the audience fully grasped it or not — occurred late in the set when Keenan, one of the greatest and most recognized musicians in modern rock music invited Year Of The Rabbit (who opened the show) frontman Ken Andrews, one of the greatest and most underappreciated musicians in modern music to join him on stage.

Together they sang a spacey, rousing rendition of "The Nurse Who Loved Me," a song that Andrews' former band Failure wrote and recorded for their 1996 opus "Fantastic Planet" and that APC covers on "Thirteenth Step." Although this was the first time Andrews and Keenan had performed the song together, and probably the first time Andrews has sung the song publicly since Failure's break-up in 1997, it sounded amazing. The band created soft, atmospheric music while Andrews and Keenan switched off verses and finally joined together for the intense climax.

Year Of The Rabbit began the show with an equally great — but way too short — 30 minute set that would have upstaged any other headlining band. They played songs off of their recently released self-titled debut that demonstrated their distinctive, moody art-rock/pop-rock sound, making many new friends and establishing themselves as a band to keep an eye on.

Jazz with a new twist

Mandolin Project set to groove NoHo

Finals got you down? Need some assistance in shaking down those end-of-semester blues? Plant yourself on the floor of the Iron Horse tonight and enjoy a generous helping of the Jazz Mandolin Project's patented feel-good stew.

Jazz Mandolin Project

Their soulful blend of bluegrass, nasty funk and, of course, jazz, is known to extend toward trance and even drum n' bass; the scope of their sound is tremendous, sophisticated and danceable.

To tour behind the group's 2003 release, "Jungle Tango," mandolin virtuoso and bandleader Jamie Masefield has assembled a mammoth quartet, greased and ready to bring the Project's trademark genre-bending prowess to the people. Dan Weiss on drums, Scott Ritchie on upright bass, and Mike "Mad Dog" Mavridoglou (formerly of Ray's Music Exchange) on trumpet and keyboards round out what Masefield usually arranges as a trio.

But don't let the presence of a trumpet or an upright bass fool you; this is not your parents' jazz. Sandwiched between Project classics such as "The Country Open" and "Oh Yeah!" or jazz staples the like of Miles Davis' "Milestones" and Weather Report's "Black Market," you might find Jimi Hendrix's "Third Stone from the Sun" or Black Sabbath's "War Pigs." Masefield's Jazz Mandolin Project is dynamic, hugely talented and above all, fun.

And beginning in January, the Project will bring on huge talent (and regular collaborator) drummer Jon Fishman, of Phish. Fishman, fresh from his own group's four-date New Year's run in Miami, will accompany Masefield and his rotating cast of characters for a slew of opening dates with fellow Phish-man Page McConnell's Vida Blue (an additional six dates with Fishman will follow the Vida Blue run).

So if you need a breath of fresh air, or in this case, the hip ambience of an intimate venue, pick your head up out of your books and get yourself down to the Iron Horse tonight for a whole mess of the Jazz Mandolin Project's explosive, improvisational brew. Tickets are $12.50 in advance and $15 at the door; show time is 8:30 p.m.

PC makers invade electronics market

FRAMINGHAM (AP) — Richard Martel of Uxbridge didn't enter the city's renovated Gateway store to buy additional gadgets for his personal computer but to check the prices of the 10 different flat-panel television models on display.

As PC makers find their niche in the $95 billion-a-year electronics market, more consumers will find typically expensive entertainment products at lower prices this holiday season as computer stores use low-cost production and distribution techniques to compete for customers, the Boston Sunday Globe reported.

The U.S. personal computer industry takes in $55 billion each year, almost half of the robust electronics market.

"The forces of convergence are hard at work right now, pushing and pulling the PC makers into that consumer electronics space," said Charlie Kim, vice president in the San Francisco office of Bain & Co., a Boston-based business-consulting firm.

Computer makers have used the increase in digital technology to their advantage, finding ways to capitalize on supplier relationships and apply expertise to a new class of products.

Just before Christmas last year, Gateway introduced a 42-inch plasma television priced a little less than $3,000. It has since added MP3 players, digital camcorders, media center PCs and all-in-one computer, television and stereo units.

Hewlett-Packard joined the club in August, launching more than 150 products, including a device that tapes VHS videotapes onto DVD disks.

HP chief executive Carly Fiorina said companies in the industry must provide a broader range of products.

"What people are looking for now from technology is everything," Fiorina said.

Dell has also entered the market with the intention to slash prices and continue its direct-to-consumer online sales channel with electronic products.

"Anything we can do to find a better way to produce something and pass that savings on to the customer is a very good thing," said Kevin Rollins, president and chief operating officer of Dell.

Canton-based Tweeter Inc., with 177 stores nationwide, plans to appeal to brand-conscious consumers who want a "traditional retail experience" with face-to-face customer service, said Noah Herschman, vice president for strategic business development.

The company is also examining the "connected life" electronics market that links computers to home entertainment products.

On the electronic market side, Sony leads the pack and has been able to cross over into the PC market with its purple-tinted Vaio computers. But other manufacturers, such as Toshiba and Panasonic, have followed suit with their own computers.

"It's a crowded landscape, no question, and it's getting more crowded," said Rick Clancy, senior vice president at Sony Electronics in Park Ridge, N.J.

The company is also launching "concept stores" in affluent areas in southern California to promote both electronics and content.

Award show for funny people

Commies to praise and mock comedians

By David Bauder
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — Yet another awards show. It sounds like something the folks at Comedy Central would rather mock than be responsible for.

So they're trying to do both.

The ad campaign for the first Commie Awards, to be shown 9 p.m. Dec. 7 on Comedy Central, questions whether another awards show is really necessary.

"We really wanted to strike a balance between our comedic irreverence in acknowledging the fact that there are way too many awards shows already and actually acknowledging that these are awards for jobs well done," said Lauren Corrao, Comedy Central's programming chief, who's editing the show.

"It's tough," she said. "Part of what we're doing right now is making sure that the balance was struck."

The show honors the best in comedy for 2003. In between serious awards like funniest person and funniest movie actor are categories such as "Oh, I thought you were dead" award and the funniest unintentionally funny film of the year award.

An awards show is straight out of the cable television playbook, particularly for networks owned by Viacom. Spike is televising the Video Game Awards Thursday. Nickelodeon has its Kid's Choice Awards, and MTV has the Video Music Awards and its own movie awards.

The idea is to generate some sort of event that will get fans excited and involved, and entice viewers that might not watch the network every day.

Bill Hilary, Comedy Central executive vice president and general manager, said it's a coincidence that the Commie Awards are beginning during the first year the network was controlled by Viacom. The idea was in development before the corporate changeover, he said.

It's not a coincidence that the Commies are scheduled for early December. That's just after a ratings sweeps month, so the competition from broadcast networks won't be as intense, and advertisers are eager for a big event in which to sell holiday presents or tout new movie releases, Hilary said.

Comedy Central is also premiering seven new series next year, and the awards show offers a promotional opportunity.

Ideally, the network likes to have at least one special event each quarter, and Comedy Central's stock needed refurbishing.

For a few years, Comedy Central aired Friar's Club roasts, but they skewed old for a network with a median age of 30. Comedy Central organized its own roast of Denis Leary this year, but it did very well in the ratings, Hilary said.

Similarly, the network aired for one year the long-running American Comedy Awards. But those awards tended to give short shrift to cable, he said, and with a production team that also worked on "Rowan & Martin's Laugh-In" more than 30 years ago, Comedy Central was looking for something hipper.

With the Commies, the network obviously is hoping for something that can become as big an annual event in the comedy world as MTV's video awards are in music.

"It is important that we have an awards ceremony," Hilary said. "But it's more important that it's funny."

The Commie bobblehead trophy is supposed to resemble St. Genesius, the patron saint of comedians.

Beating the heat of Ecstasy

Science finds ways to avert drug fatalities

By William McCall
Associated Press

The club drug Ecstasy can kill its abusers by triggering irreversible overheating in the body, and new research suggests the protein associated with potentially fatal hyperthermia might be a target for doctors.

Experiments at Ohio Northern University show mice bred without the protein called UCP-3 heat up less after they have been injected with doses of Ecstasy that kill normal rodents.

When the body overheats enough, skeletal muscle breaks down and organs fail, leading to an agonizing death, said Ted Mills, a National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute researcher and co-author of the study.

Researchers say they have not yet developed a therapy that would block UCP-3 activity in humans, but the mouse studies are the earliest steps. Results of the experiments appear Thursday in the journal Nature.

"By isolating this protein we might be able to see whether in fact we can block this hyperthermia from occurring," Mills said.

"Nobody's been able to do that before."

A recent United Nations report on Ecstasy use from 1995 to 2000 estimates there has been at least a 70 percent increase in worldwide use of the recreational drug, known scientifically as MDMA for methylenedioxymethamphetamine — a chemical cousin of methamphetamine.

Ecstasy typically induces feelings of euphoria, increased energy and sexual arousal. But it also suppresses appetite, thirst and the need to sleep, and in high doses can sharply increase body temperature, leading to kidney and heart failure, and death.

Severe overheating triggered by Ecstasy overdose typically cannot be controlled with emergency medical care, including ice baths and transfusing chilled blood, Mills said.

"These people will show up at the emergency room with a fever in the 108-degree range," he said. "A lot of things happen when the temperature is so high, and one is that muscle cells just start popping open."

The UCP-3 protein identified in the study is found in skeletal muscle, further evidence the protein may help control the temperature increase triggered by Ecstasy, said Jon Sprague of Ohio Northern, co-author of the study.

months. ... It is like a marriage almost and sometimes it doesn't work out and it took us a long time to figure out what we needed to go forward in the right direction."

Gorman certainly did a serviceable job at the show — it is hard to make a strong impression on fans as a drummer at an acoustic show — but Jones acknowledges that it might be difficult for some fans to understand the loss 1/3 of their favorite band. "I think with the majority of people, [they] understand that it's for the better of the band. But obviously you're going to get a minority thinking that we should keep it at the three of us and we should be three lads on the road just doing what they do [and] whatever happens, happens. But I think those people — if they do come to see the show now — they will know why we've done it and they'll make up their own minds as to whether it's better or not. We know which direction we're going in. ... You can't keep on doing one thing, like that bad marriage. If you just stay just for the sake of it it's not going to work. It's going to end somewhere along the lines and I think it's never the right choice - the right time - but we had to do it there and then."

Bassist Richard Jones adds his own personality to the music.

While only time will tell how the band deals with this difficulty they certainly proved they are still focused on the music. The band played a full 90 minute set that featured songs from the band's first album, 1997's "Word Gets Around", as well as plenty from the subsequent three albums and ended the show with a rousing rendition of The Beatles' song "Don't Let Me Down." a song that the band recorded for the "I Am Sam" soundtrack and, according to Kelly Jones, hadn't played in two years prior to the show.

The Stereophonics left the crowd craving more and hopefully it won't be very long until the band brings back their unique brand of American-influenced Brit-rock to an ever expanding group of American fans. In fact, Jones was very optimistic about how his band will do in the U.S.

"We're at this level only in the U.K. and no where else around the world and what we're trying to do now is get up at the same level as we are in the U.K. We understand that it's a big place and it's gonna take a lot of work so that's why we keep coming back to the states. ... It's all looking up so we're looking forward coming back."

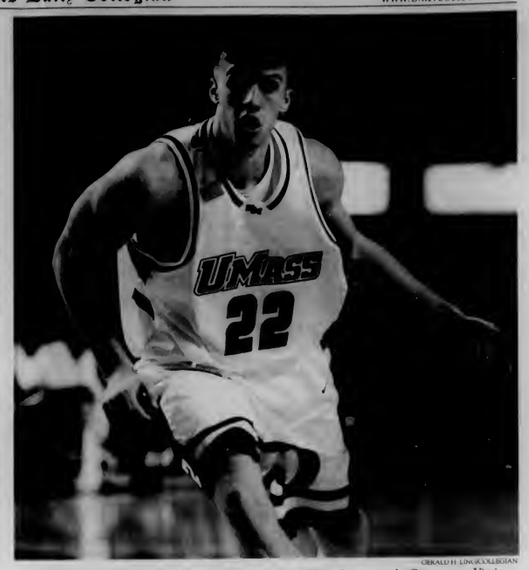
burst to make the score 59-45.

After the Minutemen answered with five consecutive points from Anderson, the Catamounts switched to a man-to-man full court press and responded with a seven consecutive points to cut the lead back down to 10 at 62-52 with 6:27 to play.

The Catamounts got no closer than seven, however, as after a Sorrentine three made the score 69-62 with 2:10 left in the game, the Minutemen finished the contest on a 7-2 run to ice their second victory of the young season.

"We got a little bit of a big head after St. Francis," Maxwell said. "But we really worked hard in practice this week and we played like we wanted to play out there tonight."



Viggiano helped the Minutemen break an early 7-7 deadlock when he contributed three points to a 5-0 UMass run, including a steal and a breakaway dunk at the 13:40 mark of the first half.

The Maroon and White then turned to its long-range shooting to help fuel a 13-6 run that pushed the lead to 25-13. Anderson contributed a pair of three-pointers and a driving layup during the stretch, while Maxwell completed the run with a trey of his own as well as a breakaway lay-in.

Anderson then continued his hot shooting from outside. The Lynn native nailed an additional pair of threes before he teamed with Bowers on a 6-2 run to close the half that gave UMass its largest lead of the opening frame.

After Anderson connected from inside the lane to make the score 37-23, Bowers immediately stole the inbounds pass and converted it into two points. Then, following a Coppenrath basket, the Wilmington, Del. native drained the Minutemen's seventh three-pointer of the half at the buzzer to make the score 42-25 heading into intermission.

UMass returns to action Saturday afternoon at 2 p.m., when it faces Boston College at Conte Forum in the annual Commonwealth Classic.

GERALD H. LIN/COLLEGIAN

Jeff Viggiano scored nine points and grabbed six boards in UMass' win over the Catamounts. Viggiano, who has averaged 5.7 points a game, had his most productive outing of the season against Vermont.

Sharpshooters intricate in victory

but pick and choose the good shots and the bad shots, and they let me know why I was missing the ones before ... pretty much not learning how to play with my teammates and rushing."

With just over six minutes remaining in the game, Vermont was able to cut the Minutemen's lead to 10. A quick three from Maxwell and some quick plays resulting in trips to the foul line gave UMass the confidence it needed to close out the game.

Although Lappas was impressed with his freshmen tonight, he knows that this isn't the type of play he can expect on a regular basis at this point in the season.

"Someday they're going to play like this all the time," Lappas said. "We rely so heavily on freshman, and when you rely that heavily on freshman you can't expect them to play like this all the time.

"There are no upperclassmen really to carry them except Anthony... I know those kids can play and I know they're going to be very good and they're going to be consistent it's just that now you never know what's going to happen from one night to the next.

"The goal of our team is to get this inside and outside game working at the same time," he continued, "and I think its going to happen at times right now but its probably not going to happen consistently for a while."

Patriots release punter

FOXBORO, Mass. (AP) — The New England Patriots released punter Ken Walter on Tuesday, two days after the second-worst punting performance in his 42 games with the team.

The Patriots gave other punters tryouts in recent weeks but did not announce that they had signed a replacement.

Walter was one of the few disappointments for the Patriots, second in the AFC with a 10-2 record. He is ranked last in the NFL with a gross punting average of 37.9 yards after he averaged 27.3 yards on three kicks in last Sunday's 38-34 win at Indianapolis.

Walter, 31, is ranked 24th out of 32 NFL punters with a net average of 33.5 yards. He spent four seasons with Carolina before joining the Patriots for the last 11 games in 2000. He finished with a 38.1-yard net average that year, second best in the NFL. Last season, that fell to 36.4.

In 103 NFL games, his gross punting average was 39.8 yards. In his 42 games with the Patriots, it was 38.9 yards.

0-2 in November. The Finland native allowed more than two goals in just one contest in the month, a 7-4 victory over Providence. He posted a 1.55 goals against average and a .906 save percentage in leading BC to first place in Hockey East.

Maine forward Luciano Aquino won the Superskills Hockey Rookie of the Month Award. He had a point in six of Maine's seven games in the month, putting up four goals and three assists in that span.

A DIFFERENT WAY TO DO IT

Boston University suffered through a miserable 1-4-3 skid in the month of November before drubbing ECAC bottom-feeder Yale 7-2 on Sunday. The Terriers had averaged just two goals per game during that time span, and had struggled to find any consistent scorers from their forward corps.

So on Sunday, against an Eli squad that came into the contest allowing 5.5 goals per game in the young season, BU took a different approach. It handed the scoring reigns to its blueliners. And the duo of junior Ryan Whitney and freshman Kevin Schaeffer combined for six goals, the first tandem of defensemen in BU's recorded history to record a hat trick apiece in the same game. The performance earned Schaeffer Hockey East Rookie of the Week honors.

POLL STARS

Entering last week's contests, five Hockey East teams were ranked in the Top 12 in the U.S. College Hockey Online poll. But following some non-conference mishaps by BU and Massachusetts, the number has dwindled slightly.

Yankees add firepower with Sheffield

By RONALD BLUM
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK (AP) — While Gary Sheffield met with Yankees owner George Steinbrenner, New York escalated the arms race in the AL East, agreeing to a contract with free agent reliever Tom Gordon.

Aaron Boone and Enrique Wilson, two of the six Yankees eligible for salary arbitration, agreed to one-year contracts.

Sheffield and his agent, Rufus Williams, met with Steinbrenner for about an hour Monday at the Yankees' spring training complex in Tampa, Fla. While Williams said the sides still haven't reached an agreement, all signs point toward the outfielder signing with New York.

"We're still talking, and we'll know when we get there," Williams said. "At this point, we're not there."

Gordon's two-year deal is worth $7.25 million. The deal was completed after he passed a physical earlier in the day, a baseball source familiar with the negotiations told The Associated Press on the condition of anonymity.

New York made the moves three days after its chief division rival, the Boston Red Sox, acquired Curt Schilling from Arizona. The Red Sox also are negotiating with free agent closer Keith Foulke.

The Yankees struggled to find a consistent right-handed setup man last season to replace Steve Karsay, who didn't pitch because of an injured right shoulder.

Gordon, 36, was 7-6 with a team-high 12 saves and a 3.16 ERA for the Chicago White Sox last season. He pitched in 66 games, striking out 91 in 74 innings.

The Yankees are continuing talks with Paul Quantrill, another right-hander, and are trying to re-sign left-handers Felix Heredia and Gabe White.

New York also remains interested in re-signing David Wells, who was likely to have back surgery Tuesday in New York, according to his agent, Gregg Clifton. While the Yankees declined the left-hander's $6 million option, they may re-sign him at a lower guarantee.

Boone, whose 11th-inning homer in Game 7 won the AL pennant for New York, will get $5.75 million, a raise of $2.05 million. Wilson gets $700,000, matching what he earned this year.

Boone, acquired from Cincinnati on July 31, was in a slump during most of his time with the Yankees, hitting .254 with six homers and 31 RBIs.

His 11th-inning homer against Boston was only the fifth to end a postseason series, putting him in a group with Bill Mazeroski, Chris Chambliss, Joe Carter and Todd Pratt.

But Boone played a role in the World Series loss to Florida, striking out against Braden Looper with one out and the bases loaded in the 11th inning of Game 4. Florida won 4-3 in 12 innings to tie the Series at 2-all, then beat the Yankees in the next two games to take the title.

Boone, 30, is eligible for free agency after next season. He hit .273 with 18 homers and 65 RBIs with the Reds, and was selected for his first All-Star appearance.

New York sent left-handers Brandon Claussen and Charlie Manning to Cincinnati to obtain Boone, acquired partly because third base prospect Drew Henson hasn't made much progress at Triple-A Columbus. The former Michigan quarterback hit .234 with 14 homers, 40 doubles and 78 RBIs with the Clippers last season, striking out 122 times and making 28 errors at third base.

Minutemen stomp Catamounts

UMass wins after hiatus

By MIKE MARZELLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Maybe Steve Lappas should follow Mark Whipple's lead, and eliminate play-down opponents from his schedule.

Eight days after what the Massachusetts men's basketball coach declared a "bad loss" to Hartford, the Minutemen appeared rejuvenated following their gridiron-style layoff, as they downed defending America East champion Vermont 76-64 before 2,358 at the Mullins Center.

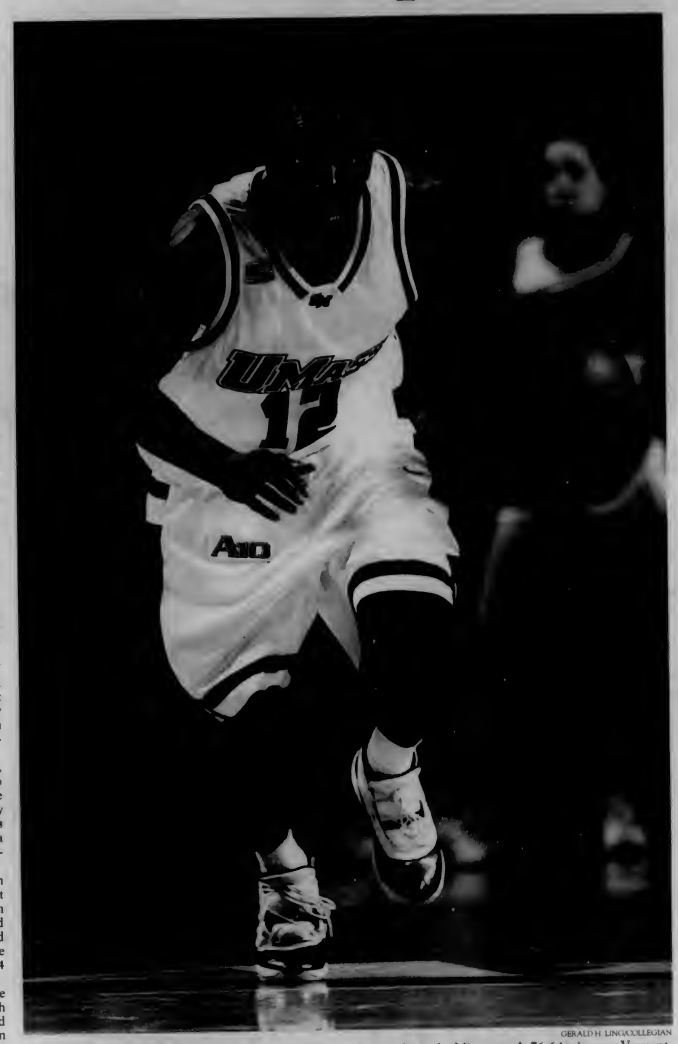
"I was really pleased with the way the guys responded to our week of practice," Lappas said. "We had some really hard days in practice working on the things we needed to work on, and I'm glad to see that the things that we worked on and really were talking about were the things that we concentrated on so much tonight."

"We're getting better," junior point guard Anthony Anderson added. "We worked on a lot of things in practice this week, and it showed tonight because we did those things well."

Anderson led all scorers with a career-high 29 points, while freshman guard Art Bowers chipped in with 16 points and seven rebounds for UMass. Classmate Maurice Maxwell added 14.

2002-03 America East Player of the Year Taylor Coppenrath led the way for UVM with 23 points, while junior Point Guard T.J. Sorrentine tossed in 15, including his 1,000th career point early in the contest.



"Credit UMass, they really smacked us," Vermont coach Tom Brennan said. "I think we lost our legs in the second half, but that doesn't take anything away from how they played, because every time we made a run they answered with one big shot after another."

Trailing by 17 to open the second half, the Catamounts clawed their way back into the game with an 8-2 run. Sorrentine opened the scoring with a straight away three and senior forward Scotty Jones chipped in with a pair of buckets, before a Coppenrath free throw cut the lead to 44-33.

However the Maroon and White again answered on the strength of its three-point shooting. Following a pair of trifectas from Anderson and Viggiano sandwiched around a Jones dunk, the UMass captain connected again from beyond the arc to push the Minuteman lead to 55-35 with under 14 minutes to play.

UVM then proceeded to slice into the UMass advantage again when Coppenrath poured in five points and freshman forward Martin Klimes scored a bucket of his own before an Alex Jensen three capped a 10-4

GERALD H. LING/COLLEGIAN

Junior point guard Anthony Anderson dropped 29 points last night in the Minutemen's 76-64 win over Vermont. The Maroon and White returns to action against Boston College on Saturday for a 2 p.m. tipoff in Chestnut Hill.

3-pointers are boost in crunch time

Downtown.

That was where Minuteman offense caught fire last night as it shot 63.2 percent from behind the arc, making 12 of 19 shots in its 76-64 win over Vermont. Four players contributed from behind the arc in last night's game, while only three could muster points from the outside when the team shot 21.4 percent in last week's game against Hartford.

In their week off, the Minuteman offense did a complete 180.

UMass' main force from behind the arc was junior captain Anthony Anderson. Anderson scored a career-high 29 points, while shooting seven of nine from behind the arc, compared to four of seven against the Hawks.

Anderson was able to run the game while the ball was in his hands. "When you see a guy hit a couple shots you might want to run a play to get that guy open," he said. "So it definitely helps out a lot, it makes it way easier for me."

Anderson was also able to stand out when he was moved off the ball.

"I feel like that every night," he said of his shooting. "I just put up more shots tonight."

"This is the most shots that somebody else has gotten for Anthony Anderson in the two years that we've been together. Somebody was getting him shots tonight as opposed to the other way around," UMass coach Steve Lappas said.

The contribution of freshmen Maurice Maxwell and Art Bowers, both 2-for-2 from downtown, not only boosted the Minuteman offense, but it also threw off the Catamounts.

"Every time they needed one, [Maxwell or Anderson] made one," Vermont coach Tom Brennan said.

"We knew Anderson was capable," he added, "and he really carried them I thought."

Anderson hit two treys in a row less than halfway into the first half adding to his team's 13-4 run. Each time the Catamounts posted a threat, Anderson, Maxwell or Bowers was there to knock them back down.

Bowers attributes the difference in his shooting to both the week off and the help of his coaches and the older players.

"They have more experience at it so they just tell me keep my mind in it," Bowers said. "They know I can make the shots so they tell me to just keep shooting

Quinnipiac halts HEA win streak

By MATT BRADY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The collective sigh of relief was audible from Durham, N.H. to Omaha, Neb. Media Relations officials across the country had to double check the score being read to them from the other end of the phone. It was no joke — the inevitable had finally happened, with just one score to explain it.

Quinnipiac 3, Merrimack 2.

Over the past three years, many Hockey East squads had flirted with disaster, but salvaging ties and close wins over teams from the then-Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference and the now-Atlantic Hockey Association. But Quinnipiac became the first team from the conference to actually defeat a Hockey East opponent with a 3-2 victory thanks to a pair of goals from Matt Craig. Previously, MAAC and AHA members had been 0-40-5 against HEA squads.

10 YEAR HOCKEY EAST ANNIVERSARY
Notebook

Atlantic Hockey has shown significant improvement this year, with Quinnipiac taking Michigan to the brink in a pair of games in Ann Arbor, and Mercyhurst getting a reputation as a "giant killer" with a tie of No. 13 Cornell this weekend. With its independence from the MAAC officials that governed it despite many MAAC schools not having hockey program. Congratulations to Quinnipiac and the rest of Atlantic Hockey for the jump they have made over the last two years.

NOVEMBER REIGN

Hockey East crowned its players of the month for November yesterday, and two of the top three teams in the conference were represented. Massachusetts defenseman Thomas Pöck won CCM Player of the Month in leading the Minutemen to a 5-2-2 record (4-1-1 in Hockey East contests) in the month. Pöck scored six goals and five assists in the nine games, and was held without a point in just one of those contests (a 1-1 tie against Maine). He also leads the nation's defensemen with 19 points on the season.

Boston College netminder Matti Kaltiainen won the ITECH Goaltender of the Month award, going 6-

UMass set for another Cage match

GERALD H. LING/COLLEGIAN

Junior college transfer Edris Bailey has been one of the main contributors to the Minutewoman offense this year. The Maroon and White faces off against Vermont tonight at 7 p.m. for the "Rage in the Cage II."

By TODD FOSTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's basketball team will return to the historic Curry Hicks Cage, the former court of UMass legend Julius Erving, for "Rage in the Cage II." The Minutewomen will play host to Vermont, which is coming off back-to-back wins, at 7 p.m. tonight.

At last year's Rage in the Cage, the Minutewomen pulled off an upset over Villanova, 55-50. The Wildcats advanced to the Elite Eight and were the only squad to beat Connecticut, snapping its 70-game winning streak.

"I am concerned with the lack of publicity. I don't know how many people really know we are playing in the Cage tonight," UMass coach Marnie Dacko responded. "Sports Management is doing something. The lack of no other word, I'm surprised I don't see more advertising."

The young Minutewomen (1-4) have struggled early, but two newcomers have stepped up and are far from inexperienced.

Edris Bailey and Brooke Campbell came to Amherst via junior college and have provided the Maroon and White offense with a presence in the post. Bailey took only 20 minutes to score 21 points in the team's home opener against Holy Cross. Campbell has recorded a double-double in three consecutive games. The junior post tandem will have its first real test in the paint this season against the high-powered Catamount offense. UVM has posted back-to-back 20-win seasons and will look to continue the streak under new head coach Sharon Dawley.

"I think [Campbell and Bailey] have to step up. When you look at our size, it's got to be bigger people that have got to step up," Dacko said. "We also have to apply some pressure on their guards and not give them a chance to pick us apart. They've been playing zone and we have to come out being able to hit the perimeter jumpers."

A year ago, the Minutewomen edged UVM in the final minutes for a 53-48 victory. Down the stretch in that game, Dacko had two of her seniors, guard Ebony Pegues and center Jen Butler, score nine unanswered points in the final three minutes.

Campbell, Bailey and freshman center Tamara Tatham are the keys in replacing Butler's and Nekole Smith's defensive play in the post to keep the game close against a powerful Vermont frontline.

The Catamounts' roster features three low-post scoring threats, led by senior Aaron Yantzi. The six-foot forward has four straight double-doubles while posting season averages of 19 points per game and 11.8 rebounds per game. Yantzi is fresh off a 27 point, 12 rebound performance against Colgate, which earned her Co-America East Women's Player of the Week honors.

If Yantzi starts to struggle, junior forward Lani Boardman is just as deadly on the block and has scored only one fewer point than Yantzi this season. Boardman is an inside-outside scorer (18.8 ppg) creating difficult matchups combining her size and her three-point ability, making 39 percent of her attempts from behind the arc.

"Yantzi and Boardman are on a seasoned team averaging close to 75 points a game and they just scored 85 on Colgate Monday," Dacko said. "I've watched the game [tape] and we have to come aggressively. We have to try to control the boards and force them to make some mistakes. They're an excellent team at this point in time."

To complete the triple threat, sophomore Kate McNamara provides 15 ppg to take more pressure off the two primary scorers. The scoring trio combined averages 52.8 ppg, while the entire UMass team is averaging 52 points.

"Right now, Vermont is looking like the best team that we will play this year," Dacko said. "They are giving up a lot points too though, so this will be a real test for us."

SGA opposes $10 million veto for UMass

Senators concerned about Gov. Romney's UMass plans

By Ikaika C. Arnado
Collegian Staff

At last night's meeting, the Senate Government Association addressed a number of issues including, Governor Mitt Romney's $10 million veto toward the University of Massachusetts, the election of a new University president, compensation for meal plan expenses and the ongoing controversy with the ALANA caucus.

The veto was a primary concern. Over the past year, UMass funding has been cut $40 million and has faced a 10 percent cut in faculty and staff. Romney has also stated that he will not support the union contracts in next year's budget. The SGA was disappointed with the veto.

"The governor has continually shown almost zero support for higher education," Senator Brendan Duprey said. "His reorganization plan looks good for UMass-Amherst specifically, but not good for any of the others."

The SGA voted to oppose the veto. The vote gives the University influence over the legislature toward allocating the $10 million in funds toward the University.

"The legislature has the ability to override Governor Romney's veto," Speaker of the House Jared Nokes said. "They need a two-thirds vote."

Some agreed that Romney's concerns are currently focused on the more unfortunate people living in the state.

"I called the state house today, and I spoke with people that have contact with the governor," Senator D.J. Bettencourt said. "Right now, the governor is dealing with issues that deal with whether people can live in homes — whether people who are homeless are going to have a safe place to stay at night, are going to have a warm meal. Those are the financial matters he is dealing with."

The SGA also discussed the issue of electing a new president for UMass. Many senators voiced concerns that the undergraduate students do not have any influence on who the new president is going to be.

Currently, no one on the Presidential Search Committee is an undergraduate student,

Bush signs bill allowing more cutting in forests

By Robert Gehrke
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — More timber and brush can be cut and cleared with less environmental scrutiny under a "Healthy Forests" law President Bush signed yesterday. He said it will help protect communities from devastating wildfires.

"This law will not prevent every fire, but it is an important step forward, a vital step to make sure we do our duty to protect our nation's forests," Bush said while standing in front of rows of wildland firefighters. "We'll help save lives and property and we'll help protect our forests from sudden and needless destruction," he said.

The Healthy Forests Restoration Act signed by the president is the first major forest management legislation in a quarter-century. It seeks to speed up the harvesting of trees in overgrown woodlands and insect-infested trees on 20 million acres of federal forest land most at risk to wildfires.

It does that by scaling back required environmental studies, limiting appeals and directing judges to act quickly on legal challenges to logging plans.

Critics said the bill would let timber companies cut down large, old-growth trees in the name of fire prevention.

"There's a real danger that the president's pen might as well be a chain saw," said Amy Mall, a forestry specialist with the Natural Resources Defense Council.

Rep. Scott McInnis, R-Colo., sponsor of the legislation, said those complaints are from groups out of touch with the mainstream. "Of course when you thin out forests you're going to have logging. You're going to have to," he said. "But people want these forests managed. People want the science used."

Legislation aimed at speeding decisions on where to allow timbering in national forests was bogged down in Congress for three years — until California blazes whipped by Santa Ana winds burned 750,000 acres, destroyed 3,640 homes and forced a compromise.

Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., said language added to Bush's initial proposal will protect old-growth and large-diameter trees.

"The signing of this forest bill into law shows what can be accomplished when all sides are willing to put aside partisanship and do what is best for communities threatened by deadly and destructive wildfires," he said. "This new law protects old growth forests while providing substantial support for hazardous fuels reduction."

Even after the California fires, 2003 was a below-average fire year. So far, 3.8 million acres have burned. Twenty-eight firefighters died battling the blazes, according to the Wildland Firefighter Foundation. In 2002, nearly seven million acres were charred.

The Bush administration estimates that 190 million acres are at heightened risk for a severe wildfire — an area the size of Idaho, Montana and Wyoming combined.

Mike Dombeck, Forest Service chief during President Clinton's second term, said Congress should have demanded stronger protections for old-growth trees and roadless areas. Nonetheless, he called the new law "a step in the right direction."

"We need to completely rethink our approach to fire and our

Israel disappointed by Powell's meeting with peace negotiators

By Jonathan M. Katz
Associated Press

JERUSALEM (AP) — Israel reacted with disappointment yesterday after U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell confirmed he will meet with organizers of an informal Israeli-Palestinian peace treaty.

The comments by Zalman Shoval, an adviser to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, was the latest expression of Israel's stiff opposition to the meeting, seen as a U.S. gesture toward the "Geneva Accord" that Sharon has denounced.

On Tuesday, Israel's vice premier said it would be "mistake" if Powell goes forward with the meeting.

Shoval, a former ambassador to Washington, conceded that Israel cannot prevent Powell from meeting with Geneva Accord's Palestinian and Israeli authors, but said the effort would be counterproductive.

"I think the decision that Secretary Powell must make is ... what the American interests are," Shoval said in a phone interview from Italy.

"America wants to promote the 'road map' and those people in Geneva ... want to go in a different path," he added. "Therefore I think it won't be very helpful."

The Geneva Accord outlines concessions by Israel that Sharon's government has opposed in the past — including removing most settlements from the West Bank and Gaza Strip and dividing sovereignty in Jerusalem, claimed by both sides as their capital. The accord also severely limits any return of Palestinian refugees to lands in Israel, which has brought condemnations from some Palestinian leaders.

The "road map" is a formal U.S.-backed peace plan that Israel and the Palestinians have accepted in principle as a basis for negotiations. The road map, which envisions an independent Palestinian state by 2005, leaves open to negotiation the specific issues addressed in the Geneva pact.

The White House yesterday said Powell was free to meet with the Geneva authors but underlined its commitment to the road map.

"The path forward toward peace in the Middle East is the road map," spokesman Scott McClellan said, adding that "The secretary of state will make determinations about who he meets with."

U.S. gestures toward the Geneva plan have been seen as an implicit criticism of Sharon's hardline stance toward the Palestinians. Powell on Tuesday confirmed he would meet with the Geneva accord's authors on Friday.

"I don't know why I or anyone else in the U.S. government should deny ourselves the opportunity to hear from others and who have ideas with respect to peace," Powell said at a news conference during a visit to Tunisia.

He added that the meeting "in no way undercuts our strong support" for Israel and the road map.

"It is as though the French foreign minister were to meet (American) Indian chiefs who claimed to have been dispossessed of their land, and who were now getting organized with money provided by the Cuban ruler Fidel Castro," read an editorial in Hatzofeh, a newspaper affiliated with the National Religious Party.

On Tuesday, Israeli Vice Premier Ehud Olmert said Powell would be "making a mistake" to meet the organizers, led by former Israeli Cabinet minister Yossi Beilin and Palestinian minister Yasser Abed Rabbo.

"I think he is not being useful to the process," Olmert told Israel Radio. "I am certain of his friendship (to Israel), but I would cast doubt on his judgment in this matter."

The Geneva Accord was launched at a gala ceremony in the Swiss city on Monday. It was the result of more than two years of talks between former Israeli and Palestinian negotiators, working in private capacities.

Sharon described the agreement as subversive. Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat praised the deal, but has stopped short of explicitly endorsing it.

Militant Palestinian groups denounced the accord and called the Palestinian negotiators "traitors," objecting to concessions over the so-called "return of return" of Palestinians who fled or were driven out during the 1948-49 war that followed Israel's creation, and of their descendants.

Kerry blasts Bush's foreign policy

By Sarah Kugler
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry yesterday assailed President Bush's foreign policy as "inept, reckless," as he proposed sending tens of thousands more troops to Iraq and naming special envoys to the Mideast and the Islamic world.

In a speech to the Council on Foreign Relations, the Massachusetts senator said the Bush administration has ruined international relationships with its global strategy and suggested that greater diplomacy would encourage allies to help in Iraq, perhaps with more troops. Kerry also warned against allowing the U.S. election calendar to dictate postwar rebuilding.

"It would be a disaster and a disgraceful betrayal of principle to speed up the process simply to lay the groundwork for a politically expedient withdrawal of American troops," he said.

If elected, Kerry said he would convene a summit of world leaders, perhaps including the Pope and the Dalai Lama, to determine how to "build bridges to the Islamic world." The administration, he said, has made nothing more than a "casual effort."

Jim Dyke, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee, rejected Kerry's speech as an "attempt to buoy his sinking poll numbers." Latest surveys show Kerry in the single digits in Iowa and trailing rival Howard Dean in New Hampshire.

Kerry said he would appoint special envoys to the Middle East and elsewhere, hoping to tap former commanders in chief such as Jimmy Carter, Bill Clinton or even the current president's father, George H.W. Bush. Prior to the speech, Kerry spoke to Carter and Clinton.

"There's great talent out there, with people who've been through this," Kerry said during a question-and-answer session after his speech. "The United States has always been the leverage, if you will, the broker of goodwill to try to bring the parties together."

Kerry also suggested former Secretary of State James Baker as a possible envoy, a proposal that drew criticism from rival Wesley Clark, who called the notion of using the Republican who played a role in the 2000 Florida recount "offensive."

Cincinnati man's death blamed on arrest struggle

By John Nolan
Associated Press

CINCINNATI (AP) — The death of a 350-pound black man who collapsed after being clubbed by police in a videotaped beating was caused primarily by the struggle, the coroner said yesterday in a case that has heightened racial tensions.

Hamilton County Coroner Carl Parrott said Nathaniel Jones, 41, suffered from an enlarged heart, obesity and had intoxicating levels of cocaine, PCP and methanol in his blood.

He said the death will be ruled a homicide, but added that such a decision does not mean police used "excessive force." The coroner said he had to rule the death a homicide because it did not fall under the other categories: accident, suicide or natural.

"Since the struggle was the result of a purposeful act, in this case, the effort by the police to subdue him, to do their jobs, that purposeful act was a primary cause of death," Parrott said.

Black activists say Jones' death was another example of police brutality against blacks in a city that was rocked by race riots two years ago. That unrest was sparked after a white police officer shot and killed an unarmed fleeing black suspect.

But city officials have said the officers in the current case were properly defending themselves against a violent suspect. The officers — five whites and one black — were placed on administrative leave, which is standard procedure.

The struggle occurred early Sunday after an employee at a White Castle called 911 to report that a man had passed out on the lawn outside. Emergency personnel arrived and reported that the man was awake and "becoming a nuisance," according to police radio transmissions.

The first two arriving officers were shown on a police video striking Jones after he ignored orders to "stay back," took a swing at an officer and put his arm around one's neck.

The officers later knocked Jones to the ground and fell on him, and jabbed or clubbed him with nightsticks at least a dozen times over several minutes until he was handcuffed. They kept yelling, "Put your hands behind your back!" as they struggled to handcuff him.

Jones' body had bruising on the lower half, but did not show signs of blows to the head or organ damage, the coroner said.

In Jones' car, police found cocaine and three hand-rolled cigarettes that had been dipped in methanol, an ingredient in embalming fluid that gets people high, authorities said.

His death certificate will list a cause of death as an irregular heart beat because of a stress reaction from the violent struggle, Parrott said.

The ruling came shortly after lawyers for Jones' family called for an independent investigation, claiming the coroner has mishandled past cases.

"It's hard for me to believe anything that comes out of the coroner's office," attorney Kenneth Lawson said at a news conference.

Relatives said Jones was a loving person who never hurt anyone.

"They talk about Skip like he was an animal," said his grandmother, Bessie Jones. "He wasn't. Skipper was just a good old, fat jolly fella. He wasn't violent."

"Everyone he met, that he touched, loved him," said his aunt, Diane Payton. "He was never mean."

Parrott said he has full confidence in his office's findings.

"We're doing things in the way everyone else does it. We're doing it to national and international standards," he said.

John Ester, spokesman for the prosecutor's office, said the office was in the preliminary stages of investigating the scuffle and was still awaiting the results of a police investigation.

Phone messages seeking comment on the coroner's ruling were left with police.

Romney's school visit sparks angry student protests

WINCHENDON, Mass. (AP) — Governor Mitt Romney's visit yesterday to a school in one of the two Massachusetts districts declared "underperforming" prompted angry protests from students who questioned the purpose of his visit.

As the Republican governor encouraged students at Winchendon's Murdock Middle High School to say no to drugs, smoking and teen pregnancy, some students waved signs that mocked and challenged his education policy.

Senior Kate Davidson held up a sign saying, "I'm the underperformer."

Sarah Mungeam, also a senior, held a sign that said, "I am not a statistic."

"We wanted to make a statement without being disruptive," Mungeam said. "By making these signs we thought we would get people to think. We are not all apathetic."

Based on standardized test scores, the state Board of Education last month declared the Winchendon and Holyoke school districts as underperforming. It was the first time a district has been given such a designation in Massachusetts, and could trigger a full state takeover if the districts fail to improve.

A state audit found the Winchendon schools scored 20th-lowest statewide on the Massachusetts Comprehensive Assessment System tests, a requirement for graduation.

Student Council representative Justin Johnson, a senior at Murdock, said he was disappointed with the governor's speech, which centered on an anti-drug message and avoided the topic of the state designation.

"I was looking for something more solid we could expand on in our school system," he said.

Following the speech, Romney presided over a roundtable discussion with parents and teachers that was closed to students and the media.

Bush signs bill allowing more cutting in forests to curb wildfire threat human interaction with fire and the wildland urban interface. It's obvious where we've been is not working," said Dombeck, now a forestry professor at the University of Wisconsin at Stevens Point.

But Dombeck said none of the changes in the bill would have prevented the fires that tore through swaths of California, Arizona and Colorado over the past two years.

The measure authorizes Congress to dedicate $760 million a year for thinning projects. At least half of the money must be spent on projects near homes and communities.

Jay Watson, wildfire expert with The Wilderness Society, said important changes were included in the bipartisan compromise bill that added money for thinning and required half the funds be spent in forests near communities. How the law is implemented will determine if it is helpful to the forests or a payback to the timber companies, he said.

The Center for Responsive Politics said the timber industry has contributed $14.1 million to political campaigns since 1999, 80 percent of it to Republicans. Bush received $519,330 from the industry. It also has spent $23.8 million on lobbying efforts since 2000, according to figures compiled by Political Money Line.

and the only graduate student on the committee is from a Worcester school.

The candidates for presidency will be kept a secret until the president is elected.

"Everything that they are doing is confidential," Nokes said.

The SGA also discussed raising the value of an YCMP swipe to $6.75. Currently holders of YCMP are receiving $5.75 per swipe.

In addition, the SGA also addressed the issue about representation of the ALANA caucus. There was debate whether or not it was constitutional to represent ALANA with appointed seats. However, the motion passed, telling the SGA to recognize the seats.

Nokes later said the issue would not be finalized until next semester, for the administration would need to approve it first.

Though, not all in attendance read the situation as such. Two senators within the ALANA caucus later said they understood that the seats are now reappropriated and should be recognized immediately.

Others felt that the ALANA issue should be handed over to the judiciary committee. Senator Olaf Aprans said the very fact that these seats are issued is wrong.

"They're pretty much getting a free seat on senate just because you believe in a certain things regarding a specific issue," said Aprans.

Also announced at the meeting was that the charges brought up last month against Senators Edwuardo Bustamante, Aiysha Cooper and Tayo Aiyeku were dismissed by the Rules and Ethics Committee. The possible charges consisted of the failure to adhere to an enactment of the SGA, among other offenses. Senator Gladys Franco was not in attendance, and therefore the discussion of her charge is pending.

The SGA has also allocated $100,000 dollars toward a comedy show that will be held at the Mullins center, on Feb. 19. The show will include Dave Chapel, Jim Beuir, Collin Quin and Dane Cook.

MBTA compromise proves encouraging

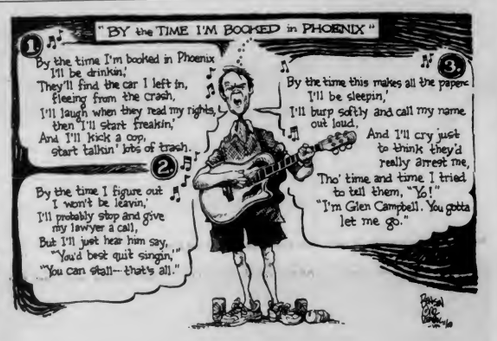
The Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority eased the fears of many subway musicians yesterday, announcing a compromise to tweak their new Subway Performers Program before it goes into effect.

The rules the MBTA originally planned to implement this month included many restrictions on performances that never before existed in Boston, including a ban on all forms of amplified music and horns in subway stations.

While the MBTA's new rules for performers still restrict subway musicians a great deal more than many of them would like, The Massachusetts Daily Collegian applauds the efforts of MBTA officials to meet in the middle on an issue near and dear to the hearts of many in the greater Boston area.

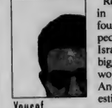
Revised guidelines, revealed yesterday by the MBTA to the Associated Press, will allow amplifiers, but with a maximum volume level of 80 decibels. The horn ban was modified to eliminate trumpets, but allow other brass and wind instruments. A new $25 fee will be implemented for performance permits, and performers must also remain in "proper clothing" and "neat in appearance."

The Collegian finds the solution reached to be agreeable, balancing both the safety concerns of the task force and the concerns of subway performers and many of the common people who ride the transit system to work every day. The latest development in this story shows that with the proper courses of action, compromise can be reached on potentially volatile issues. Both the MBTA and the Subway Artists Guild deserve praise for handling the situation in a professional, progressive way.



The MBTA announced the initial changes to their subway musician policies after a security task force evaluation performed an evaluation, recommending a complete ban on musician's altogether. Officials said the point of the ban on horns and amplified music was to keep the music from drowning out the public address system.

The Subway Artists Guild rallied behind the cause appropriately, filing a complaint with the American Civil Liberties Union and circulating a petition that corralled more than 6,000 commuter signatures. By presenting a petition, the guild showed the issue was much bigger than a matter of how it would affect the musicians themselves — they showed it would affect Bostonian culture in general.



The majority of the other restrictions on musicians the MBTA plans to implement are comparable to rules already in place in other metropolis areas around the country and world for street-side performers. According to the AP, transit systems in New York, San Francisco and Washington, D.C., all have restrictions on their musicians, as well.

While the guild still has some reservations with new policies, the comprising done already is encouraging to all involved. A tradition and part of our Massachusetts culture appears to be saved.

Terror threat: "Sharon Al-Capone"

Yousef Munayyer

Recently a poll in Europe found that most people believe Israel is the biggest threat to world peace. Another interesting question would be: What's the biggest threat to Israel? Many have said, and more continue to say, that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is the nation's biggest threat.

Sharon, like other past Israeli prime ministers, has an interesting and twisted history. For example, Menachim Begin and Yitzhak Shamir were the leaders of terrorist organizations and were wanted by the British government for acts of terror in the Mandate of Palestine. Sharon continues this fine Israeli tradition of criminal turned political leader.

In the early 1980s, in the midst of a Lebanese civil war, the Israelis had invaded southern Lebanon and had taken control over Palestinian refugee camps. Thousands were killed in the refugee camps of Sabra and Shatilla — camps under Israeli control by Lebanese militias. Sharon was found indirectly responsible by a court in Israel for the brutal murder of thousands of refugees, many of which were elderly, woman and children. He was banned from ever serving in some ministerial positions in the government.

Recently, charges of war crimes were brought against Sharon for his role in the massacres in Sabra and Shatila. The lead witness in the case against Sharon was a former leader of a Lebanese militia during the civil war that had been living in Lebanon. Then suddenly, in the most Mafioso fashion, this lead witness died when he walked out of his door, blown to pieces by a car bomb just days before he was to testify. A case of bad luck, I guess.

So Israel found Sharon to be the best guy for the job in the last election, and Sharon, a man with plenty of blood on his hands, was to be the leader of a nation seeking peace. Being a hard liner, he ran on the platform of bringing security to Israel. Many trusted him for that. It becomes clear that he has failed miserably, and many Israelis are letting him know about it.

Many Israelis are fed up with Sharon and are not willing to live in Israel. Israel is a nation with approximately 6.6 million citizens, 20 percent of which are Arabs. In the year 2000, 550,000 Israelis lived outside of Israel. Recent numbers from Israel's Immigration and Absorption Ministry state that statistic has since increased quite dramatically to 760,000.

Also, it has become very interesting to see that the voices criticizing the current Israeli administration are changing. No longer are they the usual suspects, such as occupied Palestinians and leftist Israelis, but also members of the Sharon administration and who are intelligence officials as well.

According to a recent Washington Post column, only a few weeks ago Israel's Army Chief of Staff Moshe Yaalon criticized the Sharon government for the policies it's pursuing. He said the harsh and abusive policies that the Sharon government was carrying out were only breeding "hatred and terrorism."

The column had this to say about the status of the Israeli forces: "With the Israel Defense Forces in the fourth year of battle with the Palestinians, the most dominant institution in Israeli society is also embroiled in a struggle over its own character, according to dozens of interviews with soldiers, officers, reservists and some of the nation's preeminent military analysts."

Many people are questioning the policies of the Sharon government. This is because they can see it is not working; they can see it is the wrong way to do business.

Recently, and also maybe most notably, four former members of Israel's internal security network, the Shin Bet, openly criticized the Sharon government's overly punitive policies with Palestinians. Yediot Ahranot, an Israeli newspaper, reported the criticism, causing much controversy in Israel.

Avram Shalom, who led the Shin Bet organization from 1980 until 1986, said, "We must once and for all admit that there is another side, that it has feelings and that it is suffering and that we are behaving disgracefully. Yes, there is no other word for it: disgracefully … we have turned them into a people of petty fighters using the wrong tools." He even said that Israel is heading for a "catastrophe" if it continues to follow these brutal policies. I found that terminology particularly thought provoking.

More and more people openly criticize Sharon's policies everyday. Hundreds of Israeli military personal refuse to serve in the West Bank and Gaza.

One soldier who felt disgraced about some of the things he has been ordered to do even told the Washington Post, "You really feel disgusting. You see these people, and you know the majority of them are innocent and you're taking away their rights."

Israelis are realizing that the war criminal they elected has not brought them security. They are realizing that he has in fact only brought them fear. Never before have so many people left Israel. Never before have so many people spoke out against the policies of an Israeli administration.

The Israeli right continues to fight what is becoming a loosing battle. You cannot put people down, dehumanize them, brutally repress them and then expect to have a "partner for peace."

It has become increasingly clear that Israelis are beginning to see Sharon as a threat to Israel's future. His policies are delaying any negotiations, and many Israelis see a necessity to make a final deal immediately. Some Israeli and Palestinian leaders have drafted a proposed solution that started in Geneva and recently concluded in Jordan.

Sharon has refused to even acknowledge this initiative. As the Palestinian population continues to grow, Israelis become increasingly worried about a deal. Palestinians will soon be a clear majority over Israelis because of high birth rates and Israeli immigration. That creates a deep fear for Israelis. What if those Palestinians wanted to be a part of Israel? What if they wanted a vote? To Israelis, this fear is burning the little patience they have for the uncooperative Sharon government.

I'll leave with sobering words from Israeli Major General Ami Ayalon, who headed the Shin Bet from 1996 until 2000 and also told Yediot Ahranot: "The state of Israel will no longer be a democracy and a home for the Jewish people."

Thoughts on abortion through the male eye

They aren't our bodies, but we pass laws that control them. Congress, a predominantly male body, has in the last month passed a law concerning partial-birth abortions. On Oct. 24, the Washington Post article described the law: "It subjects doctors who perform 'partial-birth' abortions to civil suits by the biological father and the woman's parents, if they do not consent to the procedure and the woman is not yet 18." This decision has somewhat brought the issue up in the public's conversations concerning the issue of abortion.

Chris Kane

Congress has made partial-birth abortions illegal. This means that there is now a limit to when an abortion can take place. Whether or noi you agree with this law, you must still recognize that men are mostly those who put this law into action. And while recognizing this, women must wonder what the real male opinion on abortion is.

As a male, I have a different view on abortion than most women. It is not my body. Therefore, it doesn't directly effect me in that way. However, I do have an opinion on the issue itself. I think it is wrong to have an abortion because the mother is choosing to take away a life that has no choice in the matter. But, because it is not affecting my body directly, I also think that the woman should have the choice on whether or not to go through with an abortion.

Based on interviewing 20 males at the University of Massachusetts, this is what I have found most men believe. This is because most males these days are aware that women should have a right to choose what they want to do with their lives. Most men these days are no longer ignorant that women have feelings too.

But there are other opinions that exist among males. According to my interviews, there are other men who, because they find abortion to be morally wrong, feel the need to have control over the fact that women do not commit it. Some of these men can also be found in Congress and other government positions trying to pass laws banning abortion. This is the only way these men can put any control over this situation. Making abortion illegal of course does not put a stop to women having abortions, but it does put a negative light on it.

However, a man who is not involved in government can feel just as strongly about abortion being morally wrong. Yet, he has no control over it for the obvious reason that it is not his body. The only way men have control over the issue is through the power of persuasion. A woman's boyfriend may try to convince her not to have an abortion, but in the long run, it is still the woman's decision.

Lastly, there is the man who doesn't see abortions as a sin or even as negative. He feels that it is 100 percent the female's choice on whether or not to go through with the procedure.

Abortion does affect men indirectly. Whether or not the man likes it, if a woman gets pregnant, it is because of him. Although it does take two to tango, the male is often the one blamed for the unwanted pregnancy. It is because of this that one would think the male would have a more influential role in the decision, but he does not. One can only wonder what would happen if the male wanted to keep the baby and the female did not. In that case, he is nearly helpless; persuasion is his only power.

Another issue many couples face, resulting in the abortion controversy, is what to do with the baby if and when he or she is born. Most couples considering abortion usually choose it because of their financial situation. Couples have to take into consideration what would happen if they were to become parents. Here is also where the man and woman tend to disagree. The man might feel he will be able to support a family, while the woman might think an abortion is necessary. Again, even if the roles are reversed, the male takes the back seat in the actual decision-making. He can only state his opinion and attempt to convince her to agree. The woman has the upper hand in the situation; she has the power and the responsibility.

Because men feel like they have no control over the issue of abortion, they usually back away from it. Those men who feel so strongly about it are the only ones who do get involved and try to bring about change. No matter what the man's opinion is on the subject, he must realize that he isn't the one with all the power anymore. Especially in the case of abortion, women carry the torch.

The talented Mr. Ashcroft

Mark Ostroff

This week, the most devastating month for casualties since the end of major combat, comes to an end. There are now 509 confirmed coalition deaths and a minimum of 7,918 civilian deaths. The Department of Defense has confirmed the following American deaths:

Captain George A. Wood, 33; Corporal Gary B. Coleman, 24; Private first class Damian S. Bushart, 22; Staff Sergeant Eddie E. Menyweather, 35; Specialist Rel A. Ravago IV, 21; Command Sergeant Major Jerry L. Wilson, 45; Specialist Joseph L. Lister, 22; Specialist Robert D. Roberts, 21; Corporal Darrell L. Smith, 28; Chief Warrant Officer, W-2 Christopher G. Nason, 39; Technieal Sergeant William J. Kerwood, 37; Technical Sergeant Howard A. Walters, 33; Staff Sergeant Thomas A. Walkup Jr., 25; Major Steven Plumhoff, 33; Sergeant Major Phillip R. Albert, 41; Specialist David J. Goldberg, 20; Specialist Thomas J. Sweet II, 23; Sergeant Ariel Rico, 25.

May they rest in peace.

"Over my dead body," was the reaction of Rep. James Sensenbrenner Jr., after learning that Sen. Orrin Hatch proposed the removal of the Patriot Act's "sunset clause," according to the San Francisco Chronicle. A "sunset clause" is used in declaring that a law will no longer be valid after a certain point in time. The Patriot Act has a "sunset" of five years. Had Hatch gotten his way, the laws would have been indefinite. And not just Democrats, but Republicans too want to see these five years done and over with. As Americans are beginning to find out, however, a lot can happen in two and a half years.

As 2003 comes to an end, a new law proposal will be coming on the floors of Congress. That new proposal, in a creepy-yet-unintentional reference to George Orwell's "1984," will be called the Victory Act. The bill, if shot down, is expected to come back as line-item legislation or a "rider" on an impertinent bill. (Bush used "riders" in the Homeland Security Act and was able to cover up parts of the 9/11 investigations.)

The Victory Act's full name is the Vital Interdiction of Criminal Terrorist Organizations Act. As you may have already guessed, it asks for even more sweeping powers to the Department of Justice and Attorney General John Ashcroft, designed to fight not only the War on Terror, but the War on Drugs on the same front.

Though it may sound appealing, the Victory Act is a law just waiting to get out of hand. In this act, the crime of drug possession would be treated as a "terrorist offense." This is based on the premise that, like those insane anti-marijuana commercials imply, you are aiding terrorism if you buy drugs. Those convicted under the new law would be considered a "narco-terrorist."

Another potentially dangerous provision is that the government will be allowed to issue "roving warrants" on cell phones. This means that Big Brother can listen in on you whenever he wants. All they have to do is claim that somewhere, someone with "evil" intentions is using a cell phone. The Victory Act, will, of course, heighten public surveillance in other areas as well.

The Christian Science Monitor reports that Ashcroft "is intent on broadening the sidewalk the terrorists are walking on, redefining its borders so that more and more people can be monitored for spitting. The proposed 'Victory Act' is case in point." The bill is the second brainchild of Attorney General John Ashcroft.

Ashcroft is an interesting man in the way one would call Michael Jackson interesting. According to his own autobiography, "Lessons From a Father to His Son," before taking a major post, his father anoints him with oil, "like King David." (He actually used Crisco once!) He is also the first senator to ever lose an election to a dead man, reports CNN.

Ashcroft is also prone to small — call it — outbursts of patriotism, in which he has his staff sing along to self-composed songs like "Let the Eagle Soar," an overly patriotic, Christian version of Englebert Humperdinck's "Lesbian Seagull."

The U.K. Independent reports that Ashcroft had also spent $8,000 on covering up the topless "Spirit of Justice" statue.

The same article also says he is a member of a sect known as the Assemblies of God. One of the many reports, released by the church, include one named, "Can Born-Again Believers Be Demon-Possessed?" The article claims: "The spread of oriental religions and the occult in America has brought with it an increase in demon possession similar to that reported formerly by missionaries on foreign fields. All too often there has been too little teaching in this area."

Another church statement, entitled, "Does the Assemblies of God involve itself more in political issues," states: "The alarming shift from a Judeo-Christian philosophy to secular humanism as the foundation of American government has created profound problems for all Bible-believing churches. More and more, government is defying biblical principles and interpreting sinful behavior as civil rights, i.e. abortion and homosexuality. The church as the body of Christ is obligated to respond." Ashcroft agrees.

The U.K. Independent once quoted the eccentric Attorney General, "It is said we shouldn't legislate morality. Well, I disagree. I think all we should legislate is morality."

As yet another tolerant member of the Bush administration, he has also proclaimed, "Islam is a religion in which God requires you to send your son to die for him. Christianity is a faith in which God sends his son to die for you." According to the Washington Post, after public outrage from his statement, the attorney general cheaply responded by saying that his remarks "do not accurately reflect what I believe I said." (Even Trent Lott had a better comeback!)

For some reason or another, neoconservatives, talking heads and just simply panic-stricken citizens find absolutely no problem with giving a man like this even more sweeping powers than before. I find it problematic … very problematic.

As Bush has proclaimed that we will not bend to Islamic fundamentalism, we should not bend to Christian fundamentalism either.

Americans should be encouraged to read the kinds of legislation that concern their own rights. The sad part is that all of this is done under public scrutiny and many people just lack the time, motivation or means to get to it. Even worse, the public seems to be more concerned with the oddities of a guy like Jackson, instead of the oddities of the top law enforcement official, who seeks sweeping powers to redefine and enforce laws that suit his marginal view of the world.

Thanksgiving still fresh in the mind

Many thank-you's to share

Rachel Smith

Thanksgiving is over, but I have some gratitude left to share with the world. I have some turkey, too. I also have a huge credit card bill for my plane ticket home last week. If you're low on veneration, let me know. I'm low on cash, and we can probably work something out.

Thank goodness the presidential election is coming up, and thank goodness Senator Joe Lieberman is running. All of the Democratic candidates have great qualities, but only Sen. Lieberman can lead our country during these difficult times. He's strong in the same areas where President George W. Bush is strong, like on national defense. However, he can beat Bush where's he's weak: on social and economic policies.

The University of Massachusetts deserves several thank you's for teaching me the pure joys of bureaucracy tempered by my love of learning. I wouldn't have nearly as much fun here if I spent as much time in class as I do in the bursar's line. That kind of tedium facilitates a zen-like self-awareness that can only arrive at fruition behind the velvet ropes of the Whitmore Administration building. Thank you, UMass, thank you.

It's a proven fact that tequila reduces a college student's need for shuteye by at least 20 percent. That means I'm getting around 40 percent more sleep than I actually need.

Thank you, President George W. Bush for being so darn adorable. He is just as cute as a button on a baby's pajamas. Every time he stumbles through another speech about how and why our civil liberties are actually un-American, I just want to coo.

I owe many, many thank-you's to my family, who have stuck by me the only way a Lower East Side New York, Jewish mom and dad can — with much guilt and a healthy does of nagging. Yes, I'm getting enough sleep. It's a proven fact that tequila reduces a college student's need for shuteye by at least 20 percent. That means I'm getting around 40 percent more sleep than I actually need. Other students can feel free to cut and paste this completely fictional statistic into their e-mails and sent it home to concerned parents. I guarantee you they'll be thrilled.

I'm grateful for my off-campus apartment. The rats are gone now, and the electricity doesn't flicker as much as it did in the summer. My bathroom stopped leaking, and I don't smell the upstairs neighbor's dog lately. I hope it's not dead. Actually, yes I do. This is a terrific bargain in Amherst for $700 a month, which I split with my roommate (when he makes the rent on time). Ah, the joys of independence are endless.

Thank you to whoever invented group projects. I love doing all the work meant for six people and getting an "A/B" for my efforts. There's nothing more frustrating than an "A/B." It's like one of those guys who extends his hand to shake yours, then retracts it really quickly. "Hey, here's an 'A!' Congratulations! Nope! Gotcha!" Group projects help me build character. Unfortunately, this character is about to snap, sit cross-legged on the floor of the Blue Wall and count plastic knives until somebody forcibly removes her.

My thanks go to Gov. Mitt Romney, the state of Massachusetts or whoever is responsible for cutting financial aid to out-of-state students. I'm honored to be your cash cow; I only hope I can afford to stay next semester.

I am truly grateful for coffee. There is nothing more satisfying than ingesting so much caffeine that my left eye twitches uncontrollably. Between the coffee and the tequila, I'll never need to sleep again.

Thank goodness for University Health Services. Unless we elect a Democrat into office in 2004, most of us graduating seniors won't get health coverage comparable to the service we get at UHS for quite some time, if ever. I'm thankful for health care while I have it.

I am eternally grateful for calzones at midnight. My hips, on the other hand, are probably less appreciative.

On the subject of food, I'm thankful for $6 stale sandwiches at the Blue Wall. I would have never known that tuna fish ages so well if I had never come to UMass. One of these days, I'll try the roast beef, but I want to make sure I do it over a long weekend, just in case.

Thank you, Student Government Association for free newspapers. Allocating student fees for The New York Times and The Boston Globe was an excellent idea. Being a student is more than attending class; it's about integrating learned knowledge into the world around us. Picking up a decent newspaper and checking out what's going on outside of UMass is an integral part of scholarship.

Finally, I'm thankful for all the things I take for granted now that I'll miss when I graduate next semester, like writing this column or standing in line at the Financial Aid office. This is a little early for New Year's resolutions, but I intend to set aside more time for giving thanks, even for the stuff I dislike, as I prepare for my journey out of UMass and back into reality.

A not-so-traditional Thanksgiving

Gilad Skolnick

It's a day for family and feasting and for giving thanks for all of our blessings. A holiday centuries old, celebrated all across the country by all who are patriotic, except for many Native Americans who are ticked off at the whole genocide and stealing their land thing.

My friends and peers were kicked off the UMass campus and sent home to take part in a tradition. All came back with big grins on our faces, after undertaking in this joyous feast. But last Thursday, as my family was butchering Thanksgiving, I realized how unpatriotic they are.

My family isn't the most observant when it comes to holidays, and although my family tries to celebrate them, they don't follow the age-old traditions of our culture. Rather than celebrate the holiday on Thursday, as tradition mandates, they celebrate on a Friday. Worst yet, they celebrate on Friday night, an insult to the very essence of the holiday.

For ages, this day was celebrated on a Thursday afternoon, yet suddenly, my family thinks they can move Thanksgiving celebration to another day. I'm not sure why, but it was probably celebrated on a Thursday for a reason, probably a good one, and who are we to change the day? What right do we have? It's just not the same when it's on a Friday — and at night.

The biggest abomination was the serving of the turkey. Having watched hours upon hours of sitcoms the week before Thanksgiving, it became evidently clear that the turkey must be served and cut on the table when all of the guests are present. On every show — from "The Simpsons" to "Everybody Loves Raymond" — the turkey was cut right on the table. You can imagine my disgust and look of horror on my face when I found the turkey had been precut several hours before the meal was served. Carving the turkey on the table is a fundamental aspect of the Thanksgiving feast, and is not one of the traditions that can be bent or stretched. They might as well have served chicken wings.

Sure we had all the other necessary foods of the holiday, from cornbread and cranberry sauce to pumpkin pie, along with official Thanksgiving paper plates and matching napkins, but without the head of the table showing their turkey-cutting skills, it is simply not Thanksgiving.

You can imagine my disgust ... when I found the turkey had been precut several hours before the meal was served.

There's only one more thing this holiday requires, as I've learned from television: Everyone around the table should say what he or she is thankful for. All year I go around not being thankful for anything that I get, frequently taking wonderful things for granted. So naturally, as everyone started devouring the food that was in front of them, I sat a little confused and bewildered. I had spent weeks preparing my list of things I was thankful for, ready for going around the table when each would state our thoughts, and I heard nothing … nothing. You don't have to do too many things for this holiday, and the few requirements were completely ignored.

Upon reciting to friends and peers in detail about how my family "does Thanksgiving," they assumed that I was kidding, but this is no exaggeration. It's sadly so very, very true.

At least Thanksgiving Day was celebrated at some point. My family did absolutely nothing for one of my favorite holidays, Columbus Day, and I didn't even get an Evacuation Day card or a Veterans Day present. My house was absent of flags for Flag Day, and Forth of July is usually celebrated by my family on July 6 or 7, or whenever the closest weekend is. My family often ignores Wash-ington During Presidents Day, and little time is focused on Lincoln as it is.

Bunker Hill Day is an all-time favorite of mine, a day commemorating the colonists' heroic loss to the British on Breeds Hill (and to all you out-of-staters, Bunker Hill Day is a real holiday on June 17), but my family didn't even mention it. They don't even accept its existence.

I desire to properly celebrate the day when the Pilgrims thanked the Native Americans for their help, and in return introduced them to the wonders of the Old World, such as beads, horses, metal and smallpox.

Perhaps one day my wish will become a reality, but until then I can only live out Thanksgiving through television and dreams. I'd like to thank Nate Kupel for giving me the courage to come out and tell the world about how my family "does" Thanksgiving.

The madness of finals and the holidays

Deborah Geiger

Is it me, or are the chances of you getting out of bed on time tomorrow morning slimmer than the spring lineup of Belgian supermodels? Blame it on the weather, but the little bit of academic time left between the Thanksgiving and winter break reliably reduces us each year to lazy, homesick, agoraphobic college washouts. Luckily, there are a few simple measures you can take to fend off this horrible and utterly contagious syndrome. Start with why you're here in the first place ... academics!

You're probably tempted to stop going to class, or skip out on doing that last assignment. You just don't want to, feel mentally inept or more simply you just "don't care anymore!" In fact, you rejoice while just saying this out loud. You can't help but feel like either totally relaxing or totally letting loose. Don't ... not yet. Stick it out. One way to address the madness is to make a countdown calendar. You can do this with notes if you're feeling particularly neurotic. Seeing the time in front of you as logical squares, even if they are canary yellow, makes it less interminable somehow.

Professors are looking for people who follow through, especially in the end, as will your future bosses and most people you'll ever have to deal with. Anyone can sleep in and flake out. Your work will come to you. Just focus on doing one thing at a time, even if it means sentence by sentence. Some people will understand (you know who you are) when you have to say, "Okay. In 10 seconds, I am going to take my right leg out of bed." Don't feel stupid about this. We've all been there, and you've got to start somewhere! Just focus on your goal of getting tangible things done, like that final paper. Take baby steps if you need to. If you're lucky, it will start to feel like part of the madness, and the most rewarding work, is the kind that feels like part of the madness.

If you still haven't used that empty-as-a-nuclear-wasteland planner, now is not too late. Make a master list of everything pressing and schedule time for your most important jobs, including study breaks and 7 p.m. Seinfeld if that's how you relax. Write it all in there. Promise yourself you'll stick to it, if only for this semester. Tell yourself you're "testing the effectiveness of time management" if you're one of those people that needs an excuse. Even one solid hour of work a day will get you through a lot more than procrastination!

Another beast of the season you'll have to battle: the family and friends machine. Mustering up a spirit of generosity and kindness, to put it mildly, may feel impossible. It's okay. Don't feel guilty about this. Focus on doing what you have to do. If you're working or not in the mood to talk, just don't answer the phone or door; you must be your first priority. Only people in your exact juggling-act-of-an-existence can understand. No matter how much you love Grandma, who probably just got done flirting with the teenage pool boy down in her Ft. Lauderdale duplex, will be hard pressed to understand your frustrations or mood. So in order to get things done, you're going to have to screen your communication and gauge your mood very carefully during this difficult, but amazing time.

Getting things done may feel like you're doing for others, but you're actually doing for yourself. You are in the throes of college life. Whether this is your first semester or your last, you'll remember, and reap the effects of what you do at this moment for years to come. Enjoy your life, your friends and all that you're blessed to have. Know that you're actually getting things done this holiday season, and it may be a habit you'll want to keep.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

STUDENT SPEAKS OUT FOR TODAY'S FEMINIST MOVEMENT

"Feminist" is a scary word, isn't it? Bra-burning militant lesbian manhaters ranting about unsubstantiated radical issues of little relevance in today's progressive society.

Our NOW membership is up. Put your bras back on, ladies.

I'm worried about the state of feminism, as it was presented in S.J. Port's "The Feminist Epiphany" (Dec. 3). Has the U.S. moved forward in workplace opportunities and new ideas of family and gender identity? Yes, undoubtedly. Do "American women today have rights equal to their male counterparts … protected as full citizens?" Has feminism gone as far as it can go? I guess all the money I've spent on these silly Women's Studies courses would have been better spent on a subscription to Cosmo or a vacuum cleaner. Maybe a new bra.

No doubt, the decision to take the "traditional" role of mother and caretaker is as honorable and important as any CEO position. Inarguably, the feminist movement is responsible for the drastic increase of women in the workplace. It is responsible that for the first time in history, more women than men are currently enrolled in higher education programs around the United States.

But I'm not satisfied with what the workplace is going to offer me when I graduate. I pay for an education equal to my male classmates, and I'll demand a paycheck equal to my male coworkers. According to Catalyst, a New York based research group supporting the advancement of women in business, only eight of the Fortune 500 companies have female CEOs. Eight.

Women can enjoy careers outside the home. But how can we rightfully tell our daughters, "You can be anything you want to be," unless we continue the fight off our mothers and grandmothers against gender-based inequity? What better way to guarantee and enforce laws protecting women than to have women in charge of making them? How can we expect equality of opportunities and respect unless we are in more prominent positions of power?

No one can reasonably argue that the role of mother and caretaker is an unimportant one. It is a woman's right to choose a "traditional" role rather than a job outside the home, or a career instead of a family. It is rarely an either/or situation, though.

is "the emancipated woman" the one who wakes up to dress, feed and ready the children for school, works a 10-hour shift for 73 cents for every dollar her male coworker earns, returns home to cook dinner, folds the laundry, reads the bedtime stories, pays the bills and goes to bed ready to do it all the next day?

Is that to be the legacy of Sojourner Truth, Susan B. Anthony, Sally Ride, Chandra Mohanty and millions of other women who challenged their "place in society?" In this country, women head 12.9 million households. The idea of a society of CEO moms and stay-at-home dads certainly has its appeal — more active involvement of fathers in the raising of their children, more leadership positions for women in the workplace. That's what feminism is fighting for; that's what humanism is calling for; that's what we should all be working for.

To sit back and say feminism has ran its course is to disrespect the feminist movement, past and present. Feminism is — feminism must be —persistently and vibrantly alive and well today. If it's between being someone complacent with a women's position today or being a so-called ball-bashing, man-hating - ism, I'll proudly be the latter.

Hope to see you at the top.

GEO CLARIFIES THE CONTRACT ISSUE

We are writing in response to The Massachusetts Daily Collegian's Dec. 2 column "Ignorance Leads to Downfall." Being members of the Graduate Employee Organization's Bargaining Committee, we feel it is necessary to correct some inaccurate statements made in the editorial. While we agree wholeheartedly with the sentiment that "[Romney] copped out," we wish to address some raised points.

The Bargaining Committee is composed of 11 people, nine committee members and two alternate members and is elected by the membership of the GEO. Our purpose is to negotiate a new contract on behalf of all graduate student workers (GEO members or not) this spring. The contract we are currently working under expires at the end of spring semester. It is this contract that contains the raises that were not honored by the state and that were funded (both for spring semester and retroactively) in the current bill recently signed by the governor.

There are two points in the column we feel need clarification. First, "[state negotiators] made promises the state can't possibly keep" is erroneous. The representatives for the University are in contact with the governor's office (at the time the Jane Swift was Governor) throughout the bargaining process. The cost of living pay increases were approved during this process by both the governor and later the state legislature through an appropriations bill. Second, the phrase "three percent, five percent, 15 percent — they're all just numbers" is misleading. The pay increases (which were approved at "every level of the system" when the contract was first negotiated) are simple cost of living increases, specifically a three percent pay raise yearly. Rent, food and other daily living expenses increase roughly at this rate every year, and it is only fair that the graduate students who work very hard to keep this University running smoothly have their pay increased to be able to live decently. Calculated over the three years of the contract, the raises are roughly 10 percent, but it is important to understand this is a cumulative effect, not a giant pay raise for student workers.

We disagree with the statement "[Romney is] balancing the demands of people who want … no raised taxes, raised pay and a balanced budget." Many of us (graduate student workers or not) believe the best way to ensure the fiscal health of the state and the proper funding of the University is through the implementation of a more equitable system of taxation that levies higher rates on corporations and the more wealthy segments of our society.

While we do not always agree with them during the bargaining process, we have nothing but respect for the representatives of the University at the bargaining table and resent them being labeled as "fools."

SKIS & BOARDING

The Ski Scene of New England

Erika Lowley

There is nothing like the thrill of riding through three-feet-deep powder with the wind rushing through your ears on a crisp sunny day. You can be anywhere in the world this Christmas season, but there's no place like home — for holiday snowboarding that is. New England is the home of some of the finest snowboarding opportunities in the world.

Despite the cold outlook — predicted for this winter's weather — the snow for this season has never looked better.

For me, the season officially begins with the first waxing of my board; an annual event that falls on Nov. 1. Dragging out the tools, wax and iron from the back of the closet only incites my eagerness to find snow; no matter how far I have to drive to get it.

Five months out of the year in New England is basically guaranteed to provide snow-making weather. Even if the precipitation isn't coming naturally, the resorts will still have the low temperatures required to produce a decent artificial covering.

In my home state, Virginia, snowboarding was an extreme sport people watched on ESPN and in movies; the southern snow simply didn't stick around long enough to cut a trail.

My first experience snowboarding came during a high school trip to Berkshire East during my freshman year. I decided I would teach myself to snowboard, even though I had never taken a lesson in my life. I spent the entire cold afternoon alone on the slopes, taking horrific spills — or what boarders refer to as "eating snow." Finally, after knocking the wind out of my lungs by falling into a ditch full of prickers, I unstrapped my bindings and stomped down the mountain, out of utter frustration.

Halfway down, I lost my grasp on the rental board, sending it careening down the mountain and crashing into the front steps of the lodge. Amazingly, no one was killed and the board wasn't dam-

NoHo ski sale

It can be very expensive to ski. Mountain lift tickets plus travel and lodging — most notably, gear, can wipe out an entire student bank account.

While online sales are the cheapest for tickets and gear — even better deals are found in the local community with used and outdated equipment at sales. This Saturday, Dec. 6, at the Northampton Community Center there will be a ski and skate sale.

Used equipment donated to the Lions Club will be on sale and individuals will be selling their equipment with a 15 percent donation price added for the Lions Club. For people interested in selling their equipment it is to be dropped off Friday night between 6 p.m. and 9 p.m.

The sale begins at 9 a.m. on Sat and ends at 2 p.m. Between 2 p.m. and 4 p.m. on Saturday unsold equipment or the money for sold equipment can be picked up. Not only will it be used equipment from the community, but there will also be new selections of last year's stock from local stores — a great bargain for unused equipment. For more information, call 413-587-1137.

Berkshire East

LIFT PRICING FOR ADULTS:
Two-tier pricing:
midweek and weekend/ holiday
- Afternoon: $20/$30
- Night: $20/$20
- Full-day: $25/$40

Perhaps the closest ski and board resort to the University of Massachusetts is Berkshire East. It is opening this weekend and has very affordable rates for students.

Berkshire East is a very enjoyable place with 100 percent snowmaking, 45 trails and five lifts, including a new quad this season.

The new west quad opens up the Wilderness Peak, an expansion that accesses every trail that the old Exhibition double did, as well as Roundabout, Hemlock, Snow Dance and Sun Dance. This chairlift begins at the newly renovated West Lodge. This expansion and high-capacity fixed grip quad will give Berkshire East faster lines with much more mountain to enjoy.

A beginner will love the Outback-Roundabout run — now open day and night and a novice trail two and a half miles long. It wraps itself around the side of the mountain, and you will slowly find yourself taking in breathtaking views of the Pioneer Valley while going over slight lips as you oscillate through the woods back toward the lift and lodge.

For the more advanced skier is a black diamond run, which was cut as wide as a dorm room at most parts, with its huge drop-offs. Berkshire East also offers the East Glade run — 1,000 feet of virtual wood terrain — as well as many other Glades runs.

For more information, call 413-339-7 or visit www.berkshireeast.com.

- Five-day: $198/$215/$288
- Six-day: $221/$239/$328
- Seven-day: $243/$262/$365

Nestled in the Green Mountains of Southern Vermont, Stratton Mountain offers fabulous skiing condition in an affordable and classy atmosphere.

Located in Bondville, Vermont, Stratton offers 90 trails for every kind of skier. Stratton receives an average annual snowfall of 180 inches and falls along Vermont's famed "Snowbelt." They also boast 13 lifts, including two new high-speed six passenger lifts.

Stratton also has different activities to satisfy any winter sports aficionado. For the snowboarders, there is Learn-to-Ride instruction for beginners, as well as season long racing programs. Stratton also boasts a Superpipe and was also the home of the U.S. Open Snowboarding Championships.

For the cross-country skier, Stratton has more than 30 kilometers of trails that take a skier through the breathtaking and scenic woods of the Green Mountains. The mountain also features its own community of shopping and restaurants to visit, as well as affordable and quality lodging and accommodations.

New this year is the "Phoenix," which is accommodations for young adults under 21. The Phoenix is expected to open over the Christmas holiday. It is intended to provide entertainment such as DJs, live music and games for the under 21 crowd.

Stratton provides first-rate skiing as well as an enjoyable nightlife at an affordable price.

midweek/weekend/holiday
- One-day: $59/$65/$65
- Two-day: $110/$118/$123
- Three-day: $156/$162/$180
- Four-day: $197/$203/$233
- Five-day: $240/$244/$280

Located over 601 acres of terrain in the quiet village of Ludlow, Vt., Okemo Mountain Resort is one of the most popular spots for ski and snowboard lovers alike in New England and also one of the biggest.

At this resort there are 113 slopes, trails and glades with a breakdown of 35 trails for novice skiers, 49 trails for intermediate and 29 trails for the advanced and expert kind.

Alongside the slopes and trails are two super pipes and a mini half pipe for kids and beginners.

The newest addition to Okemo for the 2003-04 season is the improvements made to its most popular mountain terrain, Jackson Gore. Nearly $55 million was invested in pushing the trail number up from seven to 14 and constructing an entirely new base lodge and resort center.

Situated in the epicenter of the Jackson Gore base area is the Jackson Gore Inn, which is an upscale lodge that offers standard rooms to three-bedroom suites. The new Jackson Gore Inn is beautiful, but the main base lodge area may be more affordable for students.

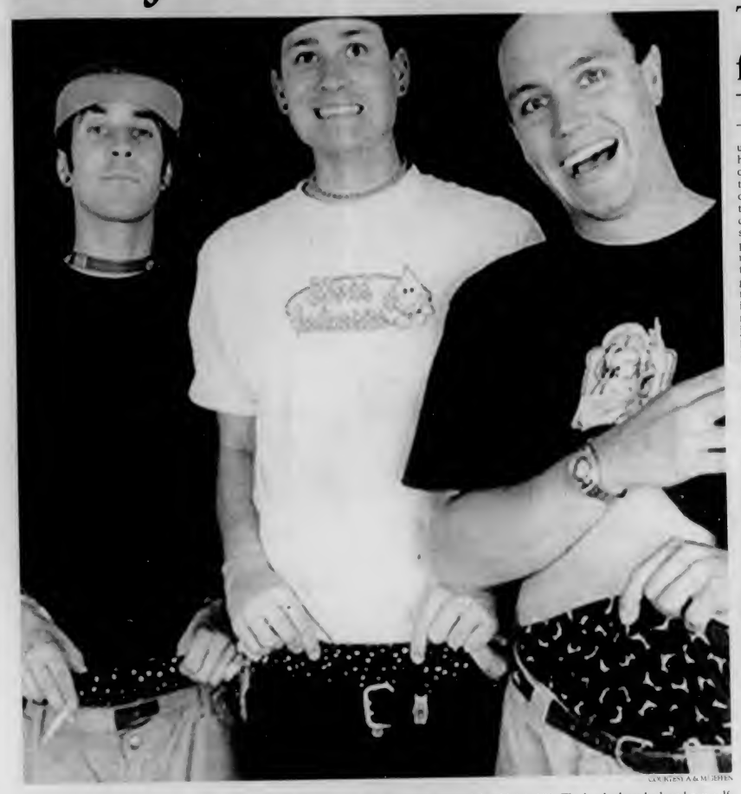
- Five-day: $190/$198/$270
- Six-day: $215/$219/$315
- Seven-day: $235/$240/$360

Located in Wilmington, Vt. Mount Snow is a mountain large enough to challenge the experienced skier/snowboarder, while friendly enough to make the beginner feel at home.

Mount Snow offers 145 trails with 48 miles of terrain. There are five main mountain faces including Main Face, North Face, Carinthia and Sunbrook. Haystack is the fifth mountain face, which is open as its own mountain during weekends and holidays.

The Waffle Haus is the newest attraction at Mount Snow this season, offering authentic Belgium waffles and liege, a type of sugar waffle. The waffles are so sweet they don't require toppings. For the adventurous rider, Mount Snow features 12 tree areas, all centered around black diamonds. Snowboarders beware: Mount Snow terrain parks have been rated number one in the east and made the top five in Freeze Magazines' pipe and park list.

One highlight for the park scene this season is the Palmer Cross Riding Park. Sponsored by Palmer Snowboards, the park provides the feel of real boarder-cross racing. Start gates, barriers and finish lines are all provided for public use. This opportunity is unique and should not to be missed.



Mount Snow recently gained national attention as the home of Olympic gold-medallist snowboarder Kelly Clark. Fans will have a chance on January third and fourth to attend the Kelly Clark snowboarding camp.

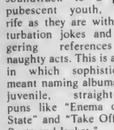
All jokes aside for blink-182



TRL-punk band finds new sound

By JOHNNY DONALDSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

COURTESY A & M/ GRETTON

Travis Barker, left, Tom DeLonge, center, and Mark Hoppus make up the power pop-punk band blink-182. The band released a brand new self-titled album.

Is blink-182 growing up? The punk-popsters have made a career out of acting like the world's most overgrown kids. A typical blink album comes off like the soundtrack to a pubescent youth, rife as they are with masturbation jokes and sniggering references to naughty acts. This is a band in which sophistication meant naming albums with juvenile, straight-faced puns like "Enema of the State" and "Take Off Your Pants and Jacket."

If the trio — guitarist/vocalist Tom DeLonge, bassist/vocalist Mark Hoppus and drummer Travis Barker — reveled in immaturity, their childishness often also revealed a heartfelt connection to the angst and foibles of youthful catastrophe. With their act-your-shoe-size-not-your-age credo, the band's explorations of the horrors of adolescence — those feelings of awkwardness and loneliness, the wrenching pain of unrequited love, the nervousness of sexual awakening — hit a chord with legions of lost young kids who drove the group's happy-go-lucky punk to platinum sales. That they did it by taking on the roles of giddy, clowning jesters only made them seem far less genuine than they actually were.

With "blink-182," their sixth studio album, the band seems to opt for recapturing any kind of glory lost when they released "What's My Age Again?" The rockers have decided to forgo the usual jokey title and silly sex gags for a more mature sound. They've even given the album the stark, spare trophy of a self-title, as if to say that this is what the band really is.

Since the guys are all either fathers and/or married, than this may just as well be who blink-182 actually is, because from the sounds of it, the band is taking steps forward into the harsh, unblinking realm of adulthood. "blink-182" isn't the wacky experimental folly that some early buzz predicted, but it does show that the group is now able to keep its lewdness in check in favor of real emotional introspection.

Notions of romantic trouble still crop up in blink's music; they haven't exactly turned into a melodic politi-punk band a la Pennywise here. So why does the subject matter still turn to the realm of adolescence. it's done with a far surlier and rougher edge to it. Older songs like "First Date" portray the lives of anxious young men unable to handle their feelings for the girls in their lives; here, the songs are coming at the tail end of broken hearts. steeped in anger, sadness and a deeper understanding of the intricacies of romance. As Hoppus whines on "Easy Target:" "let her slit my throat give her ammo if she'll use it/ caution on the road lies, lies and hidden danger/ southern California's breeding mommy's little monster."

Tis the ski and board season

aged. (This is how tough a well made snowboard can be).

Admittedly, for the beginner, snowboarding can be a bit of a challenge. In order to fully master the basics, the general rule of thumb is a three-day trial period. The first day will be pure frustration. The second will be pure pain, as you re-fall on the bruises left from the day before. The final day will be the day of revelation. You will make it down the mountain in one piece — and actually enjoy yourself.

For the more experienced rider, taking a wind through the snow park will satisfy and sustain your adrenaline rush. If you pick the right mountain, you will have the time of your life. There is nothing like hitting a well-built kicker and flying eight feet in the air to a perfect landing. Riding the park also gives even the most skilled professional a time to watch the other riders, and pick up new tricks — helmets recommended though.

Snowboarding is more than just a winter sport. It is a culture; it is a way of life. Ever since snowboarding was introduced, and periodically banned from the mountains over the years, snowboarders have overcome the struggles of trail segregation and anti-snowboarding mountains, most of which were implemented by skiers. Since then, snowboarders have grown to share a unique bond with the trails they ride, and with each other.

With state-of-the-art resorts such as Mount Snow, Okemo, Bromley, Stowe and Berkshire East within a three-hour driving range of the Amherst area, there is no better place to embrace the winter season.

Sixth album for blink-182

The songs more often recall the "Jacket" track "Stay Together For The Kids," the at-the-time atypical blink divorce song. The songs just seem ... heavier, less sunny and bouncy than they did before. The group hasn't sacrificed its knack for catchy hooks, as seen on songs like "Go" "Down" and "Feeling This."

But those pop hooks, while still laying there right in the foreground, are also wrapped around heftier structures that propel the band away from the three-chord army that's sprung up since the evolution of blink offspring Good Charlotte. The threesome has not shied away from adding in items not generally seen on the punk band shopping list. Keyboards and synthesizers surge and ripple on parts of the LP. The Cure's Robert Smith gives the band cred by adding his aching moan to "All of This." An elegant, minute-long spoken word intro opens "Stockholm Syndrome" and the instrumental "The Fallen Interlude" avoids rock altogether, pasting together spooky goth-hop beats over wilted vocals, into a pastiche that resembles a punk band trying to be Moby ... and, surprise, it actually works. "Violence," meanwhile, features the band talking in a pained murmur over the verses.

Barker's splashy drumming churns throughout the album. This most underrated rock drummer pounds the skins with a walloping, kinetic abandon, and his full-throttle skill packs a sizable punch. The contrast between Hoppus's plain-spoken vocals, and DeLonge's higher, more adenoidal voice has never produced a more comfortable trade off, with the two singers sliding easily into each other.

With this self-titled released, blink-182 have finally dropped the overgrown teenager act and made inroads into the alien world of maturity, and have discovered that they are all the better for it.

Red Sox annoint Francona manager right to go to the World Series.

Boston led New York 5-2 in the seventh inning of the decisive seventh game, but Little opted to go with tiring ace Pedro Martinez instead of a recently rehabilitated bullpen. Martinez blew the lead, the Yankees won 6-5 on Aaron Boone's 11th-inning homer off Tim Wakefield and Little was let go after the season.

Red Sox management insisted that Little's fate wasn't determined by one loss. Instead, the Boston brass had grown frustrated by his lack of preparation and willingness to wing it rather than trusting the statistical analysis they thought was the solution to the team's 85-year championship drought.

Now, they turn to Francona, who said after his interview that he was open to using statistics as one resource among many.

He did not immediately return a call seeking comment on Wednesday.

Francona managed in Philadelphia to a 285-363 record over four years, never winning more than 77 games. That was a young team that considered improvement a success.

"The one thing you just die for is a chance to win," Francona said after his interview. "To have a chance to win and to be expected to win is what you play for, what you coach for."

Francona spent the 2001 season as special assistant to baseball operations for the Cleveland Indians and was bench coach for the Texas Rangers in 2002. He was a bench coach for Oakland this season.

"I had a great view" of the Boston team, Francona said last month. "They seemed to really care for each other. They give you no let-up in the lineup."

and forth and it's about time we start going back and forth again.

"We know we're capable of coming out and playing with Boston College."

For the Maroon and White, whether or not they can play with, and beat, the Eagles depends on their ability to stop the inside presence of the combination of Uka Agbai and Craig Smith.

Agbai, a 6-8 262-pound senior who missed all of last season after being awarded a medical red shirt following a serious neck injury, has averaged 11.8 points and 4.2 rebounds per game this season in what will be his last in a BC uniform, and sits just 26 points shy of the 1,000 mark.

Smith, meanwhile, is in just his second season at the Heights, and appears to have a bright future ahead of him after setting the BC freshman scoring record with 617 total points.

The Los Angeles, Calif. native averaged 19.9 points and 7.9 rebounds per game in his first year and was listed as a preseason top 50 candidate for the 2004 John R. Wooden All-America team. This season he leads the Eagles in both points per game (16.4) and rebounds per game (8.6) while averaging a team-high 30.6 minutes per contest as well.

"Their inside kids are tremendous," Lappas said of the pair. "They have a lot of new kids on the perimeter, so their strength is on the inside right now.

Down low, the Minutemen will continue to rely on two-time defending Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week Rashaun Freeman, as well as junior center Gabe Lee to contain Smith and Agbai as well as create offense in the paint for themselves.

Freeman, a sophomore in his initial year of eligibility, is coming off of his worst game of the season in which he scored just four points against Vermont. However, he posted impressive numbers in his first three games, scoring 15.7 points per game while also grabbing 8.7 rebounds a contest.

Lee, meanwhile, has been a defensive force for the Maroon and White. The Camilla, Ga. native and Northfield/Mt. Hermon graduate leads the team with a whopping 5.25 blocks per game.

Also important for UMass will be whether or not its backcourt can duplicate its performance against Vermont in which Anderson drained seven three pointers en route to a career-high 29 points, and freshman Art Bowers and Maurice Maxwell combined for 30 points on 4-4 shooting from beyond the arc.

"It's something we've got to look to build off of," Lappas said. "I think it helped the young kids' confidence, Maxwell and Bowers in particular".

Minutewomen down Vermont

the zone you've got to hit them," Dacko said. "We hit them a little bit then they went back to the zone. We're known for not being a good shooting team, so I would play us in a zone too."

Fortunately for the Maroon and White, shooting wasn't a major issue last night. The Minutewomen hit 7-18 behind the arch, including the resurgence of small forward Judit Zsedenyi who was three for seven from downtown.

"I was on, I was hot, and I was open many times so I took my chances and Coach told me to shoot as many times as I can," Zsedenyi said. "Sometimes I force, that's when I can't make them."

Going into the second half UMass had a comfortable 30-14 lead over the visiting Catamounts and appeared to have all the momentum after a strong last minute effort by Monique Govan.

Govan hit Zsedenyi for a jump shot with less than a minute left. On the ensuing inbound she stole the ball and dished it to Judit who was fouled on the drive.

The second half looked like a continuation of the first as the Minutewomen went on several scoring streaks. Before the tides switched UMass went on an eight to zero scoring run off of back-to-back threes from Ashley Sharpton.

Then UVM took over.

Using their size advantage in the post, the Catamounts went on a 12-0 lead led by Boardman and Aaron Yantzi. The Minutewomen had nine turnovers in the half and let UVM cut the lead to one with three minutes left in the game.

"We do become complaisant, and I didn't want our defense to let up. That's exactly what happened our defense let up and let them get to the foul line," Dacko said. "I couldn't find a right combination to keep it going, so I'm happy to get out of here with a W."

The presence of Brooke Campbell in the post helped the Minutewomen retain their lead. Campbell scored 12 points on the game while grabbing eight rebounds. Her two most influential came with 39 seconds left in the game hitting a lay up after an offensive rebound to put the game away.

UVM didn't foul after a lost possession and let UMass run the clock out. Campbell was pleased with the victory, but knows that her team almost let the game slip away.

Nutmeg Invitational on tap

By Matt Barstow
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts swimming and diving teams will get a feel for the postseason when they head to New Haven, Conn. Saturday to compete in the three-day Nutmeg Invitational.

While the swimmers compete in Connecticut, the divers will travel to Princeton, N.J. for the Princeton Diving Invitational.

"This weekend is very important, because we have such a young team," men's coach Russ Yarworth said. "None of the freshmen have ever swam this format before, so hopefully the Nutmeg will help them prepare for the A-10's."

Coming off a 156-138 point victory against St. John's Oct. 22, the defending Atlantic 10 Champion Minutemen (3-0) will look to stay unbeaten against Yale, Central Connecticut, Fairfield, Sacred Heart and the University of Connecticut.

The Minutemen will look to Even Swisher to lead eight fellow freshmen in their tournament debut. Swisher was recently named the A-10 Rookie of the Week after taking gold in two events against St. John's. Swisher won the 200 and 100-yard backstroke events with times of 1:52.93 and 53.40, respectively. He also swam a leg on the second-place 200-yard medley relay.

"Right now [Swisher] is our top guy for the backstroke," Yarworth said. "Last year we graduated the top two swimmers for backstroke in the conference, so it is very important that he stepped up."

Swisher followed in the footsteps of teammates Greg Chartier and Dylan Smith, who were honored as the A-10 Co-Rookie of the Week and A-10 Swimmer of the Week, respectively after the first two meets.

Smith and Chartier contributed in the victory over previously-undefeated St. John's. Chartier took top honors in the 200-yard individual medley with a time of 1:55.4.3, while Smith finished first in the 200-yard butterfly with a time of 1:50.81.

Senior Logan Alomar and junior Brandon Doane were handed the diving title, as the Red Storm did not enter any divers into the competition. Consequently, Alomar and Doane finished the day with season-highs in the one and three-meter diving events.

In the women's competition, all diving points were forfeited to senior Joanna Walsh and sophomore Mary Jenkins. Jenkins posted a career-high 212.10 score in the one-meter event.

"Two years ago St John's made the decision to drop diving and focus on the other events," women's coach Bob Newcomb said.

The entire St John's program will be eliminated at the end of this season.

On the women's side, Massachusetts (1-2) will look to bounce back from a 157.5-136.6 point loss to SJU.

Despite victories from three different individuals, the Minutewomen were not able to topple a Red Storm team that finished eleventh in the Big East.

Senior captain Christen Dexter, who holds the school record in the 100 and 200-yard breaststroke, won the 200-yard breast with a time of 2:27.88.

"The breaststroke is all about technique and timing, it has taken Christen a little while to get her timing down, but she is beginning to find her rhythm," Newcomb said.

Sophomore Aimee Bourassa led the way in the 200-yard individual medley with a time of 2:14.56. Teammate Kelly Hoffrage won the 100-yard free with a time of 54.47, before anchoring an undefeated Massachusetts 200-yard freestyle relay team.

Also on the winning relay team were freshman sprinters Nicole LeBarge, Liz Lovejoy and senior Megan Pittman.

LSU, USC will fight to finish for BCS championship birth

By Josh Dubow
Associated Press

When LSU takes the field for the SEC championship game Saturday night, the Tigers should have a good idea about their chances for making the national title game.

If No. 2 Southern California loses earlier in the day to Oregon State, the third-ranked Tigers will control their own destiny with a win against Georgia.

If USC wins, LSU will need some help from the computers. And if Notre Dame beats Syracuse – yes, in the world of the BCS even that game matters – the Tigers really will be long shots (USC will get a boost because it beat the Irish).

Not that they're worried about that just yet.

When the game comes, that's our only focus. So far it's worked pretty good," LSU defensive end Marcus Spears said.

The only thing clear about the BCS standings is that if the Tigers or Trojans lose Saturday, they won't have a chance to face Oklahoma in the Sugar Bowl for the national title Jan. 4.

"I know all the conversation and questions you can ask about the BCS – I really haven't figured out the whole process yet," USC coach Pete Carroll said. "We will deal with it next week. I know we better our chances by winning on Saturday."

History is on the Trojans' side. They have won 18 of their last 19 games overall, 14 straight at the Coliseum, and 19 consecutive home games against Oregon State.

"Oregon State is a good team," Carroll said. "They have great firepower and defense. They have experience. They will definitely be freewheeling it and going for it on Saturday."

While the Beavers are only hoping to be spoilers this week, having already locked up their berth in the Las Vegas Bowl, No. 5 Georgia has plenty to play for against LSU.

The Bulldogs can win their second straight SEC championship and lock up a BCS bowl bid with a win. They also want to avenge a 17-10 loss at LSU in September.

Minutewomen beat UVM for season's second win

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

Let the upsets begin.

It seems only fitting that the Massachusetts women's basketball team would pull out its second win of the season against the heavily favored University Of Vermont in the confines of the Curry Hicks Cage — the same Cage where the Maroon and White defeated tournament-bound Villanova last year.

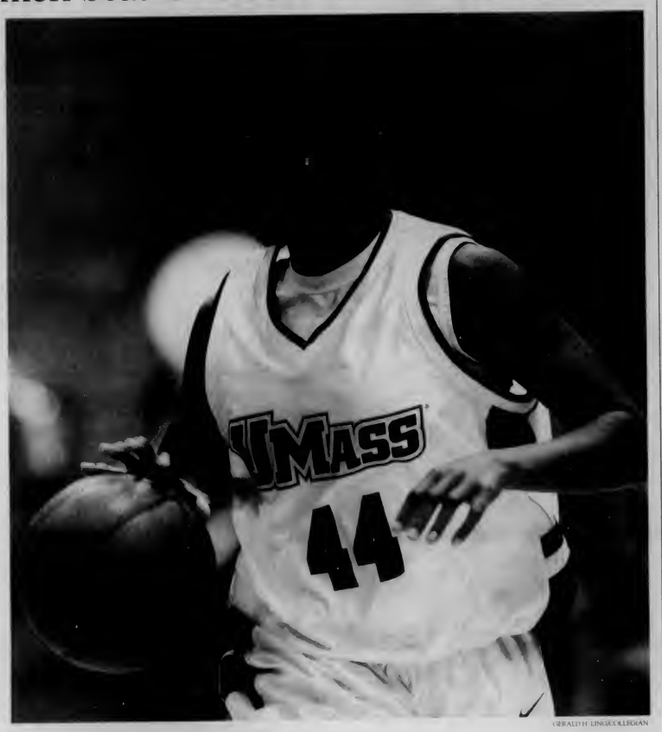
UMass survived a second half surge from the Catamounts to hold on for a 54-49 point victory. The Minutewomen let a 16-point lead at halftime slip away to a patient UVM offense, but had just enough to finish the job.

"I was concerned about Vermont, as the best team on our schedule and averaging 72 points a game," UMass Coach Marnie Dacko said. "Initially we took them out of their game plan, knowing that going into half time down by 16 that they weren't just going to lay down and die."



UMass exploded in the first half, and jumped to an early 15-2 lead over UVM. The Minutewomen played tenacious defense on the perimeter and caused an array of turnovers during the stretch, until Catamount forward Lanni Boardman began dominating in the post.

The 6-1 forward scored two unanswered baskets to stop the bleeding. Boardman had all eight of her team's initial points. She has been an intricate part of her team's offense this season averaging 18 points per game.

Most impressive for UMass was their patience, which hasn't been one of their redeeming qualities this season. The Minutewomen kept the ball on the perimeter until options opened, and for the first time of the season they capitalized.

"They are playing a 3-2 zone and so the openings are there and in order for them to come out of

Sox to hire Francona

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — Terry Francona will be hired as Boston's new manager, a source told The Associated Press, reuniting pitcher Curt Schilling with his former boss in a push to bring the Red Sox their first World Series title since 1918.

The Red Sox scheduled a Thursday news conference at which they will announce Francona's hiring, a baseball source said Wednesday on the condition of anonymity.

Francona, 44, managed Philadelphia through four losing seasons from 1997-2000 when the Phillies were a young team trying to rebuild.

Francona will be under pressure to win immediately in Boston, where Grady Little averaged 94 wins over two seasons but was let go after the team collapsed in the seventh game of the AL championship series.

The Red Sox also interviewed Los Angeles third-base coach Glenn Hoffman, Anaheim bench coach Joe Maddon and Texas first-base coach DeMarlo Hale. But Francona was established as an early front-runner, and his hiring was delayed only by the team's pursuit of Schilling, acquired last week in a trade with Arizona.

The Red Sox traded four players for Schilling last week, but the deal was held up while they negotiated a contract extension with the 37-year-old pitcher to get him to waive his no-trade clause. They agreed Friday to a deal that will pay him $37.5 million over the next three years, with an option for a fourth.

Schilling said one incentive for him to sign in Boston was word that Francona was "a slam dunk" to be the new manager. Even so, he made it clear that he did not make Francona's hiring a condition of the deal, nor did the Red Sox promise it.

Under Little, the Red Sox made the playoffs last season for the first time since 1999. They came back from a 2-0 deficit against Oakland, winning three in a row to take the best-of-five, first-round series and play the New York Yankees for the Commonwealth clash

UMass heads to the Heights to face BC

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

As far as rivalries go, it's one of the few the Massachusetts men's basketball team has left.

In the seven years since Minuteman basketball vacated the national spotlight, games with traditional rivals Connecticut and Temple have lessened in appeal each year.

So while the Huskies are simply too powerful for their neighbors to the north, and John Chaney's bunch wallows in mediocrity as well, UMass-alum Al Skinner's Boston College Eagles have provided the Minutemen with the most spirited competition among the team's they love to hate.

Thus, when the two squads meet at BC's Silvio O. Conte Forum on Saturday afternoon at 2 p.m. for the ninth annual Commonwealth Classic, there will certainly be more than just a victory at stake.

"We have a lot of UMass graduates in Boston, so it's important for us to go there and play well," UMass coach Steve Lappas said. "We've got so many young guys it's great, because they get excited about every game, but I'm sure they'll be very excited to go to Boston and play."

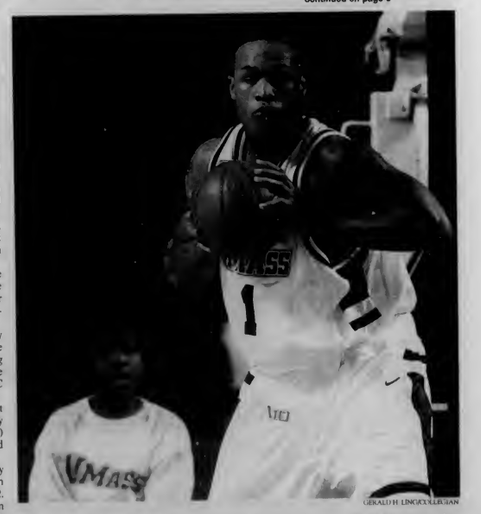
Lately, the series has been dominated by the Eagles (5-0), as BC has posted three consecutive wins in the teams' annual meeting, and four straight against UMass (2-2) overall while leading the all-time series 18-17.

Two years ago, it was junior captain Anthony Anderson — then in his first year with the Minutemen, who nearly pulled off a rousing comeback for the Minutemen with down the stretch with a flurry of three pointers before BC eventually prevailed 80-78 at Chestnut Hill.

Last season at the Mullins Center, in what was a six-point game at halftime, guards Troy Bell (21 points) and Ryan Sidney (18 points) helped key a 14-0 Eagle run that eventually led to an 80-62 runaway.

The game, however, was overshadowed by the antics of the UMass student section, which was part of the season's largest crowd at 6,392. Beginning with an unidentified fan throwing an object onto the court, and culminating with chants of vulgarity directed at Bell after the Eagle's all-time leading scorer lashed out at former Minuteman Jackie Rogers following a hard foul, the crowd's actions inspired Lappas to chastise the student's behavior over the public address system.

So with emotions having run high in such recent meetings, Lappas feels it's time for the Minutemen to assert themselves competitively in the intra-state rivalry.



"We need to start winning some games in this rivalry," he said. "A rivalry usually goes back

Story: Clean elections only fair

Forum discusses campaign dollars

By Matt Elder
Collegian Staff

Three speakers at the University of Massachusetts addressed a group of students, professors and community members yesterday as part of a forum on the discussion of clean elections.

State Representative Ellen Story (D-3rd Hampshire), Tim Carpenter, the western Massachusetts organizer for Mass Voters for Clean Elections, and graduate student Lauren Mattison spoke to the group about the campaign to help candidates who do not have a lot of money run for a political office.

Clean Elections provides public funding and financing for qualified candidates. To qualify, candidates would have very strict spending and contribution limits.

"People are afraid of Clean Elections," Story said.

Mattison said that in Massachusetts, people who win a seat in the house spend roughly four times more than the opposition, and that people who win a seat in the Senate spend roughly six times as much. She also noted how hard it is for people to beat the incumbent.

Mattison said that candidates spend roughly half their time fundraising.

Story said that she thought some candidates are afraid to challenge incumbents, and that Clean Elections would level the playing field.

"[Clean Elections] is common sense idea for me," Story said. "It's just basic fairness."

Mattison said that in 1998, a 67 percent majority passed a Clean Elections law. It passed in every city and town in the state.

"This was a hard-fought victory for us," said Story.

In 2002 the State Legislature refused to allocate the funds to Clean Election candidates, Mattison said. Despite the opposition, eleven people ran as Clean Elections candidates.

"We did elect one Clean Election representative," Mattison said. However, shortly after that, the law was repealed in June 2003.

GERALD H. LINGUS/COLLEGIAN

Ellen Story speaks at the Clean Elections forum in the Campus Center yesterday. Story, who has been a state representative for 12 years, gave herself a $30,000 budget for her first campaign.

"It's sad because it was never really implemented," Mattison said about the loss.

"Everything was going just right. Then the Legislature came in and ruined it," Story said.

Mattison said that Clean Elections would've cost the taxpayers $4 a year.

"We were sort of a national embarrassment," Mattison said.

"Clean Elections was stolen from us," Carpenter said.

According to Mattison, the law got a lot of public support from such newspapers like The Boston Globe, New York Times and Cape Cod Times.

Mattison also said that opposition came from candidates who receive a lot of public backing. She said that on a national level, tax breaks are given to politically connected companies.

Concerning the public opposition, Story noted that "people didn't want their tax dollars going for things like bumper stickers and lawn signs for people that they didn't agree with."

"When I ran (for State Representative), the salary was $30,000," Story said. The "ironic part" was that she gave herself a $30,000 budget for her campaign. The average spending that year was about $28,000.

Story has been a state representative for 12 years. Originally, she won her seat due to a death in the Congressional Office. Since then she's won about three of her campaigns uncontested.

Mattison said that Maine and Arizona have Clean Elections law, but Arizona is now facing opposition to get it repealed. Story said that both parties, and not just Republicans, could benefit from these laws.

"Money is still the name of the game and has crippled Democrats," Carpenter said.

"It's a bi-partisan issue," Carpenter said. Arizona has elected candidates from both parties as Clean Election candidates.

Mattison said that the next step includes meetings across the state to spread awareness on the issue. "We're going to start over, and we're going to start from scratch," Story said.

The University Democrats and Mass Voters for Clean Elections co-sponsored the event.

University awarded IBM technology

By Morris Singer
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Tuesday announced that its Consortium for Distributed Decision Making has received a "highly competitive" IBM Shared University Research award valued at about $255,000 that includes an 84-processor IBM eServer BladeCenter, a machine described as holding an enormous amount of storage capacity.

"This is the latest and greatest technology, and we have problems lined up that need such computing power," said Abhijit Deshmukh, the professor in the mechanical and industrial engineering department who worked closely with the acquisition of the grant.

This technology will be used to speed the research of several current projects as well as facilitate the researching of new projects in the future.

The Consortium has been researching the dynamics of groups in which entities, in working together, make individual decisions that affect the entire group they compose. In the situations the Consortium is working with, the individual decision-makers do not work with the commands of a central oversight. Instead they work independently, yet their effects reach far beyond themselves.

"[The grant] will allow us to really model these scenarios in detail," Deshmukh said.

Examples Deshmukh cited include the electric power grid, the Collaborative Adaptive Sensing of the Atmosphere — a research project encompassing four universities including UMass — and various homeland security initiatives.

Deshmukh also gave an example from nature. Ants, he said, work almost entirely without a central command, and their communities still thrive and carry out the necessary functions to continue to live. The queen ant is solely responsible for mating, he said.

The natural example has provided a great deal of insight for Deshmukh, who said he has been working with a biologist from the State University of New York at Stony Brook.

"What we can learn from nature is

Politician applauds Faculty Senate

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

A show of tremendous support yesterday for the University of Massachusetts by State Representative Lewis Evangelidis (R- Worcester) put smiles on the faces of the UMass Faculty Senate members.

During Evangelidis's introduction he said that he was, "very, very proud" to have attended UMass Amherst in the early 1980s.

Evangelidis explained his transformation from a liberal during his college years to a more conservative-minded Republican, his current political stance today. He explained that he thinks every person grows mentally and that a person should reassess their political stance as they grow older.

"I engaged in the same pressures of being a young, idealistic college student," he said as he explained how he used to label himself as a liberal.

"When I attended this school it was cool to be liberal, I don't know if that's still the same today."

Evangelidis credited UMass with giving him the ability to think critically.

"This university helped me learn how to think, be analytical, and not just accept what is given to you."

The State Representative has held a range of jobs in politics and education. At one point he worked for former U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno's office in Florida during her tenure as State Attorney General for Dade County. Not long after that he began teaching public high school classes in Philadelphia.

Evangelidis said that it was his time teaching students that gave him the desire to hold public education as an important government asset. He cited his experience teaching in an urban public school as evidence. He went on to tell of his participation in a program that got him out of the classroom. He was given the chance to work with students on projects that helped members of the community.

However, he said that he was frustrated with the way the teachers of the state view his stance on education. He accused the Worcester Teacher's Union of supporting his Democratic opponent, publicly and financially, simply because of his party affiliation.

Evangelidis said that he fully supported restoring state funding for the University, including pay raises for 13,000 faculty members that were supposed to have been funded almost two years ago, but were not funded until last week. He said that he opposes the possible one-time payment of the pay raises instead of continuous funding of them, as Governor Romney has suggested doing.

"A contract is a contract. It's wrong not to fund them," he said.

He also said that he opposes the governor's veto of $10 million in funds for the University that was passed by the Legislature last week and was "baffled" as to why the funds were not fully restored.

"I think Romney thinks that the state doesn't have the funds," he said.

Telecast brings praise for area's economic development

Three universities work with local areas to create jobs

By Nathan Chomsky-Higgins
Collegian Correspondent

A telecast from Washington, D.C. yesterday highlighted the University of Massachusetts for its role in the Regional Technology Corporation in the Pioneer Valley.

The telecast, from the University-Based Partnerships for Economic Development, was shown yesterday in the Gunness Center in Marcus Hall as the first of a four-part series. It spotlighted the efforts of three universities and their involvements with the local community to advance the economy of the area.

The panelists included Dr. David Sampson, the Assistant Secretary for Economic Development at the U.S. Department of Commerce, and William Dean, the President of Idealliance.

Tim Brennan, executive director of the Pioneer Valley Planning Commission, was on hand to discuss one of the case studies, as well as what some communities and universities are doing to boost local economies.

The Pioneer Valley Planning Commission, which includes 43 member communities, is responsible for making a strategic economic plan for the entire Pioneer Valley area. It coordinates the fourteen local universities and colleges in the area with IT communications, advanced materials, and biomedical companies in the community.

Although it started with a grant from the Regional Technology Alliance, the grant has since run out. The local businesses and schools found the collaboration so successful that they created a non-profit corporation to continue where the grant left off.

"Technology is bedrock to what happens to the economy, especially today."

— Tim Brennen, executive director of the Pioneer Valley Planning Commission

The RTC continues to link the University and other colleges with area businesses. The businesses then get to use the research departments of the schools for their own research and development. The schools and their faculty, in turn, get an outlet through which they can turn pure research into applied products.

The schools also act as incubators for businesses, helping them grow and get started with a strong backing of support. The knowledge, research, and contacts that these schools can provide can be invaluable in a company's beginning stages.

The biggest theme of the conference seemed to be the use of technology and research to raise the economic situation of communities.

"Technology is bedrock to what happens to the economy, especially today," said Brennan during the telecast.

Two other case studies presented during the telecast by Linda Clark, Director of the Ohio University Innovation Center, and Nisa Miranda, Director of the University Center for Economic Development at the University of Alabama.

At the University of Ohio, the Innovation Center has existed for 20 years. During that time, it has helped 50 companies, which have in turn created 700 jobs in this rural area of southeast Ohio.

These partnerships between schools and businesses, along with regional councils, are used across the country to make local communities better able to contend in the growing global marketplace.

IBM grant will speed research another question we are looking at," he said. "Nature has gone through this evolutionary process for millions of years."

This subject, Deshmukh said, "cuts across pure science, biology, social sciences and engineering."

According to Deshmukh, the research would have been possible even without the grant, but would have taken a lot more time and effort to complete.

"What it has suddenly done [is] expedited this [research] and given us access to the latest technology."

The technology adds to the Consortium, about the computing power of a one-year-old supercomputer, Deshmukh said. Each of the 84 processors, or Blades, is a 2.8 GHz processor with 2 GB of on-chip RAM.

Deshmukh's group will combine the BladeCenter with another 80 processors they currently have in the lab, donated by Sun Microsystems. All of the current processors are also Blades, allowing them to be combined with the system, according to Deshmukh.

Guest at Faculty Senate opposes Romney veto

Athletic Council, Carol Barr, also addressed the Faculty Senate with the council's annual report. Barr pointed out the accomplishments of UMass Athletics in the past year, as well as their problem areas.

Some of the group's accomplishments include the renovations of the Boyden Weight Room and Renfield Soccer Stadium. Barr also pointed out the council's disappointment in the development of a new recreational center for students and faculty. She said that in 2002, student fees were increased and a portion of the increased revenue was supposed to help fund the recreational center. She continued by saying that in the spring of 2003, the plans for the center were postponed after the news of the budget shortfall and no plans have been put into place since that time.

Chancellor John V. Lombardi also had some important athletics news during the meeting. He said that the decision of whether or not the UMass football team would become a Division 1-A team is going to be made by the University's Ad Hoc Committee within a week. The announcement of the upcoming decision confirms weeks of speculation that an important decision is being made about the football team.

EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 5, 2003 EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Attending class during the last week is important

It's hard to believe that just one week of classes remains of this fall semester. The final week of the semester promises to fly by just as quickly as the rest of the weeks leading up to winter break.

But before break can arrive we all have much work left to do: papers to write, endless hours of studying for exams and finals and other projects to complete. This time of year can be burdensome. The holidays, special as they are, make for a hectic time of the year. Juggling schoolwork, extra-curricular activities, and holiday shopping make for one very busy workload. Many students pick up more hours at their job as expenses during the holidays increase. While this time of year may offer little free time, it is important to go to class.

The final week of classes is a wrap-up for a semester's worth of information. Some last-minute information may be covered that will appear on the last exam and final. Oftentimes, graded papers are handed out. Information about the final is covered. Moreover, professors oftentimes give brownie points to students who simply show up to class.

It is also important to attend the final week of class because evaluations are handed out where students get to assess a professor's performance. The more people complete the evaluations, administrators will be better able to more accurately correct any problems with instructors. Future students will be thankful.

The final week of class is also a good time to catch up on work. Professors can be forgiving when it comes to make up work, especially if a student has gone through a personal conflict. The last days of the semester, including finals week, is a perfect time to pass in the work you may have missed.

You owe it to yourself to go to class — and if your parents are paying for your education, you owe it to them too. By missing just one day of class you may be missing out on some important information that may affect your grade and that you may otherwise never have the chance to learn again. Professors, too, will appreciate your attendance. A great deal of instructors work many hours to come up with audio/visuals, lecture notes and other learning techniques to engage you.

Coming back from a relaxing Thanksgiving break to below-freezing temperatures this week made it hard to trudge to class. Snow squalls that lightly blanketed the pavement have not been very welcoming. Even more snow covering the ground in the next few days could make going to class increasingly uninviting next week. The National Weather Service in Taunton expects snow to develop tonight through tomorrow night, possibly dumping six inches of snow in the area.

Yes, Old Man Winter is here. But while the weather outside is frightful (especially when one has to walk more than 10 minutes to get to class), the thought that only one week of classes and one week of finals remains should be enough to get us all through even the nasty wind-chill factors.

So throw on that jacket, scarf and hat and head to class. Though it seems like an annoying obligation, at least you'll be happy when you get your grades.

Anti-Americanism: A political trend

Morris Singer

A few weeks ago, George W. Bush visited London, marking the first time in decades that an active president of the United States has visited the capital city of our friends across the Atlantic.

The British people have, in large numbers, protested the presidential visit through minor acts of civil disobedience.

On Nov. 19, the date of Bush's visit to Buckingham Palace, the Metropolitan Police of London arrested 25 people for offenses including public disorder, criminal damage and possession of a knife, the Independent reported.

The Independent also reported several protesters were arrested for blocking the route of horses sent from the Royal Household to accompany Bush's motorcade.

In the same article, the newspaper said that protestors drove the route of the motorcade in black taxis, rode horse-drawn carriages with look-alikes of Bush and the Queen of England, and constructed a pink tank that pulled down a mock statue of Bush — a reference to the overthrow of Saddam Hussein, in which a statue of the former dictator was ripped from its pedestal symbolizing the fall of that government.

Although no serious disturbance was reported in the major newspapers, the protests gathered significant strength throughout the day, according to witnesses.

One politics graduate student of the London School of Economics and Political Science, and a dear friend of mine described the situation poignantly to me, saying: "They all repeat the same buzz words. It's a new form of a cult around here. And it's very trendy to be anti-American."

So why is it that us Americans are so criticized abroad? Have we really done anything that other nations haven't done in the past?

I'd venture to say that for our overseas partners to hate us so clearly demonstrates a complete lack of respect for the lessons of history; a history in which we were responsible for saving England from the Nazis. It was apparent prior to U.S. involvement in World War II, that Britain could not go it alone in combating the rapidly expanding fascism sweeping the continent under the demagogic leadership of Adolph Hitler.

The U.S. not only saved Britain in this war, but was able to move into France — at much cost to American soldiers' lives — push back the Nazis, as well as squelch the rise of Nazi Germany's allies in two other remote extremes of the globe.

I'd venture to say that for our overseas partners to hate us so clearly demonstrates a complete lack of respect for the lessons of history; a history in which we were responsible for saving England from the Nazis.

We've been friends with Europe ever since, and have worked in the spirit of collaboration and in the experiment of inter-governmental cooperation.

We have put our differences aside, crossed geographical barriers, cultural barriers and personal barriers to promote alliances and friendship between our nation and the European nations.

So it is amazing to see what the U.S. gets when we send our leader abroad shortly before the state opening of a new session of British Parliament, to affirm our alliance and our commitment to the War on Terror.

I may or may not support Bush's initiatives in the War on Terror, his pursuit of Saddam Hussein, his domestic policies in economy, legislature and homeland security, his views on abortion or on stem cell research, his support of the Patriot Act and the new Victory Act, but this is not important to my point. I simply mention it so that those who read my piece can understand their irrelevance in a counter-argument to my assertions and exclude it as a shot against my argument's legitimacy.

All that really matters is that we are acting — or attempting to act — out of a benevolent interest for citizens of the world who enjoy life, peace and security — principles that we have always advocated for.

When I see people gathering in protest against our country, many of whom I believe could not last five seconds in a political debate that was limited exclusively to the facts, I am greatly disappointed.

Perhaps we can learn a lesson from this as Americans: We have enough senseless opposition to our country from overseas. Let us not make the mistake of undermining our political legitimacy at home either. If there's something we don't support, as citizens let's make that known. But let us not mimic the actions of our partners across the ocean. Let us not gather in protest against our country simply because, as I believe so many have, it has become fashionable to do so.

The Distortion of Jesus' Teachings

Michael W. Lenz

Was Jesus Christ one who preached intolerance, encouraged war and taught that Christianity was superior to all religions? Or was he, as we have been taught, a forgiving, merciful being who accepted all walks of life? If someone were to refer to the interpretations of the Christian right, he/she might be surprised to learn that the latter may be false.

The Christian right, a group of devout religious people such as conservative Protestants and Jews, represent a growing movement of fundamentalist secular ideals within our political system. Since the 1960s and early '70s, the faction has experienced a significant growth in numbers, has enjoyed success in fundraising and has found politicians in the Republican Party to endorse its ideas.

Some of the main objectives of the group, according to the Christian Coalition of America, an organized branch within the movement established by Pat Robertson in 1989, are to "strengthen the family, protect innocent lives, ease the tax burden on families, protect young people from pornography and to return education to local and parental control."

Unarguably, these policies are positive and laudable in nature. However, if one continues on down the list, they will find that the Coalition is highly critical of the homosexual community and states on its website that as an organization it is "dedicated to equipping and educating God's people with the resources and information to battle against anti-family legislation." The "anti-family legislation," presumably, refers to the laws that grant rights to the homosexual community.

Historically, religion has driven political and social change — the anti-slavery crusade in the 1850s, the fight for a constitutional amendment to outlaw alcohol in the early 20th century, the number of anti-war protests encouraged by the likes of the Reverend Martin Luther King Jr. in response to Vietnam 30 years ago. However, beginning in the early '60s and culminating in the mid-'70s, political and social change emerged without the influence or blessing of religious conservatives. Two U.S. Supreme Court cases, in particular, enraged the Christian right. The decision rendered in 1963 by the Warren court, declared that Bible reading and school prayer in public schools were unconstitutional and in violation of the "separation of church and state" clause. Ten years later, in the infamous Roe v. Wade case, the Warren court ruled that the Government could no longer restrict a woman's right to an abortion. To those on the conservative religious right, the decision handed down in Roe v. Wade was portrayed as the first step to the eventual decline of "American values."

Fast forward to the year 2003. In the 30 years since the court's landmark decision, the Christian Right has emerged as a serious, and daunting, force in American politics. According to Al Franken, the author of "Lies And The Lying Liars Who Tell Them," the aforementioned Christian Coalition of America reports having 1,500 local chapters across the nation. Also, according to Franken, during the 2000 Presidential election the coalition issued 70 million voter guides in hope of expanding their movement. The organization has grown to more than 2 million members, and that is just within one branch of the Christian right.

While Robertson founded the Christian Coalition, his partner and friend Jerry Falwell played an instrumental role in attracting devotees. It was in 1991 that Falwell, on his radio show, began to provide his interpretations of what Jesus stood for and what he would support if he were alive today.

According to Donald Wagner, a columnist and reporter for Sojourners magazine, Falwell, in one radio episode, concluded that the Prophet Mohammed was "a terrorist" and a "violent man of war." Later in the show, Falwell explained that "Jesus would not only have rejected the practice of Islam, but would have condemned the prophet to an eternal life of suffering."

A different portrait of Christ is painted in an introductory book about world religions, titled "The World's Religions", written by Ninian Smart. The author depicts Jesus as a preacher of love and one who healed and assisted any person in need. Smart explains that "love' came to reveal the moral or ethical themes of Christianity. "Love was the root of the ethical dimension. Yehoshu (Jesus) mixed much with men and women of all walks of life, pure and impure, high and low."

One fact that often goes overlooked is that while Jesus surrounded himself with male disciples, he still allowed women followers to help him preach and heal those in need. In Jesus' times, the notion of a woman playing such an important role in religion and enlightenment was unheard of. During those years, women would have been persecuted for their role in both engaging publicly in religious thought and attempting to attract new converts. One could assume that women were regarded as "low," and Jesus, preached to both the "high" and the "low." Presumably, Jesus did not fear for the Sanhedrin's, the Roman council, persecution of him, as he willingly accepted crucifixion in the name of love and tolerance.

More than 2000 years later, the homosexual and Muslim communities find themselves threatened for engaging in "different walks of life." From a moralist's point of view, the homosexual community represents a contradiction to the mythic doctrine of Adam and Eve, while Islam threatens the beliefs and ideology of Christianity. In regard to the latter, those on the religious right contend that Islam is a violent and intolerant religion that preaches hate.

But don't the comments of religious right leaders like Falwell and the rejection of alternative lifestyles preach abhorrence as well?

In "An Anthology of Living Religions," written by Mary Pat Fisher and Lee W. Bailey, the authors refer to the Reverend Martin Luther King Jr.'s Speech entitled "I've Seen the Promised Land." In the speech, King discusses mythic doctrine. Briefly, the story goes as follows: A man, a thief, was hurt and trapped on the dangerous curve between Jericho and Jerusalem. A Priest and a Levite both passed by the injured thug but refused to stop and help the injured man. Finally, a man, belonging to another race, possibly of a different religion and a different walk of life, stopped and attended to the injured thief. "This was the good man, this was the great man, because he had the capacity to project the "I" into "thou" and to be concerned about his brother," King said as he described Jesus' reaction to the good Samaritan.

The moral of King's story was that the priest and the Levite were both concerned with the question, "if I help this man what will happen to me?" While the Samaritan asked the question, "If I do not stop to help this man, what will happen to him?" Jesus was proud that the Samaritan, despite being of a different race and living a different life style still stopped and helped the wounded man. If a homosexual or Muslim male was in need of help or in search of equality, or, symbolically, if the homosexual or Muslim was injured and trapped between the roads of Jericho and Jerusalem, and a man of a "different walk of life" helped him wouldn't Jesus praise the Samaritan? Clearly, this is an example portraying Jesus as a forgiving, tolerant and merciful being.

The Christian right of America is a political force within the nation and has the strength in numbers to carry out its agenda. Under our Constitution it has every right to speak, act and support any political or moral ideals that it wishes.

However, before falling into agreement with the Christian right, one must first examine the true meanings of Christ's teachings, and ask himself the following question: Was Jesus a man who encouraged intolerance of differing lifestyles, religions and race or did he believe in acceptance and unconditional love in spite of ones choice to embark on a different walk of life?

A lot of things I hate about you

Matt Brochu

I'm a nice guy. I'm probably one of the nicest, most attractive future doctors you'll ever meet. I'm the type of person who opens doors, pulls out chairs, and hands out Tiffany's bracelets just to be friendly. But some things piss me off. Want some examples?

I hate you …

… if you held your nose while jumping into the pool when you were little; if you used to take your gum out of the wrapper, neatly fold it back up so it looked like it hadn't been tampered with, and offered it to other kids just to screw with them; if you ever got a mouse trap to work; if you used to move the controller and make it jump when Mario jumped; or if you continued to watch professional wrestling after the seventh Ultimate Warrior died.

… if you had My Buddy and you let him ride shotgun in your Power Wheels instead of me; if you're from Longmeadow; if you ever truly believed the outcome of M(ansion)A(partment)S(hack)H(ouse) or that magic squares folded paper game ("Pick a color … G-R-E-E-N … Pick a number … 1-2-3-4-5 … Ha, you're going to marry Amanda."); if you were an angel, a devil, or a cat for Halloween after freshmen year.

… if you didn't know at least half the words to either the "Tiny Toon Adventures" or "Ducktails" theme songs at some point in your life.

… if the rims or the sound system on your car are more expensive than the car itself. Here's a head's up — it's good to know that someone out there bought the new All-4-One album, but I don't need to hear it when I'm waiting for the PVTA. It doesn't make your car suck any less, so how about you trade in your rims for a new muffler?

… if you're a guy who still wears jean shorts; if you don't know the Contra code; if you slow danced to a Savage Garden song at a school dance, and then started making out 40 seconds into it; if you've never screamed, "Here I go again on my own," at least once; if you ever owned a pony — it doesn't matter whether it was real or "My Little;" if you cried when your mom dressed up like a clown for Halloween when you were five; if you use your instant messenger profile as a pathetic cry for help to document the train wreck that is your life (Wait a second, this deserves an entire column. I'm not lying. I hate you that much.)

… if during your "Baywatch" watching days, it never occurred to you that Mitch and Hobie Buchanon would kick everyone's butt in a father-son topless slow-motion running contest; if you disagree with the statement that Wilson Phillips is the best band ever; if you never wore those one-piece pajamas with the built-in feet; if, at the beginning of the eighth season of "Family Matters" you didn't turn to your mom and say, "Where the hell did Judy go?"; if episode 29 of "Punky Brewster," where they get lost in the caves and she defeated that evil spirit thing with her love, didn't scare the living (expletive) out of you; if you update your Ani DiFranco quotes in my AIM profile online journal twice a day.

Some things piss me off. Want some examples?

… if your top three list of "cutest girls in sitcom history" doesn't go as follows: 1) Olivia from "The Cosby Show" 2) Morgan from "Boy Meets World" (the first one, not her awful replacement) and 3) Michelle from "Full House" (but only for the first three seasons and only Mary Kate; watching Ashley say, "You got it dude," is like being a kid and playing peek-a-boo with anyone other than your parents — it's just a cheap imitation).

… if you had a swing set and could make it all the way down the slide without coming to that disappointing halt in the middle; if you used your fists on the Power Pad instead of your feet in Nintendo's "Track and Field"; if you always used to fall asleep on the afternoon bus ride home in kindergarten and miss your stop, resulting in the filing of Missing Persons Reports (in which case I apparently also hate myself).

… if you're a Collegian columnist who constantly uses lists instead of actual stories to hide your lack of ability as a writer.

New 'Tactics' for Christmas

Press Start to Play

Reid Davenport

The Christmas rush has begun and there are a variety of titles among the top requested games for this holiday season. Some involve racing around with everyone's favorite plumber, others involve military intelligence and some even involve swinging a rabbit as a weapon. If you are planning on asking Santa for a "Game Boy Advanced-SP," you need to add "Final Fantasy Tactics Advanced" to your Christmas wish list.

Nintendo's GBA-SP has already made a huge splash this Christmas season. The GBA-SP system alone has brought in more revenue than the biggest movie this year. As one of the most addicting games for the handheld, "Final Fantasy" is to thank in part for the system's sales.

The setting is unlike any other "Final Fantasy" game. You start off with a character, who you can name on your own at the start of the game, in a world that appears to is similar to a small town similar to Amherst. From there, things get weird for the small group you are introduced to.

The tactical system still provides a more interesting game play than randomly having to deal with enemies. The game involves more strategy as you plot how you can attack one target without being hit by another.

Younger players may have a tough time understanding exactly what to do with the fighting system, but it gets easier to understand as you continue to play.

'Final Fantasy Tactics Advanced'
Game Boy Advanced
Publisher: Nintendo
Developer: Square Enix
Grade: A

You also have the option of changing the jobs and abilities of the characters within your clan. This is yet another helpful part of the game as you can equip certain types of fighters with specific weapons to gain special abilities. One of the more powerful is the Monk character, which has a range of abilities to attack various foes. Other characters include a ninja, dragoon, assassin, sniper, archer, mage and soldier.

This is also a game where you will need to pay close attention before you begin the battles. You need to abide by the laws during fights. At times you may not be able to use an ice spell on a fire enemy or else you will find your character penalized or sent off to jail. During a battle a fight judge acts kind of like a soccer referee. He gives characters yellow cards for minor offenses, which are called R1s, and red cards for big offenses like an R2 or R3. Being penalized will bring down stats of your players and if you keep disobeying the law, your character will become much weaker.

Eventually you learn how to get by the laws, but it takes time to learn the process of how to stop the laws with what are called anti-law cards. To use them is a tricky process at first, but then it soon becomes second nature.

"Final Fantasy Tactics Advanced" is definitely a hard game to put down. You may find yourself distracted with battling rival clans Christmas morning and ignoring that football, because you know a football doesn't make a very good Christmas present.

The game makes a good stocking stuffer for someone you know who is getting a GBA-SP for Christmas. It is currently available in stores, but it's been reported as one of the fastest selling games for the Christmas season. So hurry and make sure you can secure a copy.

"Final Fantasy Tactics Advanced" is currently available at game retailers for around $34.99.

'Honey'

not quite sweet enough

Film lacks all sense of originality and passion

By Christy Lemire
Associated Press

For this review of "Honey," I seriously considered just trotting out my review of "Glitter" from two years ago.

Just stick in the name Jessica Alba every time it says Mariah Carey, and substitute the word "dancer" every time it says "singer." But then you'd catch me plagiarizing myself, and that wouldn't be fair to you, the reader.

It also wouldn't be entirely accurate — because "Honey" is so much more than just a retread of "Glitter." It's also a barely warmed-over version of "Flashdance," with elements of "Breakin'," "8 Mile" and "Save the Last Dance" tossed in. It almost veers into "Showgirls" territory when Alba's character, whose name is Honey, finds herself in physical danger at an exclusive party.

'Honey'
Directed by Bille Woodruff
Starring Jessica Alba, Mekhi Phifer
Universal Studios
94 mins.
Grade: D

Even "Showgirls" was more interesting than this. If only for its guilty-pleasure allure, and because it featured a predatory Gina Gershon chewing up the scenery along with her brown rice and steamed vegetables.

"Honey" is far tamer: an after-school special with a hip-hop beat. Honey aspires to be a dancer and choreographer in music videos, but a taste of the high life teaches her that she'd rather go back where she started, teaching the latest moves to kids at a Bronx community center. In the end, she's just Honey from the block.

But before she figures that out, she gets her big break, thanks to Michael (David Moscow), the fly-for-a-white-guy music video director who discovers her workin' it on the dance floor at the club where she's a bartender. (The film is the feature debut from Bille Woodruff, himself a music video director.)

In no time — and seriously, this happens way too fast — she's dancing front and center in a Jadakiss video, she's choreographing moves for Tweet and Ginuwine, and Missy Elliott is demanding her services. All these artists make cameos as themselves, and they, like everyone else in the movie, can't stop fawning over Honey.

(Elliott, by the way, is listed in the opening credits, and it seems like forever until she shows up; when she finally does, she's hilarious, divine — the first person with a personality. Then poof! She's gone, and the movie is, too. Was it worth it?)

While Alba, the former "Dark Angel" star, a fantastically gorgeous — and this really is her dancing — there is simply no "there" there. Even the equally gorgeous Mekhi Phifer, who plays her boyfriend, can't create any sparks with her. And Joy Bryant, so likable as the girlfriend in "Antwone Fisher," doesn't help in a one-note role as Honey's sassy best friend.

The feeble attempts at "dialogue" and "plot" include Honey repeatedly uttering some variation of "Ya flava's hot" to dancers she admires — when she's not trying to keep the neighborhood kids (including rapper Lil' Romeo and a mopheaded Zachary Williams, who resembles a young Justin Guarini) out of trouble.

Her makeup is always flawless, though — in the rain, first thing in the morning, even after teaching a challenging dance class.

"It doesn't matter whether you mess up, as long as you keep counting," she tells a student who falls during a routine.

That's good advice for anyone who goes to see "Honey," too — just keep counting the minutes until the movie's over.

A sleeker 'Battlestar Galactica'

By Janice Rhoshalle Littlejohn
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES (AP) — "Battlestar Galactica" is returning as a four-hour miniseries, backed by hype befitting a science fiction classic in the same galaxy as "Star Wars" or "Star Trek."

Never mind that this classic was a campy space opera that lasted just one season.

When it premiered on ABC in 1978, the special-effects dazzler was the most highly publicized new series of that season. Lorne Greene starred as Adama, the commander of a ragtag band of refugees in search of a lost planet called Earth after a band of robotic Cylons wiped out much of humankind.

In the new version, airing Monday and Tuesday on the Sci Fi Channel (9 p.m. EST), Edward James Olmos takes over as Adama; Jamie Bamber is his son, Apollo (originally played by Richard Hatch); and the hotheaded pilot, Starbuck, is now a woman, played by Katee Sackhoff (Dirk Benedict was the original).

While the original series' thematic core remains — the human struggle for survival — a lot has changed.

Gone is the space fantasy with the dashing caped warriors of old. Now they're handsome heroes in uniforms akin to Air Force fighter pilots. The aluminum Cylon enemies look more like humans, complete with feelings, including one with rabid sexual desires.

And the quest is not for a mythical Earth — it no longer exists.

"It's a fine line in deciding what you want to retain and what you want to change from the original," says the miniseries' writer, Ron Moore. "But it all started with the name."

What he ended up with is a saga for a post-Sept. 11 world: an array of conflicted characters forced to coexist under the threat of more deadly adversaries living among them.

"When 9-11 happened," says Sackhoff, "I knew for the first time what it was like to feel fear — genuine fear. And had that not happened, it would have been a lot harder for me to actually play this character."

"What science fiction should be," says Moore, "is a look at ourselves, an examination of humanity. But where we are with science fiction in television and movies, you've sort of fallen into two categories: There's this quasi-cyberpunk stuff, which is everything from 'Matrix' to 'Blade Runner.' Then there's the sort of 'Star Wars,' 'Star Trek' lush orchestral visions of the future."

Olmos, who's eschewed science fiction since appearing in the 1982 film "Blade Runner," says Moore's script "was different than anything I'd ever read before. There's a lot of reality in this that you might find in say a 'NYPD Blue' or 'Hill Street Blues.'"

Devotees of the original will be hard to convince, however.

Getting their education's worth

Involved parents take on major universities

By Steve Giegerich
Associated Press

Susan Jennings Lantz recalls just how involved her mom and dad were in her education at West Virginia University during the 1980s.

"My parents dropped me off, waved goodbye and that was that," she says.

Things are different today, as Lantz is well aware. As WVU's parent advocate — a salaried position at the Morgantown school — Lantz fields up to 4,000 calls a year to the school's Parents Club Helpline, asking about everything from roommate problems to transportation glitches to billing questions.

Like other educators and college administrators, she sees parents taking an increasingly activist role on campuses across the country. One nonprofit group, College Parents of America, is in the early stages of a membership campaign aimed at mimicking the growth and lobbying success of AARP.

Many parents figure that if they're spending thousands of dollars on their child's education, they ought to have a voice, experts say. But there's more, says Lantz.

"These were the first kids to get the 'Baby on Board' signs," she says. "Their parents have been very active with them in elementary, middle and high school. They are soccer moms who aren't ready to release.

"It's not just the parents that are involved, a lot of students want their parents involved, too."

This summer, Jim Boyle became president of College Parents of America with the goal of raising the profile of the 900-member group, not quite a decade old, by increasing membership and lobbying.

For fees ranging from $18 to $26, Boyle intends for the group to provide an array of services, including answering questions for the parents of middle and high school students about college savings, financial aid and applications. In the style of the AARP, Boyle envisions his organization lobbying Congress on issues such as tuition tax credits.

The group is also working to provide parents of college students material on topics ranging from binge drinking to credit card abuse.

"A growing number of schools understand that a parent simply going away once they drop their child off at school is not an option anymore," Boyle says.

"It's important to view the family, not just the student, and to communicate with the family every step of the way."

In many ways, parents have already opened those lines of communication with colleges and universities:

• At West Virginia, concerns about transportation raised by the 11,000-member Mountaineer Parents Club persuaded the school to establish a shuttle between the Morgantown campus and Pittsburgh International Airport.

• When a father worried that that his daughter's car might break down on trips between her home and Oklahoma State University in Stillwater, the OSU Parent's Association responded by enlisting local mechanics and car dealerships to provide free automobile maintenance checks to students before major holidays.

• At Whitman College in Walla Walla, Wash., 105 parents have signed up for a second-year program that encourages them to read and learn, via Internet postings by professors, about many of the same books their children are studying in the first-year core curriculum, including Homer's "Odyssey" and Plato's "Symposium."

"If our parents are well-informed about policies and where to refer their children in certain situations, they can be our partners rather than our adversaries," says Belinda Marner, the assistant vice president for student services at the University of Iowa.

Some 80 percent of the parents who contact West Virginia's helpline have general questions regarding tuition, fee payments and campus regulations, Lantz says. Federal privacy law prohibits her from disclosing certain personal information, including grades.

New form of testing may better predict breast cancer

By T.A. Badger
Associated Press

SAN ANTONIO (AP) — A first-of-its-kind genetic test will soon be available to help women with breast cancer make one of their most crucial decisions: whether to undergo the rigors of chemotherapy.

Genomic Health Inc., a Silicon Valley biotech company, said it has identified nearly two dozen genes that, taken together, can predict with a high degree of accuracy the likelihood that tumors will return in women whose breast cancer was caught at an early stage.

Currently, doctors predict the chances of a relapse in pretty much the same way they have been doing it for almost a century: by looking at the patient's age, the size of the tumor, and the tumor's aggressiveness.

If the chances of recurrence are seen as very low based on the gene test, a woman may opt to not endure the vomiting, hair loss and high cost of chemo. But if the odds of the cancer coming back are high, she may view chemo as the difference between life and death.

"For the women in that highest group, it makes their decision so much easier," said Dr. Melody Cobleigh, a breast cancer researcher at Rush-Presbyterian-St. Lukes Medical Center in Chicago. "For women in the lowest group, they'll still agonize."

The biotechnology company's research — done with the National Surgical Adjuvant Breast and Bowel Project — was outlined Thursday at a breast cancer conference in San Antonio.

Chief executive Randy Scott said his company plans to make the test available to newly diagnosed cancer patients in early 2004.

The genetic test was developed by analyzing tumor samples from nearly 700 women involved in a 1980s cancer study. Genomic Health used its findings to create a point system to express escalating chances of recurrence within 10 years.

The sample group included women from their 30s to their 70s. All had early-stage breast cancer that had not spread to other parts of the body, and all had been treated for at least five years with tamoxifen, a drug that slows or stops the growth of new breast cancer cells.

Genomic Health found that just over half of the women in its sample group fell into the low-risk category. Their average recurrence rate was about 7 percent after surgery to remove the tumor, followed by tamoxifen.

At the other end of the scale, 27 percent of the sample were determined to be at high risk of recurrence. About three in every 10 of these patients developed new breast cancer within 10 years of treatment.

In the intermediate-risk group, the 10-year recurrence rate averaged about 14 percent.

The error rate in each of the three categories was plus or minus 2 to 3 percentage points, said Dr. Steven Shak, Genomic Health's chief medical officer.

Scott said that by using a scoring system, his company's test can give women a more individualized prognosis.

"What we'll be able to provide is not just that you are low-risk, medium-risk or high-risk," he said. "It's that you have a score of X and that in our 668-patient clinical trial, that corresponded to a recurrence rate of Y."

Dr. Daniel Hayes, who heads the breast oncology clinic at the University of Michigan, said too many breast cancer patients are needlessly undergoing chemo because the established ways of predicting recurrence do not provide enough information for them to say no.

Chemo "is a heart-wrenching, gut-wrenching, hand-wringing decision" that nearly half of his patients have to make, Hayes said. If the new genetic test proves accurate, he could tell a patient she might safely be able to avoid chemo, he said.

Dr. Matthew Ellis, a breast cancer specialist at Washington University in St. Louis, said he sees much promise in the scoring method, even though it does not precisely measure each woman's individual risk of relapse.

Tree lighting dedicated to U.S. troops

By Verena Dobnik
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — The Christmas tree in Rockefeller Center came to life in a blaze of 30,000 lights Wednesday night before a crowd of thousands of New Yorkers and visitors from around the world.

Before flipping the switch to usher in the holiday season, Mayor Michael Bloomberg dedicated the lighting ceremony to U.S. soldiers everywhere.

As the temperature dipped below freezing, 6-foot-7-inch Anthony Jenkins found warmth and good wishes in the packed crowd after dressing up as a giant Santa. "What I got out of it is the love of the people," said Jenkins, 55.

For Hy Safran, 19, and friend Melissa Opper, 18, both students at Columbia University, watching the tree lighting stirred their patriotism.

"I wanted to experience the season," Safran said, adding that he and Opper are both Jewish but that "the Chrismas spirit has become the American spirit since 9-11."

The 79-foot, 9-ton tree was planted 50 years ago in Manchester, Conn. It arrived in Manhattan last month on a Hudson River barge and was trucked to the midtown landmark where it will remain lit until Jan. 6.

The televised Christmas show featured performances by Harry Connick Jr., Ashanti, Enrique Iglesias, Gloria Estefan, Kelly Clarkson, Ruben Studdard and the Brian Setzer Orchestra.

Time to make the old ink run

Tattoo removal is becoming more common

By Michael Hill
Associated Press

ALBANY, N.Y. (AP) — At 23, Alexandra Baker figures it's time to get rid of the spider on her ankle.

The tattoo was inked on in college — one of seven on her body. But Baker's outlook has changed somewhat. The spider is something to hide rather than exhibit. So it's coming off, along with two little fairies on her chest.

"I can't stand having them anymore," said Baker, who lives in New York's Hudson Valley. "It's just not how I want to portray myself anymore."

Baker is not alone. Doctors say tattoo removals are becoming more common at a time when people frequently sport butterflies on their ankles or barbed wire around their biceps.

"There are a number of people who did this and have said 'Geez, this is not what I want.' What seems really great at age 17 or 20 may not seem so great at age 30," said Dr. Brian Kinney, a Los Angeles plastic surgeon and spokesman for the American Society for Aesthetic Plastic Surgery.

Tattoos, once commonly associated with bikers and veterans, proliferated in the '90s on skin of all types of people — from students to bartenders to bankers. In a nationwide poll this year by the Scripps Survey Research Center, 15 percent of respondents said they had a tattoo. The percentage almost doubled among 18 to 34-year-olds.

Some regret it.

No hard numbers exist for tattoo removals, but medical professionals report more people coming in for laser treatments in recent years. Dr. Elizabeth McBurney, a New Orleans-area dermatologist, said she used to do five laser treatments a month in the 1980s. She did twice that one day recently.

All sorts of people come in for removals, doctors say. Some had such slogans as "Tammy Forever" committed to ink, only to find love was fleeting. Others, like Baker, got tattooed in their youth and later regretted being imprinted with a flaming death head or a Flying V guitar.

There are a few common tattoo removal methods — people try to rub them out with chemical lotions or have a doctor abrade or surgically cut them out. State-of-the-art removals are done with lasers that penetrate through the outer layer of skin and fragment the tattoo pigment.

Lasers require several treatments over a period of weeks, can cost hundreds of dollars and can be painful.

Also, a faint trace of the tattoo remains.

Researchers at Wright State's School of Medicine in Ohio are studying the effectiveness of a cream used for genital warts as a complement to laser treatment. The results aren't known yet, though researchers say they have been inundated with offers from would-be guinea pigs.

Professionals — from artists who create tattoos to doctors who remove them — say the best strategy is not to get ill-considered tattoos in the first place. Their advice: Think. Will you enjoy having your fraternity letters on your backside in a decade?

T-Bone, an artist at Lark Tattoo in Albany, said people must sign a consent form before getting a tattoo. Still, the occasional customer has a change of heart after the fact. He echoes the advice of doctors: Don't get a tattoo of your sweetheart's name.

"Unless it's Mom," Kinney said, "because your mom won't go away."

Making the holidays for soldiers

Mother, daughter send care packages to troops

By Susan Skiles Luke
Associated Press

HARRISBURG, Ill. (AP) — Some soldiers get so tired of bugs and sand, they wear pantyhose under their uniforms. Others are so bored, they dig holes in the desert to watch fights between spiders.

Since the start of war in Iraq, Kathy Williams and Amy Oxford have made it their mission to send whatever help they can to soldiers sweating it out in the desert.

The mother and daughter have sent several thousand care packages containing everything from the requested queen-size stockings to beef jerky to magazines and toys. The packages have gone to more than 500 U.S. soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan, many of them repeat customers.

"When that officer told us [in a thank-you e-mail] his men were digging holes to watch the spiders fight, I said 'Send those guys some panties!'" said Williams, 48, pointing to some Old Glory-styled knickers bagged on a table nearby. "The guys love 'em."

The bag sits among dozens of boxes of checkers games, crossword puzzles, books, bottles of hand lotion and prepaid phone cards. Although they are struggling with the high cost of postage, Williams and Oxford are determined to send Christmas parcels in time for the holidays to as many soldiers as they can.

"I'm going to open presents on Christmas and I think [soldiers in Iraq] should too," Williams said.

Some of the items came through the 20 or so drives the two have inspired at schools across southern Illinois. Other stuff — including a $600 stack of phone cards — appeared in one of their two donation boxes in town.

Oxford, 25, first thought of sending packages after learning her husband, Jamal, would be shipped out along with his Army Reserve unit earlier this year. A medical problem kept him home, but Oxford still wanted to help others, she said.

She keeps a file of thank-you letters both cyber and the old-fashioned kind.

One handwritten letter, signed by "Fred," told of the three children the soldier missed back home. "I appreciate what you're doing for me and my fellow soldiers," he wrote.

Keith Richards

'a naughty Stone'

LONDON (AP) — Keith Richards has criticized his old friend and fellow Rolling Stone member Mick Jagger for accepting a knighthood.

COURTESY OF HITSWEEK.NET

In an interview published in the December issue of the music magazine Uncut, the Stones' guitarist was quoted as saying, "I thought it was ludicrous to take one of those gongs (awards) from the establishment when they did their very best to throw us in jail," in a reference to his and Jagger's 1967 conviction on drug offenses, later overturned on appeal.

"Just as we were about to start a new tour, I thought it sent out the wrong message. It's not what the Stones is about, is it?" he said. "I told Mick, 'It's a ... paltry honor.' "

"He defended himself by saying that (Prime Minister) Tony Blair insisted that he took the knighthood. Like that's an excuse. Like you can't turn down anything. Like it doesn't depend how you feel about it."

Jagger, 60, said Tuesday that his busy touring schedule has finally allowed him to collect his award from Queen Elizabeth II at Buckingham Palace on Dec. 12.

The 59-year-old Richards, who was once briefly imprisoned for allowing marijuana to be smoked in his home — another conviction that was later overturned — said he doubted he'd ever be offered a similar honor.

"Because they know what I would've said ... they know I'd tell them where they could put it," he said.

Billy Connolly

wee comedian

LONDON (AP) — Comedian and actor Billy Connolly eschewed his normally zany attire for a somber black top hat and tails Wednesday when he went to Buckingham Palace to receive an award from Prince Charles on behalf of Queen Elizabeth II.

COURTESY THEESSNER.COM

Connolly was made a Commander of the British Empire, or CBE, for services to entertainment from Prince Charles, whom he said had commented on his smart dress.

"Usually when he sees me I've got breeks on — you know those Scottish corduroy breeks (trousers) that come to the knee with woolly socks, or I'm in a kilt," Connolly told reporters after being given the honor.

"I normally look like an unemployed window cleaner," the Scottish comic added.

Last year Connolly painted his goatee purple to become the face of the National Lottery, but for the awards ceremony had returned to his natural gray to match his shoulder-length curly hair.

The 61-year-old is a former shipyard welder who got into show business playing banjo in a folk duo. His intros became longer than the songs, and he turned to standup comedy.

His most notable film role was as Queen Victoria's servant John Brown in the 1997 film "Mrs. Brown." He's also in the new Tom Cruise film "The Last Samurai."

Bryce Howard

Stepping up to the task

COPENHAGEN, Denmark (AP) — Bryce Howard, the 21-year-old daughter of director Ron Howard, will likely replace Nicole Kidman in Danish director Lars von Trier's next two films that make up the trilogy he started with "Dogville," the film's producer said Wednesday.

Howard, who's shooting M. Night Shyamalan's new movie, "The Village" with Joaquin Phoenix, William Hurt and Sigourney Weaver, is negotiating a contract with von Trier, said his producer, Vibeke Windeloev.

"We are currently getting the last pieces to fall in place," she said. "These are only details so I am very confident that she will be on the team" when shooting on "Mandalay" starts March 1 in Sweden.

Von Trier's Depression-era fairy tale "Dogville" generated excitement at this year's Cannes Film Festival but didn't win a prize. Some found the three-hour film about sadism in small-town America too long and torturous.

Kidman couldn't continue in the trilogy because of scheduling conflicts with "Mandalay."

Amy Pascal

Woman of power

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Sony Pictures vice chairman Amy Pascal tops this year's list of The Hollywood Reporter's 100 most powerful women in Hollywood.

The list is part of the trade publication's 12th annual celebration of the top 100 women in motion pictures, television, music and other entertainment industries.

"Amy Pascal has developed a knack for producing projects both big and small, intimate dramas and all-out popcorn fare," said Christy Grosz, executive editor, features at the trade publication and editor of the Women in Entertainment Power 100 issue. "Not only has this given her an interesting slate every year, but her creative sensibilities and financial acumen have made her the first stop for some of Hollywood's biggest talent."

Celebrities on the list include talk-show host Oprah Winfrey (6); Julia Roberts (13); "Harry Potter" novelist J.K. Rowling (55); Madonna (67); Mary Kate and Ashley Olsen (84); and Screen Actors Guild president Melissa Gilbert (89).

Awards show documentary honors, er, awards shows

By Frazier Moore
Associated Press

COURTESY BRAVO.ORG

NEW YORK (AP) — "The Award Show Awards Show," which isn't an awards show but a documentary, wants you to know there are 565 show-biz awards competitions each year, of which 100 are televised. That's more than one broadcast every four days.

Consider: On the heels of "The First Annual Spike TV Video Game Awards," which aired Thursday, the coming week brings "The 14th Annual Billboard Music Awards" on Fox, "The Third Annual DVD Exclusive Awards" (whatever that is) on FX, and the inaugural Commie awards on Comedy Central going head-to-head with "The Award Show Awards Show," which Trio is airing 9 p.m. EST Sunday.

Wide-ranging and snarky, the documentary expands on Andy Warhol's prediction: Not only are you destined to be famous for 15 minutes, at this rate you're also practically a shoo-in for a televised award.

But as Tatum O'Neal, the film's award-winning narrator, points out, "Conflicts are endless when awards shows outnumber the works of art they are trying to honor." Witness the juxtaposed clips of a program that wins both a Prism (for accurately portraying the dangers of drug abuse) and a Stony (for promoting the pot-smoking culture).

"The Award Show Awards Show" explores many facets of the media-celebrity complex.

It examines the monetary blessings realized from a top-drawer award like the Oscar or Grammy, and the fierce campaigning mounted by would-be nominees.

It exposes the driving force behind the awards-show pandemic, which mainly reflects outstanding achievement by the industry in ginning up ever more shows for viewers to watch — and thus ever more outlets for promoting entertainment product to the public.

It proposes ways to insure yourself a prize. (If you're Susan Lucci, just keep showing up.)

From the lectern of a decades-old Oscar broadcast, Jimmy Stewart remarks on how seemingly "us folks out here in Hollywood spend most of our time just givin' awards to each other. It's amazing how any work gets done."

"Awards shows," says Alan Alda in a long-ago interview, "mainly publicize the people giving the awards."

Not to be outdone, "The Award Show Awards Show" institutes its own mock prizes in such categories as Most Meaningless Awards Shows (a leading contender is the award show for infomercials) and Most Inexplicable Snubs: There was never an Emmy for Jackie Gleason, never so much as a Grammy nomination for the Who!

Where else could you learn that the wing-tips of the Emmy statuette are sharp enough to pierce the flesh of a careless recipient?

And who else could tell you why the carpet is red? As O'Neal explains, Hollywood borrowed it "from pre-colonial India, where rajahs chose the color red since it was the rarest, and thus most expensive dye."

O'Neal, of course, brings special authority to the documentary. In 1974 she walked the red carpet as a 10-year-old Oscar nominee for best supporting actress in her first film, "Paper Moon."

She even practiced weeks beforehand with her father and "Paper Moon" co-star, Ryan.

"He wanted me to rehearse," she recalled in a recent chat with a reporter. "I remember him dressing me up and letting me wear platforms, which I always wanted to wear, and we pretended to walk down a red carpet."

But on that April 2, when she became Oscar's youngest-ever winner in a competitive category, neither parent was present. Her grandparents brought her.

"For years I didn't think about it," said O'Neal, 40. "Now, today, it makes me sad.

New series already under fire

"Battlestar" Web sites have been fiercely opposed to this "reimaged" version.

One site even features a cartoon of Benedict's Starbuck being castrated by a laser beam, and there are many who vow to tune out when the miniseries comes on.

Hatch understands the fan sentiment.

"I had a lot of anger and frustration because I saw a studio not on any level being receptive to what the vast majority of fans wanted," the actor says in his small apartment littered with "Battlestar" paraphernalia, including a lunchbox, posters and videos.

Hatch, who has written six spin-off novels, tried his own sequel: "Battlestar Galactica: The Second Coming." A four-minute, self-financed trailer has been a hit among conventioneers, but studio executives have been unimpressed.

"Every time they bring back a classic, they always fail because they've thrown the baby out with the bath water," says the 58-year-old Hatch. "They throw away the very elements the fans loved most."

A few years ago, fans thought they'd get the continuation saga they'd clamored for when Bryan Singer and Tom DeSanto, the director-writer team behind "X-Men," hooked up with original "Galactica" creator Glen Larson to develop a project at 20th Century Fox.

When that deal fell through, Universal TV chief David Kissinger brought in executive producer David Eick and Moore to rework the franchise for Sci Fi.

"We want the fans to embrace what we are doing," says Sci Fi President Bonnie Hammer, "but if you produced now what was produced then, it would feel like old TV. We wanted to make it more relatable, even in terms of the stereotypes of characters."

"I understand they're trying to do a modern version," says Larson. "But change for the sake of change — it's taking the title and exploiting it."

Pair of awards for UM coach

EMILIE DUGGANAN/COLLEGIAN

Mark Whipple addresses the crowd after the Minutemen's win over Richmond on Nov. 22. Whipple was named New England coach of the year by the Gridiron Club of Boston and the N.E. Football Writers.

Whipple is New England coach of year

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts football coach Mark Whipple continued his award-winning ways yesterday, when he was named New England Division I Coach of the Year by the Gridiron Club of Boston and the New England Football Writers Association.

The New England Football Writers announced Whipple as their selection last night during their annual Captains and Awards Banquet at the Lantana Restaurant in Randolph, and the Gridiron Club will make things official at its annual Bob Whelan College Football Awards banquet on Jan. 9 at the Needham Sheraton Hotel.

It is the third such honor given to Whipple, who earned the Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year Award as well for his work in bringing the Minutemen to a 10-3 record overall, and 8-1 in the A-10. Both of those marks are school records, and UMass also appeared in the NCAA playoffs for the sixth time after earning a share of the A-10 title along with Delaware.

With the Minutemen's 28-24 win over Northeastern on Nov. 1, Whipple took sole possession of second place on the all-time victory list with 47, and continued on to finish 2003 with a UMass career record of 49-25, putting him just 10 wins behind all-time leader Vic Fusia. Whipple is also the only coach in University history to win 20 games in his first two years.

In six years at UMass, Whipple has brought the team to a winning record five times, and the team won its first-ever National Championship in 1998 under the tutelage of the Brown graduate.

Whipple took the Minutemen to one of their most successful seasons ever, as they jumped out to a 9-1 record — the program's best since 1901 — and took the other A-10 co-Champion, Delaware, to three overtimes before losing 51-45. Despite an early exit at the hands of Colgate Saturday, UMass finished the season ranked fifth in the nation.

per game — with 35 turnovers against Montana State. The starters certainly haven't earned their spots, being outscored by the bench, 54-47, this season. There also are no signs of a perimeter game, as USU is sporting a .147 3-point percentage, going 0-for-12 from downtown against Montana State.

Defensively, the Aggies have given up a hefty 72 points per game, and have scored only 50.2 in each game.

American is 3-1 this season with wins over UNC Asheville (52-48), Howard (81-56) and St. Mary's (72-62). The scoring is equally distributed for the Eagles, with six players averaging over six points a game. Senior point guard Chanel Spriggs is the only American player averaging double figures, 14.3 ppg. Spriggs is coming off her best performance with an impressive line of 16 points, nine rebounds, five assists and five steals.

The Wildcats are the heavy favorite to win the tournament. They have won 14 straight home games dating back to Nov. 30, 2002. The second-longest home win streak in history is only one game shy of the school record, which ran from Jan. 4, 1999 to Jan. 6, 2000.

Arizona is led by preseason All-American candidate sophomore Shawntinice Polk. The 6-foot-5-inch center dominated her freshmen year at Tucson (17.8 ppg, 10.8 rebounds per game) and earned respectable All-American honors from the Associated Press. This year, Polk has been nominated for every major award and is averaging 16.4 ppg and 7.6 rpg, while drawing constant double teams.

When Polk needs some help, junior guard Dee-Dee Wheeler, a high school teammate of UMass' Monique Govan, averages 16.2 ppg.

Yanks pick up Vazquez

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — The New York Yankees made their first big move of the offseason, bolstering their rotation by agreeing Thursday to acquire Javier Vazquez from the Montreal Expos.

In exchange for the 27-year-old right-hander, New York sent first baseman Nick Johnson, outfielder Juan Rivera and left-hander Randy Choate to Montreal.

The deal is contingent on all the players passing physicals, the Expos said. New York did not immediately acknowledge the trade.

"It's tough to trade a pitcher like Javier Vazquez, but I think we have a better opportunity with the situation going forward," Expos general manager Omar Minaya said at a news conference in Montreal.

Vazquez fills one of the holes in the Yankees' starting rotation. He went 13-12 with a 3.24 ERA for the Expos last season, ranking third in the NL in strikeouts with 241 in 230 2-3 innings.

He's three years younger than Bartolo Colon, a free agent that attracted the Yankees' interest.

New York's rotation, the backbone of its run to four World Series titles and six AL pennants since 1995, is unsettled. Roger Clemens retired, and Andy Pettitte and David Wells filed for free agency. In addition, Wells had back surgery Tuesday.

The Yankees' rotation includes Mike Mussina, Jose Contreras, Jeff Weaver and Jon Lieber, who hasn't pitched in the major leagues since reconstructive elbow surgery in August 2002 but hopes to be ready for the start of the season.

Johnson, 25, played first base for much of last season because of Jason Giambi's knee injury after starting the season as the regular designated hitter. While he's regarded as a top hitter — he batted .284 with 14 homers, 47 RBIs and a .422 on-base percentage — he has been injury prone throughout his career.

Rivera, 25, hit .266 with seven homers and 26 RBIs in 173 at-bats and has a strong throwing arm.

Choate, 28, pitched only 3 2-3 innings over five relief appearances for the Yankees last season, compiling a 7.36 ERA. He went 3-5 with one save and a 3.91 ERA in 54 games at Triple-A Columbus.

Montreal, which is owned by the other 29 teams, is faced with payroll limits. Vazquez, eligible for salary arbitration, probably will get a raise from the $6 million he made last season after losing his hearing. He is eligible for free agency after next season.

Johnson is eligible for salary arbitration for the first time this winter; Rivera isn't yet eligible.

New York will have to find another backup first baseman to spell Giambi, who had knee surgery after the season.

Meanwhile, the Yankees are pushing ahead on several fronts.

Gary Sheffield, who met Monday and Tuesday with Yankees owner George Steinbrenner at the team's spring training complex in Tampa, Fla., worked out Wednesday at the Yankees' minor league complex in Florida and took a physical Thursday.

Sheffield, a free agent, is closing in on a three-year deal with the Yankees worth about $39 million. About $15 million of the money will be deferred, and the deal will include an option for 2007.

sure."

It wasn't all rehabilitation, either. The break has afforded Cahoon a few luxuries he usually doesn't have during the week in the middle of the season.

"I got a chance to do some recruiting yesterday and I got a chance to change the tenor of practice, make it a little bit more skill-related until today," he said. "If there's any such thing as a good week to withstand everything that's happened to the team, this might be the week."

In their first trip to Boston this year, the Minutemen will meet up with a BU team that's been on its heels thus far. The Terriers are an even 4-4-4 overall, but have managed a 2-3-2 record in Hockey East, which has them sitting in sixth place. Things won't get much easier for BU, either, as it squares off with cross-town rival and conference leader Boston College at BC's Conte Forum tonight at 7 p.m.

Still, Cahoon, a former Terrier player and assistant himself, doesn't put too much stock into BU's early struggles.

"BU is a real good group of athletes that haven't realized the success that people thought they'd realize. I've seen BU teams go into Christmas at .500, and play in National Championship games. We've got to make this about us, if it becomes too much about BU, we'll get ourselves in trouble."

That's exactly what the Minutemen did Friday night, when they suffered a 7-2 loss to UNO. Although junior Greg Mauldin (four goals, seven assists) made his return after nearly three weeks of inactivity due to a leg injury, UMass was outclassed by the Mavericks at the Qwest Arena in Omaha, Neb.

Saturday night's game was a marked improvement for the Minutemen, who put 27 shots on Chris Holt, including 10 in the second period, but scored just once, on Thomas Pöck's power play goal at 15:09 of the first.

"It was a tie simply because their goaltender stood on his head for the first 30 minutes of the game," Cahoon said. "We had a lot of quality chances, we just couldn't put them away. Sometimes you're going to play real well, and not get it done, but that doesn't mean you're not growing as a team.

"The BC game at home was an indication of that, we played them pretty well, not well enough, but we still grew as a result of it, and that showed the next night in Providence."

UMass dropped a 4-1 decision to Boston College on Nov. 14, but came back to beat Providence 3-2 the next night at Schneider Arena, the second time the Minutemen had beaten the Friars in Providence this season.

It's Fenway for Francona

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — Success-starved fans, prima donna players, swarms of media and bad karma that has surrounded his new team since 1918 — Terry Francona figures he's prepared for just about everything a Boston manager can face.

"Think about it for a second: I've been released from six teams. I've been fired as a manager. I've got no hair. I've got a nose that's three sizes too big for my face, and I grew up in a major league clubhouse," Francona said.

"My skin's pretty thick. I'll be OK."

The Red Sox hired Francona on Thursday, more than a month after letting Grady Little go for failing to get the last five outs Boston needed to vanquish the New York Yankees and reach the World Series. Francona, 44, was given a three-year deal with an option for a fourth; financial terms were not disclosed.

The son of a ballplayer, Francona played 10 seasons for five major league teams — he signed with a sixth but never made it back to the majors — and was Michael Jordan's manager at Double-A Birmingham during the basketball star's aborted attempt to play baseball.

"I had a lot of experience, early on, dealing with the biggest star," Francona said.

The Red Sox also interviewed Los Angeles third-base coach Glenn Hoffman, Anaheim bench coach Joe Maddon and Texas first-base coach DeMarlo Hale. But Francona was established as an early front-runner, and his hiring was delayed only by the team's pursuit of pitcher Curt Schilling.

The Red Sox traded four players to Arizona for Schilling last week, but he wouldn't waive his no-trade clause until signing a new contract that guarantees him $37.5 million over the next three years. Schilling said one incentive for him to sign in Boston was word that Francona was "a slam dunk" to be the new manager.

But he insisted that he did not make Francona's hiring a condition of the deal, and the Red Sox didn't promise it.

"I think Schill just wants to pitch opening day," Francona joked. "I love Schill. I don't think he's responsible for getting me the job."

Francona managed Schilling over four losing seasons in Philadelphia from 1997-2000, never winning more than 77 games. Getting fired didn't dampen his obvious enthusiasm or his belief that he could be a successful major league manager.

"I always felt like if I put the players and the organization first and myself second, things would work out," he told reporters. "And you know what? I'm sitting here in front of you guys today. I feel like it's worked out."

Little averaged 94 wins over two seasons and took the Red Sox to the playoffs this year for the first time since 1999. They came back from a 2-0 deficit against Oakland, winning three in a row to take the best-of-five, first-round series and play the Yankees for the right to go to the World Series.

Boston led New York 5-2 in the seventh inning of the decisive seventh game, but Little opted to go with tiring ace Pedro Martinez instead of a recently rehabilitated bullpen. Martinez blew the lead, the Yankees won 6-5 on Aaron Boone's 11th-inning homer off Tim Wakefield and Little was let go after the season.

Red Sox management insisted that Little's fate wasn't determined by one loss. Instead, the Boston brass had grown frustrated by his lack of preparation and willingness to wing it rather than trust the statistical analysis it thought was the solution to the team's 85-year championship drought.

Even Little's detractors said he was deft at handling a combustible clubhouse, dealing with Manny Ramirez when he called in sick for a key series and keeping Pedro Martinez happy and productive. Francona said he wasn't afraid to be a players' manager, but that he also knows he needs to lay down the law at times.

"The players will know that I care about them more than anybody ever cared about them before. And they will know that I respect them, hopefully more than anybody's ever respected them before," he said. "But I will also ask more of them than anybody's ever asked of them before."

Red Sox general manager Theo Epstein said Francona seemed to strike the right combination of clubhouse charmer and dugout tactician. But, before hiring him, Epstein wanted to make sure that Francona wouldn't be too light of a touch in a clubhouse that always seems on the verge of controversy.

"It's so hard not to like him," Epstein said. "In doing my follow-up research, I was very satisfied that he has a tough side to him and can draw the line and show the authority that is sometimes necessary.

Francona played for Montreal, the Chicago Cubs, Cincinnati, Cleveland and Milwaukee, batting .274 with 16 homers in 708 games. He played in the Cardinals organization in 1991, but never got to St. Louis.

Looking for a remedy

Boston U. up next for Minutemen

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

It was subtle irony that the only forward lines on the ice for the Massachusetts hockey team's practice yesterday were wearing white, orange, or red — the primary colors of an ambulance.

The Minutemen (9-3-1, 5-2-1 Hockey East) were stricken by the flu this week, and it knocked a number of players out of action, including consistent starters Chris Capraro and Kevin Jarman. While their playing status is uncertain for Sunday's game against Boston University (1 p.m., Walter Brown Arena), the virus was enough to render some of the players bedridden, according to coach Don Cahoon.

"We're just trying to get them healthy. I've had eight or nine kids over the course of this week get sick. Three or four of them have come back, and then three or four are out. It's one of those things you so frequently hear, where it goes through the whole team."

Of course, the flu probably picked the best time to hit the squad. Other than the two-week break that will come after the Dec. 13 game at Harvard, the respite between last Saturday's 1-1 tie with Nebraska Omaha and Sunday's clash with the Terriers is one of the longest of the season, at seven full days, so there's no real emergency.

"We've been really lucky, and I will not allow [the flu] to be an excuse," Cahoon said. "Had we gone into a game tomorrow night, it would have been with a totally different lineup than what we normally play. Some kids I haven't seen all week. With one game on the weekend, at the end of the weekend, maybe we can get the full contingent back, but I'm not

A new year dawns for indoor teams

By Leah Wyner and Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

There's a lot to be said for Massachusetts Indoor Track. Despite suffering from severe budget cuts, and competing against teams with as much as three times as many scholarships available, the squads are gearing up for another season in the Atlantic 10 Conference.

The women compete in their first meets today and tomorrow. Crystal Thierren, Nastaran Shams, and Ashley Creel are spending today in Rhode Island at the Rhode Island Pentathlon. Tomorrow brings the team to Boston University for the season opener.

Sprinting and jumping coach Antoinette O'Carroll has high hopes for the group she's been working with since early fall. Newcomer Troyanah Evans joins Christina Huff, the top sprinter returning to the team, while Elisabeth Budd and Stacey Brown lead the longer sprints. Brown runs the 400-meter hurdles outdoors along with Shannon Jackson, however for the indoor season, they plan to focus on mainly sprints. Jackson and Brandy green will compete in the 55-meter hurdles.

"She's been looking really good after fall training," O'Carroll said of Evans.

The jumping events are a mix of veterans and newcomers. Ashley Creel is the team's premier high jumper, and O'Carroll is anticipating the performance of newcomer Katelyn O'Toole in the event as well. The team's biggest asset in the long jump and triple jump will be veteran Chante Soares.

"She's been doing really well in her training, not having any problems at all," O'Carroll said.

Jen Iasiello, one of the better weight throwers in the conference, will use her experience to lead the team in weight throw. Head coach Julie LaFreniere is highly anticipating the performance of newcomer Marissa Oliveira, who threw a high school personal best of 42 feet, one inch in the shot put. Iasiello and Oliveira will be the Minutewomen's two key throwers for indoors.

The shorter distance events will be led by veteran Kristen Ford, who races everything from the 800 meters (her personal best is 2:15) to the mile. LaFreniere hopes that freshman cross-country standout Cuisle Kierans, a high school two-mile star, will find her niche in the 3000 meters.

Loren Donohue runs well anywhere from the 1000-meter to the 3000-meter race, according to LaFreniere, and cross country leader Alexis Anzelone will concentrate mainly on the 3000 and 5000 meters. Kate Markopoulos, coming off of an excellent cross-country season, will specialize in the 5000 meters, although since that race is not run at every meet, she also plans to race the mile and the 3000.

Tricia Silva and Amanda Dahlberg lead the long distance crew. Both are 10,000-meter runners in the outdoor season, so for them the longer, the better. However, LaFreniere has big plans for Silva.

"We're going to try to get her to run as fast as possible in the 3k, it'll help with her 5k," LaFreniere said. "She placed in the New England [Championship] meet in the 10k last year, distance is a real strength for her."

Newcomer Jenna Elznic looks to compete later in the season. Elznic's been having a rough time. After spending the summer injured, and sitting out the cross-country season, she's now battling the flu. But LaFreniere still has hope for her.

"Once she fully recovers, she's going to really help the team," LaFreniere said.

Elznic's specialties in high school were the 800 meters and the mile, in which she ran 2:15 and 5:07, respectively.

UMass track is on the rebound after devastating financial cuts. The teams were a force to be reckoned with in the 1990s, perennially ranking first or second in the A-10, rarely finishing third.

Lately, though, local competition like Rhode Island and New Hampshire have been using a new pool of scholarship resources to recruit talent, and UMass has fallen farther behind them financially. But LaFreniere remains positive despite the team's gradual slip in the conference and regional rankings.

"We've always been successful with the athletes that we had. Track and cross-country just have not been fortunate enough to receive the same type of benefits as a lot of other schools," LaFreniere said.

And to LaFreniere, the important part of track is having a competitive mindset, fierce work ethic, and a good attitude.

"As long as they're performing to their level, what they're capable of doing at this point, that's what really matters to me, to us," she said. "Our goal has always been to be the best that we can. That hasn't changed."

After a one-year hiatus, the University of Massachusetts has reinstated the men's indoor track squad this season.

"I'm ecstatic about it," men's coach Ken O'Brien said. "I want to see the kids who come to UMass have a complete track program. It means a lot in their preparation. We're excited, and looking forward to getting started."

The Minutemen return some outstanding runners from the 2001 season. In the decathlon and 500 meters, they will look to 2002 Atlantic 10 Outdoor Champion Jon O'Neil. As a sophomore in 2002, O'Neil placed third in the decathlon at the New England Championships with a personal-best 5,941 points. Joe McCormack, James Godinho, and Dave Falvey will lead the sprinters this season, and newcomer Tyler Simpson joins veteran Brandon Phillips in the hurdles and sprints.

"Tyler's been training really well too, and Brandon has improved," O'Carroll said. "They have been training consistently, but you really have to wait until the first meet to get a good idea of what they can do."

The Minutemen will return to action for the first time in over a year on Jan. 24, 2004 with a meet at New Hampshire.

Minutewomen are set for an Arizona Fiesta

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women basketball team's youth will not be a problem in its next game, when the Minutewomen match up against Utah State. The Aggies (0-2) reinstated the women's basketball program after it was dropped following the conclusion of the 1987 season. This will mark the first meeting between the two teams.

The Minutewomen (2-4, 0-0 Atlantic 10) will travel to Tucson, Ariz. Saturday at 1 p.m. to play the Aggies (0-2, 0-0 Big West) in the opening round of the Fiesta Bowl Women's Classic hosted by the University of Arizona. The second game at McKale Center will be played between the hosting No. 25 Wildcats and American at 3:30 p.m. On Sunday, the consolation game will be played at 1 p.m., followed by the championship at 3:30 p.m.

"I hope we can come off the road, come out, with the first game being a neutral sight for both teams, and be ready to go," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "We've been on the road before, we knows what it's like playing on the road. I would hope we're in the driver's seat against Utah State."

The cross-country road trip will be the longest distance UMass travels this season, as well as the farthest the team has traveled during the Dacko-era.

"I'm used to it," junior forward Brooke Campbell said. "I've been to Arizona before, but I've never played in the McKale Center. I'm looking forward to the warm weather this weekend."

The Maroon and White will be riding a wave of momentum following their upset victory over Vermont, 54-49. UMass had been missing a perimeter game while relying heavily on Campbell and the frontcourt for offensive production. That was not the case against the Catamounts, as the Minutewomen hit 7-for-18 from downtown. The sharpshooting Zsedenyi showed the touch, scoring a career-high 17 points.

"I think we have the confidence and momentum," Zsedenyi said. "This will help over [in Arizona]. We now have the confidence that we can win as a team. We're very happy."

Utah State lost their first two games by large margins, 79-60 to Southern Utah and 61-45 at Montana State. They have only one player with Division I experience, Buffalo transfer Virginia Jennings. Only three players have scored in double figures in a game this season as Christina Zdenek had 16 points and Anne-Marie Torp had 12 points against Southern Utah while Ali Aird had 11 points against Montana State.

One of the main reasons for the low point production could be the average 26 Aggie turnovers

First major snow storm of the season blankets the New England states

By Bipasha Ray
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — Coastal communities braced for flooding, thousands of homes lost power and the New England Patriots encouraged fans to bring blankets and snow boots to its game yesterday, as the winter's first major blizzard was expected to continue its onslaught through yesterday afternoon.

As of 4 a.m. yesterday, power was restored to thousands of Massachusetts Electric customers, leaving 3,300 still without electricity mainly along the North and South Shores, said Mass. Electric spokeswoman Debbie Drew.

NStar reported about 4,600 outages mostly in Plymouth, Cape Cod and New Bedford early Sunday morning.

"It's usually wet and heavy snow leaning too hard on branches of trees and they get tangled with the wire," said NStar spokesman Don Walsh.

The National Weather Service issued coastal flood warnings for east-facing shorelines, including the Boston Harbor, Plymouth, Newburyport, Gloucester, Sandwich, Scituate and Provincetown for Sunday morning.

The service also said it may not be safe to remain in the more vulnerable homes along the immediate shore.

"The wind is coming off the water and some high seas," said NWS meteorologist Alan Dunham. "Between the tides themselves, the size of waves and the wind, there will be some flooding, but nothing major."

In Revere, officials closed down Winthrop Parkway on Saturday.

"There's been flooding and rocks coming over the sea wall," State Police Sgt. Richard Donovan said Saturday. "We're also bracing for some flooding tonight."

Peter Judge, spokesman for the Massachusetts Emergency Management Agency, said he was concerned about the flooding.

"(Saturday) morning we did have some splash-over in areas like Winthrop, Revere, Scituate even though nothing was expected. Now wind has picked up, and drains are frozen and clogged," Judge said Saturday evening.

As Foxboro got about a foot of snow Saturday, the New England Patriots lifted its ban on fans bringing in blankets for Sunday's game against the Miami Dolphins.

"They're both allowed and encouraged" to bring blankets, as well as winter-appropriate clothing including snow boots, said Patriots spokesman Stacey James.

The greater Boston area was expected to get up to 20 inches by the end of the storm Sunday, with the heaviest snow pouring overnight.

Norfolk County was the worst hit by 11 p.m. Saturday, with almost 19 inches of snow, Dunham said.

North Andover reported a foot of snow and Wakefield with 13.5 inches by Saturday afternoon.

Cape Cod and the islands were expected to receive up to 7 inches overnight, in addition to the 7 inches and heavy rain it got through the day.

Boston Mayor Thomas Menino said he was relieved the storm didn't hit during the week, when schools are in session and people are commuting to work.

Boston, which got about 10 inches Saturday, had 450 pieces of equipment attempting to clear the streets.

The mayor called on residents to obey snow emergency parking rules by not parking on busy streets or near intersections — at least 60 cars had been towed by late afternoon — and warned people that they face a $250 fine if they shovel snow onto city streets.

As the snow whirled in Swampscott, Phil MacLaughlin, of Salem, walked under a shop awning with his Chihuahua, El Jefe, on a leash. It wasn't easy walking the tiny dog, which was wrapped in a red "fido fleece," because the snow was almost as deep as El Jefe was high, he said.

"He won't go in the snow because he'd be snout deep. I needed to find a bone-dry spot, and this is one of them," MacLaughlin said.

On Farragut Road, Brian Santry, 8, and his sister Jennifer, 11, bundled up to build a snowman on the sidewalk in front of their house. They felt short-changed because the snow came on a Saturday, instead of Friday when they could have gotten a day off from school.

But their grandmother, visiting from Florida, seemed to enjoy the early snow.

"This is quite a change from where I live," said Carol Woods, who lives in Sarasota, Fla. "It was 76 (degrees) when we left home. But if you have to be up here, this is great."

Many school districts postponed Saturday's scheduled Scholastic Assessment Tests and high school sports officials delayed the state's 13 football championship games from Saturday to Sunday.

In Amherst, the University of Massachusetts campus was closed on Saturday, but the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority remained open.

According to the Springfield Republican, nine to 15 inches of snow were expected by midnight on Saturday at Westover Air Force Base and the local area.

Wind gusts were measured at 19 miles per hour, creating a wind chill factor around five to 10 degrees below zero.

Peter Pan Bus lines in Springfield continued to run, although there were several cancellations and delays.

According to local skiing area Berkshire East, the mountain was able to open as planned yesterday, with seven of 45 trails open and only two of five lifts operating, due to 18 to 24 inches of new snow.

UMass reopened yesterday, and classes are scheduled as usual for today.

Students arrested brought to court

By Ferron Salniker
Collegian Staff

Five of the 11 students arrested during disturbances following the Boston Red Sox' American League Championship Series loss in October responded to charges Thursday in Eastern Hampshire District Court.

The disturbance began shortly after midnight on Oct. 17 with a gathering of about 150 to 200 students in the Southwest Residential Area. At least 100 people led University of Massachusetts police on a cross-campus chase, vandalizing windows, damaging fences and attempting to set small fires. 15 people were arrested on various charges.

According to The Republican, Jonathan E. Cohen, 19, 37 Highland St., Sharon, pled guilty to a charge of failure to disperse. Cohen was ordered to obey laws and to notify the court of any change of address.

John T. Beggan, 21, of 187 Plain St., Pembroke, pled guilty to disorderly conduct and was sentenced to 50 hours of community service.

Timothy J. O'Neill, 18, 125 Summer Ave., Reading, pled guilty to disorderly conduct and was ordered to obey the law and notify the court of a change of address.

Peter W. Hutchings, 18, 95 Mattapoisett Neck, Mattapoisett, pled guilty to disorderly conduct, failure to disperse, and inciting a riot and was ordered to remain drug- and alcohol-free, remain subject to drug testing and perform 100 hours of community service.

Patrick McGillicuddy, 19, 30 Bay St., Quincy, pled guilty to disorderly conduct, according to The Republican, and was ordered to refrain from alcohol and be subject to random screenings.

McGillicuddy said he accepted a continuance without finding.

"I was told it was the easiest way to go about it, otherwise I would have had to go to trial and that would of cost a lot of money," he said.

McGillicuddy said at the time of his arrest he was attempting to get inside McKimmie Hall and security was holding up those trying to enter. He said he assumed police officers saw the group outside of the dorm as a gathering, and therefore shot at the crowd with pepperballs.

McGillicuddy said he was arrested when he began to take photos of the police officers.

"I was accused of blinding the officers with my camera," he said. "They grabbed the camera and tossed me in the back of the van. In the police report they said I was doing other stuff, but I definitely wasn't."

Annual dean's list reception today

By Ikaika C. Arnado
Collegian Staff

Over 4,800 students who earned a place on the dean's List will be recognized during a reception tonight in the Campus Center.

The Second Annual Dean's List Reception will be held in Campus Center room 1009 from 5:30 p.m. to 7:00 p.m.

"The University community is extremely proud of...[the students on the dean's list], and we are delighted to have this opportunity to recognize the academic success of our students," Provost Charlena Seymour said in an e-mail interview.

Julie Weismantel and Laurie Salkin of the Golden Key National Society will host the event. It will include speeches from Chancellor John V. Lombardi, Provost Charlena Seymour, [and] Sean LeBlanc of the UMass Amherst Alumni Club of greater Boston, and feature food and entertainment.

"It's a standing event there's going to be food — buffet — there's going to be entertainment — background jazz music," said Laurie Salkin, co-chair of the dean's list reception committee.

The menu will include an assortment of snacks and drinks.

"There's going to be cheese and crackers, and vegetable dip, and mini-sandwich wraps, and were also having Swedish meatballs, Italian meatballs, toasted ravioli, sun-dried tomatoes in filo dough, brownies, coffee, tea, and apple cider." The event was started a year ago to commend students on their academic success.

"The reason why we started this event was because we felt it was really important to recognize students for their academic success," Salkin said. "Nothing has been done on our campus before to show students that we care about the outcome of their education."

Organizers, deans, and dean's list students will have the opportunity to socialize with each other.

"There is going to be a chance for the students to mingle with the administration and faculty and meet their deans," Salkin said.

The Alumni Association, the Provost's office, the Golden Key National Honor Society, and all academic deans organized the event.

Same-sex marriage ruling causes split reaction at UMass

By Liz Thompson
Collegian Correspondent

A Republican group at the University of Massachusetts has chosen not respond to the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court's decision on same-sex marriage, even as another campus group organizes students to support the ruling.

Though President George W. Bush and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney have responded with opposition to the Nov. 18 ruling that could legalize same-sex marriage in the Commonwealth, the UMass Republican Club has not organized any action in response to the issue.

Other campus groups such as the UMass Pride Alliance plans to urge students to support the court's decision.

David Peterson, president of the UMass Republican Club, said since the Republican Party is officially against same-sex marriage, the issue would fall within the bounds of something the club could address. He previously told the Collegian that around 95 percent of the club's members oppose the ruling.

Despite this, the issue of same-sex marriage "is not really something the club feels is a priority to act on," he said.

"I'm not going to go out and piss people off with my opinion when most people don't agree with it," said Peterson, who characterized the UMass campus as "liberal."

"It's still kind of early for the issue ... no one really knows the ramifications of it," he said. "There's not much we can do about it."

Bush denounced the SJC ruling, and vowed to "do what is legally necessary to defend the sanctity of marriage," according to the Washington Post.

Romney has said he would support amending the Massachusetts constitution to define marriage as between a man and a woman only, and has recommended that the state legislature legalize civil unions, rather than marriage, for same-sex couples.

Issues on campus

Constitutional specialist Laurence Tribe recently told the Boston Globe that the ramifications of the SJC ruling are very clear.

Tribe, a professor at Harvard Law School, said he concludes from the ruling that the Legislature's only viable options during the 180-day waiting period instituted as part of the decision, are to work for a constitutional amendment that could not take effect until at least 2006, or to do nothing.

Tribe said inaction would result in legalized same-sex marriage at the end of the waiting period.

The UMass Pride Alliance is acting to support same-sex marriage and the SJC decision. Members of the alliance, a lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender advocacy group, met Tuesday to discuss the group's response to the ruling.

Emily Rimmer, president of the Pride Alliance, told a group of more than 20 attending members that same-sex marriage is not only about their personal preferences regarding marriage.

As materials with information about marriage rights and the status of the SJC decision were passed around the room, Rimmer said, "It's a matter of political equality for our community."

"The state is recognizing us as individuals, as people, and citizens," Rimmer said of the SJC decision. "It was very brassy and very out for [the SJC]."

Officers of the alliance discussed the importance of educating students about the status of same-sex marriage rights, and the need to encourage students to express support to the Legislature for the court's decision.

Rimmer called for alliance members to think of "something a bit different" to educate the campus about same-sex marriage.

The group discussed plans to post a collage with pictures of same-sex couples at UMass to show that "they are happy, they're together, and they're here," as one member said.

Other possibilities mentioned include handing out lollipops with facts about marriage rights printed on them, and staging a mock same-sex marriage on campus for educational purposes — possibly on Valentine's Day.

The Pride Alliance began preparing action on same-sex marriage before the court ruling.

A letter-writing campaign began with a poster on the Pride Alliance bulletin board in the Student Union, with large purple letters that read, "Voice your opinion now!" The poster gives information about same-sex marriage and marriage rights, as well as a guide for students who want to contact state representatives to voice their opinions on the issue.

Katie Bixby, a Pride Alliance member who made the poster, said though the poster is geared toward students who support the legalization of same-sex marriage, "the list on the bulletin board is open to everyone."

Some on campus have also expressed opposition to the ruling.

Dan Pomeroy, treasurer of the UMass Pride Alliance, said, that on the day of the court's decision, he saw messages chalked on the ground around campus that read, "Take Back Massachusetts. Save Marriage."

"Other than that, everything's been really positive," Pomeroy said.

Peterson said the Republican Club was not responsible for the messages.

UMass student back from oceanography program

One of six students in the nation to go

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Correspondent

A University of Massachusetts student has just completed a semester long program at the Dauphin Sea Lab in Alabama, after competing with thousands of other students for the opportunity.

Abigail Poray, a UMass senior, was chosen to be one of six students in the country to participate in the program.

Poray studied marine ecosystems, particularly sea grass defense systems at the elite Dauphin Sea Lab in Alabama. The program consisted of 12 weeks of heavy, intense research for Research Experience for Undergraduates, which was funded by the National Science Foundation.

Students had mentor professors to help and guide them throughout their research. Poray's mentor was Dr. Ken Heck, who was very knowledgeable and helpful. She said that Heck has done extensive amounts of research on sea grass defense systems, which she was interested in.

"I designed my own project," she said, "but my advisor was awesome when I ran into problems. It was the hardest thing I ever applied for, although I fit well in that kind of laboratory set up."

Poray frequently visited places outside the Alabama Lab like the Florida Keys, where she was able to get hands on experience.

"There's nothing better than hands on work," she said, "I met a lot of people but I was on my own."

Poray researched for three months on the ability for defense in turtle grass. She is currently completing her thesis, which will count for six credits towards her degree at UMass. Upon finishing, she will send her work to Dauphin and they will relay a grade back to her professors here.

"It was hard because UMass doesn't offer marine science as a major," she said. "I am a wildlife concentration major with a concentration in marine science, but I was able to make my own major and substitute a lot of classes ... I also understand that they [UMass] are creating one for graduate students."

In her research in the Keys, Poray was able to focus on the relationship between a certain herbivore fish that was deflected from eating the turtle grass because of elaborate defense mechanisms that the sea grass is able to emit. The title of Poray's final research project is, "The effect of grazing on nitrogen content as an induced defense in turtle grass, Thalassia testudunum."

"It's a really small part of the big picture," she said, "but basically sea grass can make itself less tempting to eat by creating certain defense mechanisms. They do have the ability to reduce nutrients when it is threatened."

Poray aims to graduate this year and attend graduate school. She is looking to be on the west coast or on the south so that she can gain the maximum amount of experience. As for a career, she hopes to become a filed technician or marine biologist in a marine protected area.

"I've done a lot of internships," she said, "but they're too short-term, I would like to do something more long term."

The National Science Foundation funded the research for students for the seventh year in a row. The Sea Lab, which is located on an island on the Gulf of Mexico, was a place where students not only conducted research but also engaged in workshops, seminars as well as a series of guest lecturers. For more information about the upcoming 2004 program, visit the website at www.disl.org.

varying degrees of indifference or support for the court's ruling.

"I'm happy about it, but I'm still not overly optimistic," said Amanda J. Stachelck, a graduate student in statistics.

She is optimistic about a possible legalization of civil unions in Massachusetts, she said.

"I'm happy as long as the rights get passed," she said, "no matter what they call it."

Stachelck smiled as she told of a congratulatory call from her mother on the day of the decision. On the call, she could hear her father shouting in the background, "Does this mean I get to walk you down the aisle now?" she said.

"I couldn't care less if they let gay people get married," said Sean Reilly, a graduate student in resource economics. "I don't see any reason why not."

"It's not a right that should be given; It's a right that should just be," said Brenda Leahy, a junior. "Nobody had to give heterosexuals the right to marry."

The forum debate

Heidi Norton, a Northampton woman who, with her partner Gina Smith, sued the Commonwealth of Massachusetts after being denied a marriage license, said she thinks students on both sides of the issue should share their opinions.

Norton said she would like to see forums, especially at large university campuses like UMass, where "reasoned questioning and considering together of alternative points of view is encouraged."

With debate, "people can have more information and depth of their own personal convictions," Norton said. "That's the whole basis of a civil society."

Peterson said that while its difficult to find someone who says they're against sharing ideas, debate through forums on issues like this one rarely happen.

"She can hope for all the dialogue she wants," he said, "but unless she goes out and organizes it, it's not going to happen."

According to Peterson, liberal groups frequently come to the Republican Club suggesting forums for sharing alternative points of view. Though he agrees to send representatives if the group organizes a meeting, "it never happens," Peterson said.

Rimmer said, in regards to the possibility of a forum, "I don't see why I should have to justify my identity."

Regardless, Rimmer would support a debate because she thinks other people in the alliance would be interested.

"They are very careful not to upset the majority [on campus]," Rimmer said, "although, I would like to have more arguments with them."

EDITORIAL OPINION

Discouraging underperformers

When a society defines a group as "underperforming" it better be aware of the consequences. Gov. Mitt Romney's recent designation of Holyoke, Winchendon, and other school systems as "underperforming" is discouraging on every level. It is a red flag to even those outside of the educational system that things must change on a state, and national level if American children are expected to respect themselves and their educations.

Labeling a school as "underperforming" is in fact labeling a community, it's parents, teachers, and, most importantly, students as underperformers.

These students will apply to colleges carrying the stigma of their community's underachievement — a reputation that in Massachusetts, the state government creates for its very citizens. As graduates of schools labeled by the Commonwealth as "underperforming" these students will have fewer collegiate opportunities and successes. They will be dismissed by admissions committees because their A's, by state mandated reputation, can only compare with the C's or D's of more academically successful (and almost always, wealthier) communities and schools — programs that have been given the state's stamp of approval.

As competition for acceptance into higher educational institutions continues to increase these students will be lost, rejected, and forgotten — exactly what the federal government's 1990's education campaign of "No Child Left Behind" proposes to fight, but in fact sustains by subsidizing the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in its insensitive and damaging reports.

The state's label may be directed at the school system itself, but students, especially those in the typically insecure teenage years will take the label "underperforming" and apply it to themselves. They will be hurt, angry and dejected. For some reason they have not performed as well as other students. They may hear that richer towns' students have not been given this label and connect the dots: why is it that those students deserve a better education, one that will allow them to perform to the state's standards, when they apparently do not?

Often a community's school system fails because of its parents, a cultural lack of importance placed on academic success and the benefits of higher education, or its inability to attract and keep strong faculty and administration. However, above all, the most common cause for failure, and one that links all of these aforementioned contributors, is the town's wealth.

Characteristically, what a town invests (monetarily) in its educational system is proportionate to the value of property in the town. The majority of towns finance their school systems with property tax revenues. Then the state chips in a bit here and there depending on how much it can spare that fiscal year. Public schools systems do not have an endowment, as public universities do, to fall back on in years of weak state support. Instead, schools begin to crumble in each year that the state and town cannot afford or chooses not to adequately support them. This lack of support tells students that they are not a priority for the state, the town or the future of the Commonwealth.

All students, but especially those who receive high marks from "underperforming" school systems merit the same educational opportunities that their peers in wealthier communities do.

"Underperforming" should be taken by students in these communities to mean that there is a standard in education, and that they have not been given the chance or support to perform at the level the state knows them to be capable of — if properly supported.

Educational opportunities should not be based on the pecuniary value of a child's parents. It is time to make education, like health care, a federal issue: Students deserve the right to a fair and equal education regardless of their parents or community's wealth.

Required volunteering?

Molly Eggleston

Last spring when I was picking classes, I chose My Body My Health — it fit my schedule well, and the course description sounded all right. I went to my first few classes and was blind-sided with a mandatory service requirement.

Don't get me wrong, I have no problem giving a helping hand when I can, but "required volunteering?" What is that supposed to mean? Why wasn't that in the course description? I have so much on my plate as it is, could I handle this too?

I did manage to complete my assignment; I even enjoyed doing it. I would even have done it without the assignment, but being told I need to do something like that just frustrated me. I wanted to help on my own terms, not someone else's. I was lucky enough to find a project that I could do on my own time — most people in my class weren't so lucky. They had to miss work, family events, or even other classes.

I like doing community service. In high school I spent a lot of time volunteering for events projects. I did hundreds of hours of community service during high school. I did it because it needed to be done and I chose to do it. I was happy to be there and enjoyed giving back to my community. I did community service for the right reasons. Volunteering is not being forced to stack chairs at some event you don't even care about. Volunteering is getting involved in a cause because you care about it.

Community service should be done, but it should be done on a volunteer basis. Many students want to help but just can't spare the eight extra hours to help out. Is two hours of the time worthless? Another handful of students will never want to do community service and will never get anything out of it, nor will they be happy doing it. Do we want these people helping out? They would be unhappy and so would everyone else around them.

Community service should be done, but it should be done on a volunteer basis.

As I said, I like volunteering for things. I think it runs in my family. My mom spent two years in Turkey with the Peace Corps. I would love to follow in her footsteps and go somewhere where my help will really make a difference. I'm willing to give up two years of my life to do this, but most people aren't.

If anyone, including me, was forced to join the peace corps, it would be a disaster. The difference between being forced to live in an underdeveloped country for two years and giving up eight hours of your time to work at a carnival in town is as different as tequila shots and beer, but the end result is the same. Whether it's two years or eight hours, tequila or beer, it doesn't matter in the end; people get upset. I would resent whoever made me spend time I hadn't planned on spending. Two years may be much longer than eight hours, but those eight hours are just as mine to spend as the two years are.

The point of the assignment was to show us students how important it is to get involved and encourage them to want to give back to the community. OK, I accept the reasoning behind the project, but not the execution of it. Forcing people to do community service doesn't make them more likely to want to do it. It makes them annoyed and less likely to have an open mind and a positive experience. Don't we want to promote community service to students, not taint their views on it forever?

In my class, many different organizations came and explained their program to the class. We were shown where could find even more places to volunteer for a good cause. I think that having the speakers was a great idea. Hopefully the speakers sparked enough interest to motivate the students to want to know more.

Why not make community service an extra credit opportunity? Reward the people who followed through with their interests and did some good for the area. But don't punish people who already have overly hectic lives and are just trying to get through school. Don't just increase the number of people doing community service — work to increase the number of people really volunteering to do community service.

Some words about Rush

Mark Ostroff

As of Dec. 6, there are at least 514 confirmed coalition deaths and a minimum of 7,935 civilian deaths. The Department of Defense has confirmed the following American deaths: Spc. Aaron J. Sissel, 22; Spc. Uday Singh, 21; Spc. Raphael S. Davis, 24; Sgt. Ryan C. Young, 21; Chief Warrant Officer Clarence E. Boone, 50;

May they rest in peace.

Before the end of the semester, I had wanted to write a column about Rush Limbaugh. The only problem was figuring out what I wanted to talk about. From the day all the freshmen moved in, until the last week of school, Rush's story kept getting grittier, and grittier, until now, when it looks like he could actually go to jail.

To tell you the truth, I'm just shocked to see someone go from conservative talk show host and ESPN commentator, to rehab, to last week's scandal, in the span of a semester.

According to the New York Daily News on Friday, Rush had his medical records seized by Florida investigators in a probe to see whether he was "doctor shopping" to support a pill addiction. "Doctor shopping," is visiting different doctors to find those that prescribe a certain under-the-counter drug, in order to maintain a steady supply. Apparently, it's a common occurrence with pill addicts.

If he's found guilty, the conservative talk-show host could get up to 5 years in prison, under Florida law.

What happened to Limbaugh is a story going back to last summer. With over 650 markets broadcasting Rush and his "golden EIB microphone," the conservative commentator brought 14 million people what he liked to call, "3 hours of broadcast excellence." Last summer, Limbaugh signed a contract with ESPN, to host "Sunday NFL Countdown." In early October, he stepped down amid controversy over a remark about Philadelphia Eagles quarterback Donovan McNabb.

After the NAACP and, predictably enough, Democrat politicians, got involved, Rush "took the path of least resistance" and resigned amidst allegations of EPSN's "institutional racism." According to ABC, within a couple of days, it became public that some kind of drug investigation was underway for Limbaugh. A week later, Rush came clean to his listeners about his drug problem.

The Christian Science Monitor reports that Limbaugh had undergone unsuccessful spinal surgery several years ago.

"Rather than opt for additional surgery for these conditions, I chose to treat the pain with prescribed medication," Limbaugh told The Monitor. "This medication turned out to be highly addictive."

Limbaugh then told his listeners, "I am no victim and do not portray myself as such. I take full responsibility for my problem." After Limbaugh spent five weeks in a rehabilitation center, he was back on the radio, but several weeks later, Rush is now the center of a legal investigation.

The truth is plain, simple, and sad. Rush Limbaugh has turned into what he had publicly detested for years: the image of the sad junkie - the stereotypical, liberal consequence of too many welfare checks and too little family values. Even worse, the scandal turned the staunch supporter of the "War on Drugs" into a hypocrite in the eyes of many. Now, nobody knows what to expect.

Believe it or not, I respect Rush, both as an entertainer and intellectual. He believes in a political platform that many people simply adhere to because of an abstract hatred for liberals. I almost never agreed with him on issues, but respected his well-thought opinions. He's controversial enough to be entertaining and, at the same time, smart enough to defend his beliefs and doesn't resort to cheap ratings tactics that you would find on shows Michael Savage, Sean Hannity, or the O'Reilly Factor.

I really don't think that Rush ever wanted to become a drug addict, especially to the extent he has become. I don't think it was as simple as saying that he wanted to get high and just got carried away. The man has a problem, which stemmed from a medication that was originally legitimately prescribed to him. Drug addiction can wreak havoc on life. I have never personally had a drug problem, but the experience of watching people, both peers and family, devastate themselves even unto death, was a factor that kept me wary about both my body and mind. Unless you experience addiction, either through your own eyes or through the eyes of someone you know, there are a lot of aspects of it that you can't understand.

When you're addicted to drugs, you may as well be insane. Depending on the level of addiction, hence, desperation, certain standards that may have seemed wretched, now become viable options. Most of the time, people are under the spell of an addiction to the point that they can only look back on what they have done, well after they snap back into reality. Recovering people have been saddened with stories of how they smashed their own kid's piggy bank, or even prostituted themselves, all for a fix of whatever hooked them.

Sadly, Rush is no different and a part of me, although angry at his hypocrisy, respects him for admitting it. If the allegations are, in fact, true, he should be considered lucky that "doctor shopping" was the worst his problem extended to. On the other hand, I think that Roy Black, Rush's lawyer, is not giving the 52 year-old talking head the accountability that he deserves.

"Unfortunately, because of Mr. Limbaugh's prominence and well-known political opinions, he is being subjected to an invasion of privacy no citizen of this republic should endure," he said.

Yes, I understand that it's his job to proclaim Rush's innocence, but to blame it on Rush's politics is simply politicizing the issue of a man who needs all the accountability he can get, to empower himself in fighting his addiction. It also doesn't help when people like Ann Coulter use his scandal as a mud-catapult against the liberal left (as she had done in an Oct. 15 column on anncoulter.org).

It's disrespectful to the common Rush listener, and highly disrespectful to Limbaugh. I also hope that those on the left maintain their compassion for a man with a problem like Rush's, and, for at least the time being, overlook his politics.

Hopefully some good will come out of this. Hopefully, Rush will finally understand that addiction is a disease that even staunch conservatives have a hard time overcoming. Hopefully, those on his side of the political spectrum will also understand that drug addiction is not simply a network of blame and pointed fingers.

It's a real and indiscriminate disease, requiring only for someone to step into its line of fire. Rush has done just that and all we can do now, as fellow human beings, is wish him well.

Hamas' admission of guilt

Morris Singer

When I read in Haaretz that Hamas spiritual leader Ahmed Yassin publicly denounced the idea of a Palestinian state with sovereignty, existing beside Israel, I wasn't the least bit surprised.

According to Haaretz, in an interview with the German magazine Der Spiegel, Yassin was quoted complaining about the idea of dividing Israeli land among Israelis and Palestinians, arguing that the Palestinian people have the rights to the land in its entirety.

"[The division] would not work," he told Der Spiegel, according to Haaretz. "The Israelis claim 80 percent of the territory and will only let us have 20 percent."

"It would only be an interim solution," Haaretz reported him as saying.

So I got to thinking about exactly what the implications of this proclamation are, and what I have reasoned is quite disturbing for both peace activists and right-wing Zionists.

Yassin, as a leader of one of the largest terrorist organizations in the world, is saying that there is no point in Israel acquiescing to the demands of the international community and surrendering even the well-accepted 20 percent of the land gained since 1967. In addition, Yassin has implicitly nullified any incentive Israel may have to cooperate in stopping attacks on the terrorist organization or its allies against Israel.

Yassin has implied that there will be no peace until Israel does not exist, meaning that nothing Israel does to even attempt a controversial compromise of land distributions will prove effective against his militant organization's targeting of innocent civilians in violent, bloody acts.

Yassin has, I would argue, accidentally declared himself the enemy of both sides of the issue. He has isolated himself as a third faction, a peace prophylactic oblivious to individual and diverse visions of conflict resolution in the region.

It is amazing how forcefully Yassin has launched the image of Hamas back into reality. It is no longer possible to mistake his organization as a charitable organization of peace and humanitarian concern, as the claim has often been made. There are no longer any illusions, thanks to his recent admission.

I must say though that it is disappointing to see this, because it really makes me lose hope. But this is so typical of terrorists, and Yassin is a striking exemplar of how things always work with the extremists.

It makes me lose hope because it means that every concession that Israel has put on the peace table is not sufficient to secure peace. In retrospect, it makes perfect sense. When I think back on the history in the region over the past decade, I understand why this is the outcome we have today.

I recall the classic handshake between Yassir Arafat and Yitzhak Rabin on the Whitehouse lawn with a smiling President Bill Clinton in the background. I recall the hope I had on that day, even as a child. In my fifth-grade mind, I thought, at the time, that this would be it. But it wasn't. It wasn't because no concession was enough for the terrorists.

Almost a decade later, the Hudna, or cease-fire was arranged between the Israelis, the Palestinian Authority and major terrorist groups working against Israel. Again I gained hope, and again it was shot down as Hamas made clear that it was committed to terrorist attacks during the Hudna.

Hamas has never agreed to stop any violence. Yassin has reaffirmed what recent history tells us about the sides involved in the conflict. There is no negotiating with terrorists.

Yassin, Hamas and the bottomless pit of terrorist groups control the end result. There is no point in Israel giving up any land because there is no reason — and no desire — for the terrorists to stop.

The terrorists are extremists, and they're the ones who have the final say on how much terror there will be. People say that all these groups want is the West Bank, Gaza and Jerusalem for the Palestinian people, and that there will be peace when this can be successfully negotiated. However, it is apparent that these claims are blatantly incorrect.

There will be no peace with the terrorists. They will continue to fight at all costs against the Israelis, working against peace activists with a vision for a two-state solution, and working even harder against those who strive for a state of two coexisting populations.

A peace activist affiliated with the International Solidarity Movement once told me that if Israel can move its borders back to the pre-1967 boundaries, "the terrorists will melt away like ice cream." It is now clearer than ever that this has never been the case, and that with men like Yassin in control of such large political forces, it never will be.

Sugary sweet art

'State of Order and Holy Sugar'

Sugar.

It's not just for breakfast anymore. University of Massachusetts senior Hillary Milens knows it's not just for eating either. The Art major and nature enthusiast has her own ideas about what this sticky sweet material can do.

Milens uses the ingredient to express herself artistically.

"Starting with either granulated sugar or sugar cubes, I manipulate the work by melting, burning or the process of crystallization," she said.

Milens is displaying her sweet work in her first ever art gallery opening called "Holy Sugar!" The event will be held at the Hampden Art Gallery and opens Wednesday, Dec. 10 from 4 to 6 p.m.

It appears alongside the exhibit of work by fellow UMass senior Eliza Gray, using concrete and plaster as mediums in her collection, "State of Order."

"My raw material of choice is sugar, although I have incorporated two other materials, wood and plaster," Milens said. The series of paintings encompasses a "range of colors, from white to amber to black," Milens described.

"I rarely see colors," she said. "Rather I often see black and white or mono-chromatic ranges in the same color."

According to Milen, the artwork hopes to reflect this in its vision for a serene and elegant environment. But don't come with an idea of a "painting" in mind. This is something a little different.

Milens is well versed in the idea of non-traditional materials.

"I would collect large amounts, thousands of berries and pods and compile them into large pieces," she said. "I was inspired this summer after a close family friend died. She [had done] a lot of work with glass shards and upon first glance it reminded me of crystals.

"I became interested in the concept of 'growing' my thesis out of sugar … through the process of crystallization." Milens said. "I discovered that one full-grown piece of rock candy is equal to a quadrillion molecules!"

But who's counting? Many themes can be drawn from the "Holy Sugar!" show, too.

Milens said to be ready for "both traditional and experimental exploration of materials, the presence of rhythm and repetition … the artistic process to the meditative process, accumulation, multiplication …" and more. It seems she wants her audience to come away with something more — to find personal meaning.

Hampden Gallery is located in the populated and diverse Southwest area and displays many non-traditional art exhibits in addition to the more traditional styles. "I hope the audience can walk away … feeling connected to the work, [either from] a sense of serenity and elegance or from their own interpretation," Milens said.

Either way, a daring approach to raw materials paired with a youthful attitude, The "Holy Sugar!" show is sure to be different than anything you've seen. "I hope that there is a presence of beauty in the work and people can discover that and leave remembering [that]" Milens said. "I am curious to see the reactions!"

Irish singer to play NoHo

By Meghan Healy
Collegian Staff

Northampton will play host to one of music's fastest rising stars tomorrow night when Damien Rice comes to town.

The Irish singer and songwriter crossed the Atlantic, riding the wave of success lately seen by the likes of Howie Day and Matt Nathanson, and came crashing down on the shores of the United States to receive critical acclaim. With his independent release "O," (Veckor Recordings) Rice has achieved the impossible — without backing or support from any major label the Irish acoustic-rock hero has become an international star.

Most recognize Rice as the artist behind "Volcano," a guttural and moving acoustic-driven track that has worked its way into regular rotation on MTV and MTV2 over the past few months, but in truth his sound is far more diverse than his first single implies. His mellow and often introspective acoustic tunes are punctuated by rock-inspired guitar tracks that make it impossible to lump him in with all the rest.

In his native Ireland, Damien Rice actually got his start in "a loud rock five-piece from Celbridge, just south of Dublin," a band called Juniper.

Although he ultimately decided that the rock band lifestyle wasn't suited for him, Rice drew heavily upon his time with Juniper when crafting the songs that would become "O." In the eight months after his departure from the band Rice traveled around Europe. When he returned home he was refreshed, recharged and ready to record.

"I know I always sang. In school I was always in the choir, but I didn't have one of these classic upbringings, like Joni Mitchell records playing all the time and my parents being hippies," Rice said of his journey to becoming a musician.

As a child he admitted to leading a fairly solitary lifestyle, fishing and roaming the Irish countryside with his dog. "Then girls came into my life, and fishing kinda stopped," said Rice.

"I picked up the guitar at that time, and once I had something to play while I was singing, it just never stopped," he said.

Following the success of his debut album "O," Damien Rice is embarking on a U.S. tour that will bring him to Northampton tomorrow night.

In music Rice found a muse that allowed him to indulge his love of solitude.

"I used to find a lot of peace just writing something and playing it over and over to myself in my room," he said.

All that seclusion was ultimately time well spent. When "O" hit the airwaves of Ireland and the United Kingdom, a Damien Rice frenzy ensued. Since its release in April 2002, "O" has gone double-platinum across the ocean and Rice has garnered a slew of accolades, including the 2003 Hot Press Readers' Poll award for "Best Debut Album" and "Best Album" and three Ireland Music Award nominations.

Stateside Rice is earning praise from the likes of Newsweek, which called "O" "an out-and-out gorgeous cd. so full of undiluted, unfalsified emotions that it verges on open-heart surgery," and The New Yorker, which hailed Rice as "a complete package of art, personality and presence on a level with Jeff Buckley or [Radiohead's] Thom Yorke."

This summer saw performances by Rice on "The Late Show with David Letterman," "Late Night with Conan O'Brien" and "Last Call with Carson Daly" that gave America a taste of the live Rice experience. While "O" has grabbed the attention of audiences around the world, it is Rice's live show that has gained him respect as a bonafide artist.

"The shows reveal the wide range of Rice's repertoire — angry flights of rock guitar as well as Rice's mellower acoustic tunes — complemented by animated tales about the characters and experiences that inspire the songs," Neil McCormick, of the United Kingdom's Daily Telegraph has said of Rice's stage presence.

With any luck Damien Rice will bring this energy and passion to the Pearl Street Night Club with him tomorrow night when he takes the stage at 7 p.m. Ticket prices are $13.50 in advance and $16 at the door — a small price to pay to see a rising artist who, six months from now, could likely be selling out arenas across the country.

'Devil' fails to intrigue

By Cameron J. Woods
Collegian Staff

Normally one would associate a little black book with thoughts of deep dark secrets, things confided in ink that are not meant to be said and all manner of things that you are not supposed to know.

Unfortunately Ian Hansen's not-so-little black book, "The Devil You Know" does nothing to uphold the guilty pleasures of reading a black book.

Instead of gripping fiction focused around complex characters and their stories, Hanson opts for a story line that is cliche to say the least and a hand full of static characters that reluctantly grow in forced steps throughout the book.

There was one red-hot point of intrigue — each chapter was entitled with a name from a standard deck of Tarot cards. However, the novelty wore off fast, as not everyone is fully versed in Tarot. The chapter titles proved to be nearly impossible to relate to the material in the book.

After this initial sticking point, the story opens with a scene right out of a B-list horror film. A tiny one-roomed apartment covered in gore — the depiction of which fills a page and a half — at which point, every detail and bloody bit is willingly or not etched in to the reader's mental image.

Here we meet our villain, sort of. The murderous monster is a demon, which gorily dispatched the one who summoned him. He is without a physical body and has a name made up of unpronounceable symbols. The reader is told that it "is only pronounceable by material beings with no fewer than three tongues and comprehensive medical insurance covering an extensive number of visits to a licensed and highly competent speech pathologist."

Nice to know, but now that we are all the way in leftfield, can the story get going?

Now loosed upon earth against his will and not too pleased about it, he does what any self righteous demon would do — possess the most powerful person around and plot the destruction of the human race. Unfortunately he happens to choose a little boy who just happens to be a "messiah" of the physical sciences.

Sounds nifty, but what does it mean? It means that our hero enters here. Another unpronounceable named being who is the equivalent of a supernatural cop. "Her" choice of vessel is to possess.

A bulky human with access to weaponry and knowledge of the area they are in? An intelligent logical human who has tons of knowledge and perhaps an obsession with Sherlock Holmes stories? None of the above, instead she is governed by the rules of her job into taking possession of someone who has no more need of their body. Which leaves her with the body and mental capacity of a woman who over dosed on pills after finding her cat dead.

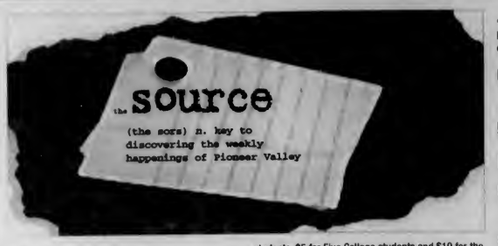
There is also the middle-aged priest, Father Murphy. He doubts all of humanity in the most pessimistic ways yet collaborates with a pretty crazy woman to commit crimes in order to save the world from a particularly nasty demon.

'The Devil You Know'
By Jay Hanson
1st Books
Grade C

Now, with the main players in place, can the story finally get going? Not quite.

A kidnapping and a botched exorcism later, the plot and story lurch into something resembling life. The demon, is in a maximum security mental hospital and, of course, our paranormal police officer has to get to him and try to get the demon out of the boy, again.

Here the most interesting character of the story is introduced. Jim, a man wealthy beyond mention, has given up on sanity and trying and thus meets our hero, now called Candice, in the mental hospital.



Perhaps the most well written part of the book deals with the break out and recapturing of the demon/boy. There are inklings of suspense and even some combat action. After that though, not even medics with some really high-voltage deliberators could have saved this book from its suicide.

Candice's backup plan is to find aliens because their technology is so advanced that maybe they will be able to help separate the demon from the boy. So our ragtag band of "heroes" set off in a car to where else but Area 51.

After having nearly killed the boy and avoided being killed by the military, Candice and her crew finally get picked up by the aliens, who have been watching them for the last five chapters. After experimenting with both Murphy and Jim and aggravating Candice with a super-logical dialog, the aliens reunite the boy/demon with the boys little sister and love over comes evil and everyone goes home happy except for the demon.

Objectively, this book is a story of science fiction that has been told a million times over. Hanson did do a passable job of putting his own flavor on it, though.

What brings the entire book down besides its unfriendly length is the horrendous amount of spelling errors, grammatical accidents, and repeated sentence fragments. Perhaps not an imminent bestseller, but definitely an admirable first novel, "The Devil You Know" could make for some easy down-time reading.

Last of Beethoven's original compositions sells for $2 million

By Robert Barr
Associated Press

LONDON (AP) — An original manuscript of a movement from one of Ludwig van Beethoven's last compositions sold Friday for more than $2 million.

The manuscript from the scherzo movement of his Opus 127 string quartet was purchased by a private buyer who bid by telephone and asked not to be identified, Sotheby's auction house said.

Beethoven composed the quartet in the last three years of his life, after he had finished the epic Ninth Symphony. Sotheby's said single pages written by Beethoven appear fairly often at auction, but that no manuscript of this size had been offered for more than a decade.

The manuscript sold for $2.03 million, Sotheby's said. Before the sale, the auction house suggested the price might go as high as $2.58 million.

In May, Sotheby's auctioned Beethoven's final manuscript of the Ninth Symphony for $3.47 million. The manuscript was done by a copyist, though it included revisions and a few insults addressed to the copyist in Beethoven's hand.

The scherzo manuscript of the quartet is clearly a working document, with smudges and late alterations added.

Prince Galitzin of Russia, who played cello, commissioned Beethoven to write three quartets in 1822, but the composer was inspired to produce five.

Opus 127, in E flat, was the first of the group, composed in 1824-25. It also was the only one that Galitzin paid for — Beethoven never got the payment for the others.

After Beethoven died in 1827, movements from the original score of the quartet were given to various people.

The scherzo was once owned by the mezzo-soprano Pauline Viardot (1821-1910), who was also a composer, and her stamp is on the first and last leaves of the manuscript, Sotheby's said.

U.S. Track approves ban

By Tim Whitmire
Associated Press

GREENSBORO, N.C. (AP) — USA Track & Field delegates overwhelmingly approved a lifetime ban yesterday for athletes who test positive for steroids, but the policy won't take effect until questions about its legality are resolved.

Because the zero-tolerance plan imposes penalties tougher than mandated by the IAAF, the USATF has asked the world governing body to make sure the new rule is acceptable.

"If IAAF gave us permission to do this tomorrow," the lifetime ban would go into effect immediately, USATF president Bill Roe said.

USATF rules now call for a two-year ban for first-time steroid offenders. Under the plan approved Sunday, first-time offenders — and their coaches — could face lifetime bans.

"We want the rest of the world to adopt this so the whole Olympic movement will clean up," said sprinter Jon Drummond, a USATF board member.

Roe told delegates during the final session of the group's annual meeting in Greensboro that the rules change was needed so the spotlight in 2004 "is on our athletes in competition in Athens, not in the courtroom or the media."

Since the summer, USATF has been embroiled in controversy over its handling of a 1999 positive steroid test by runner Jerome Young and athletes' use of the newly detected steroid THG.

The U.S. Olympic Committee has threatened to strip USATF of its Olympic charter if it does not address doping and athlete conduct issues.

Young was cleared to compete at the 2000 Olympics despite the positive test. Young, who has said he never committed a doping offense, went on to win gold as part of the 1,600-meter relay team in Sydney.

The International Olympic Committee, meeting this week in Lausanne, Switzerland, threatened not to credential USATF administrators for the Athens Games if USATF does not resolve questions about how the Young case was handled.

USATF has repeatedly said it is bound by an arbitration court ruling upholding its decision to maintain secrecy on doping acquittals.

Amid the concern over the sport's future, USATF's 25th annual meeting saw record attendance of 1,120 coaches, athletes and officials.

The zero-tolerance proposal was approved unanimously by USATF's board of directors Wednesday.

BCS is set

USC (11-1) by 0.16 in the second closest finish in the six-year history of the BCS. Nebraska beat Colorado by 0.05 in 2001.

The Trojans got 79 of the 128 first-place votes in the polls but finished third in five computers because of a weak Pac-10 schedule.

LSU was second in the polls and six computers and edged out USC based on a tougher schedule. LSU and USC were each picked first in one computer.

The Tigers' spot in the title game wasn't assured until Boise State beat Hawaii at 3 a.m. EST Sunday. The Trojans' strength of schedule was hurt because they beat Hawaii in September.

The dream matchup for the Rose Bowl, a traditional pairing of Big Ten and Pac-10 champions with national title implications, is the doomsday scenario for the BCS.

It's the third time in four seasons that a team in the top two in the polls didn't make it to the BCS title game. The BCS avoided disaster those years because No. 1 Oklahoma beat Florida State in the 2001 Orange Bowl and No. 1 Miami beat Nebraska in the 2002 Rose Bowl.

The No. 2 teams in the polls won their bowl games those years and could have won the AP title if the top-ranked teams lost. The only way to avoid a disputed finish this year is if Michigan (10-2) beats USC.

Eagles clinch playoff berth

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — The Philadelphia Eagles became the first team in the playoffs when Donovan McNabb threw for 248 yards and three touchdowns in a 36-10 victory over the Dallas Cowboys on Sunday.

The Eagles (10-3) got their eighth straight victory and can clinch their third straight division title with two more victories or one win and another loss by the Cowboys (8-5). Philadelphia hasn't lost since a 23-21 defeat in Dallas on Oct. 12, while Dallas is 3-4 after a 5-1 start under new coach Bill Parcells.

Correll Buckhalter ran for 115 yards, including a 64-yard TD run in the fourth quarter that capped the scoring.

McNabb, the worst-rated passer in the NFL through six games, has thrown for 1,513 yards, nine TDs and only one interception in the last six games.

Colts 29, Titans 27

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) — Edgerrin James ran for two touchdowns and Mike Vanderjagt kicked five field goals as the Colts swept the defending AFC South champion Titans, taking control of the division with three games remaining.

The Colts (10-3) improved to 6-1 on the road by scoring 19 straight points and forcing four fumbles, which they turned into nine points.

In this game featuring would-be MVP quarterbacks Peyton Manning and Steve McNair, Manning easily outplayed McNair, even using his legs to scramble for a couple of first downs. He ran for 20 yards and was 22-of-34 for 228 yards.

McNair, who has a sore calf, finished 22-of-38 for 235 yards.

McNair nearly rallied the Titans (9-4) to a tie, throwing two touchdown passes in the final 9:24 and even running for a 2-point conversion. But Dwight Freeney tipped another 2-point conversion pass, and it fell incomplete.

Classic comes down to wire

Highly-touted freshman guard Art Bowers left the game after just twelve minutes when he came down awkwardly on an opposing player's foot following his only basket of the game.

He was taken to St. Elizabeth's Medical Center in Brighton for X-rays, but Lappas did not seem optimistic.

"I'm not feeling real good about that," he said. "It must be hurting him, because he would have killed to be in that game."

Freshman forward Sean Marshall led Boston College with 21 points, including five 3-pointers, while sophomore All-Big East candidate Craig Smith chipped in with 19 points and 11 rebounds.

Freshman forward Jared Dudley was the Eagles' leading rebounder, pulling down 12 boards, and senior captain Uka Agbai tossed in 10 points as well for BC.

"[NESN analyst] Bob Wenzel asked me what I was expecting from the game," BC coach Al Skinner said. "And I said that all I expected was to have a one-point victory. Boy, was I ever right. I won't ever say that again."

The Minutemen scored the last six points of regulation, including a rare 3-pointer by Lee with 32 seconds remaining that sent the contest to overtime tied at 70. It was the first 3-pointer of Lee's career, on just his fifth attempt.

"I wanted to fall down right there," Smith said. "Hey, he made a great shot."

The Maroon and White did have a pair of chances to win the game in regulation, but 3-point attempts by Anderson and Freeman both rimmed out, Freeman's at the buzzer.

UMass led twice in the extra frame, however Lee and Freeman missed a pair of free throws apiece with just over 20 seconds remaining, and Smith, who was battered and bruised all game long by a physical UMass frontcourt, connected on a pair from the foul line with just under 15 seconds remaining to give BC a 76-75 advantage.

"When I went to the line with 14 seconds left I went there knowing I'm knocking them down," Smith said. "I always feel good in overtime, and it's a time that no matter what, you can redeem yourself and that's what I tried to do."

Faced with no timeouts and a chance to win, Anderson advanced the ball up court as the prime option for the final shot, but the Lynn native was greeted with double coverage.

He then found Lee open on the left side, but the center's leaner from the baseline came up short and into the hands of the Eagles' Louis Hinnant as the final horn sounded.

"We beat ourselves," Lee said. "I missed two free throws, and Rashaun [Freeman] missed two. If we make those, we win by three.

"But I take full blame for this loss. I had a shot at the end [of overtime], and I just missed it. I also missed two free throws — I just messed up."

Despite playing without Bowers, UMass surged out to a 24-15 advantage at the 7:42 mark of the first half.

BC responded, however, with a 15-0 run large in part to the outside shooting of Hinnant (11 points including 3-for-4 shooting from behind the arc) and Marshall, to take a 30-25 lead with 1:05 remaining in the first half.

GERALD H. LING/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Gabe Lee's 3-pointer in the final minute sent the Commonwealth Classic into overtime.

Marshall and Martin then traded treys as the Minutemen pulled to within 33-30 at intermission.

UMass came out of the blocks quickly in the second half, as it jumped ahead to take a 40-35 lead on a layup by Lee in transition with 17:31 to play. On the play Lee rolled his ankle as well, and appeared to be in considerable pain while lying on the court. However the 6-foot-9-inch center returned to the game a few minutes later.

The two teams proceeded to battle back and forth through five lead changes before Agbai's turnaround jumper gave the Eagles a 70-64 edge with 3:31 left in the game.

However UMass battled back again on the strength of a free throw by freshman guard Maurice Maxwell (10 points, four assists in 33 minutes) and a Jeff Viggiano layup to set up Lee's heroics that sent the game to overtime.

"I'd say it was an Instant Classic, yeah," Agbai said. "It'll be something that people will talk about and, hopefully, will want to watch again."

Yesterday's hockey game between UMass and Boston University, scheduled to take place at 1 p.m. at BU's Walter Brown Arena, has been postponed. No makeup date had been set at press time.

Eagles win true Classic

BC downs UMass in OT thriller

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

CHESTNUT HILL — Call Steve Lappas prophetic.

Speaking to reporters in the press conference following his team's win over Vermont on Tuesday night, the Massachusetts men's basketball coach described his young squads free throw shooting woes as "a major concern" and that he "didn't have any idea of what to do about it."

Thus, it surely did not surprise the third-year UMass coach when his team missed its final five crucial free throws and fell to Boston College 76-75 in overtime in the ninth annual Commonwealth Classic before 2,133 at Conte Forum.

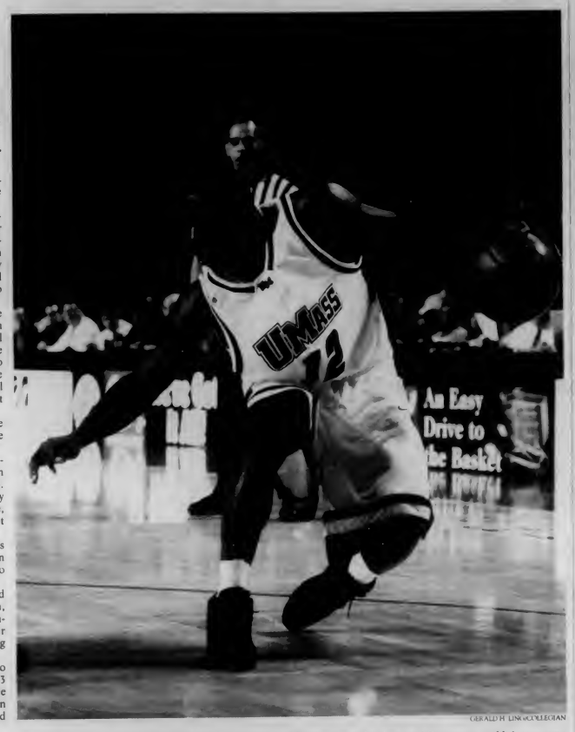
Boston Coll.	76

Over 7,000 tickets were sold for the game, but many were kept away by the blizzard-like conditions in the area.

The Eagles have now won four consecutive Classics, though the Minutemen retain the overall lead in the series at 5-4.



UMass returns to action Tuesday night, when it will travel to Uncasville, Conn. to face Central Connecticut at Mohegan Sun Casino.

"Kids are going to miss shots," Lappas said. "All you can do is concentrate on doing all the other things we can do to win the game, and we did those."

The Minutemen were once again led by junior captain Anthony Anderson, who scored 20 points, grabbed a team-high eight rebounds, dished out four assists and recorded three steals, playing all 45 minutes.

Junior forward Brennan Martin also came up big for UMass, scoring 13 points, including four first-half three pointers. Sophomore forward Rashaun Freeman chipped in with 11 points and seven rebounds.

Sooners will taste Sugar

By Josh Dubow
Associated Press

College football fans, get ready to crown not just one, but possibly two national champions.

That's because the computer rankings had Oklahoma as the country's top team Sunday, while the human poll voters picked Southern California.

Despite getting walloped by Kansas State 35-7 on Saturday night, Oklahoma will take its 12-1 record to the Sugar Bowl against LSU, which won the Southeastern Conference championship by beating Georgia 34-13.

The winner in New Orleans on Jan. 4 automatically captures the coaches' title under Bowl Championship Series format.

USC, which finished third in the BCS rankings, could win The Associated Press championship by beating No. 4 Michigan in the Rose Bowl, with a split national title certain to leave more people calling for a playoff.

The No. 1 team in the AP poll has never dropped after winning its bowl game. The USA Today/ESPN coaches' poll must give its championship to the Sugar Bowl winner.

The BCS was started in 1998 to create a national title game without playoffs.

When the BCS contract expires after the 2005 season, a one-game championship might be instituted after the bowls. That would be too late to fix this year's mess.

In the final BCS standings, Oklahoma was first with 5.11 points based on its top spot in five of the seven computers, the 11th-toughest schedule and a quality win over Texas. The Sooners were third in both polls.

LSU (12-1) was second with 5.99, edging out

Decoding the BCS disaster

Andrew Merritt

The college football landscape took its final form yesterday. Well, sort of. In fact, there's still a lot up in the air. But one thing's for sure. It's a complete and utter disaster.

Oklahoma, all but crowned the finest team in the land, better than any team this year, and better than Bear Bryant's Tide squads, Vince Lombardi's Packers, and 10 All-Madden teams put together — note the thick sarcasm — lost to Kansas State in the Big 12 Championship, giving the Sooners a final flaw in an otherwise shimmering 12-1 record.

And to be fair, OU has been fantastic this year. In a display of how to run a college football program correctly — take note, all you budding Mike Prices — Bob Stoops has run an incredibly tight ship, and driven it all the way into the indisputable national spotlight.

Then, Stoops' crew lost to the Wildcats, and all heck broke loose.

In a sequence of logic that would take NASA engineers a few months to map out, the team playing the Sooners in the Sugar Bowl for all the marbles was determined by the result of (drum roll, please) Hawaii vs. Boise State. That's right, the (formerly Rainbow) Warriors and the Broncos in a battle for no title whatsoever. Simply the season finale for both Western Athletic Conference teams, with no BCS implications for either side. Boise State will likely play in the Fort Worth Bowl (aptly named, since it's held in — you guessed it — Fort Worth) and the Warriors are free to enjoy the paradise that surrounds their campus.

It's obvious that such a game would determine, possibly, the national champion, no? As it turns out, since USC spanked Hawaii 61-32 on Sept. 13, the way the Warriors finished their season would determine the Trojan's strength of schedule. So, no thanks to the Boise State Broncos — they of the Powerade blue field — USC is locked out of the national title game, meaning it would take a stroke of luck, and some crafty voting by the AP crowd, for Pete Carroll's team to get its due spot in the history books.

So this all leads to the inevitable conclusion: a playoff system. Make the bowls a true "series," and not just a trumped up name for advertising dollars. Make it so that the No. 1 team in the land plays the No. 16. This year it'd be — get this — USC and Boise State. Then you'd have diverse opening round matchups like LSU and Miami-Ohio, Michigan and Purdue, and Florida State-Miami.

Perfect, right? Every team gets a shot, upsets become a possibility, March Madness-style pools distract football fans from their Christmas shopping, and the national champion has to play a few more meaningful games before the first Monday after New Year's Day. Perfect. Just look at the way the I-AA playoffs have worked out.

Well, maybe that's not such a great idea. Granted, all those big time football schools in I-A can afford travel, making the "regional" matchup fallacy the I-AA committee tried to pawn off on teams and fans a non-factor, but if the I-AA playoffs are an example of a way to fix the havoc the BCS has wrought, then there's a bleak future ahead for college football.

Maybe the only solution is the ugliest one. Maybe the Miamis and Virginia Techs of the world have it right; maybe it's time for the elite four teams or so from each BCS conference should move into a handful of superconferences, and just create a mirror of the NFL — that's really what college football has become nowadays, isn't it? Just a prospect system for the big league?

Either way, the most sadly humorous part of this whole debacle is what happens when you look at the coaches' and writers' Top 25 polls. Sitting in first is the clear-cut, beeline-for-Sugar-Bowl, undisputed best team in the nation, the Okla-wait … nope, it's the USC Trojans. And right behind them, the Soon-hold on … It's LSU.

But apparently, it doesn't matter, because once you crown a team the king, even if that crown is placed after the spring scrimmage, it isn't coming off. And that's no disrespect intended toward the Sooners. They are quite a team, indeed. It's not every year that serious talk of "the best team in the history of college football" gets thrown about, as it did earlier this season in reference to Oklahoma.

It still feels wrong, though and maybe this is just coming from someone who usually sides with the opinions of journalists, but what's the point of keeping a comprehensive poll, let alone two, by considerably knowledgeable sources, if a microchip is going to make a few calculations at the end of the season and spit out a winner like a lottery ticket from the convenience store?

We might never see a playoff format, since the folks in charge, as they do so well, would rather drag their feet out and stick with a system that very few people can really figure out, a system that could give us two national champions this year, and one that seems to defy the normal laws of logic to come up with an answer that we might have known all along? It takes the sport out of the sport, makes it the same kind of judgment call as the gold medal for figure skating, and, all due respect to that graceful sport, football, just like basketball, hockey, and baseball, ought to end with a fight to the finish, not a set-up clash between the two variables some computer found most appropriate.

And of course, by virtue of Kansas State's 35-7 triumph over Oklahoma — three points less than the score by which it beat UMass — Minutemaniacs can officially say that, by way of the transitive property of sports victories, their team is just as good as the one playing in the national championship game.

Not that it means anything.

Student falls out window

Survives three-story drop from bathroom

A University of Massachusetts student fell from a third story bathroom window early Saturday morning in the Southwest Residential Area.

Kunal Malhotra, 18, fell from the third floor of MacKimmie Hall at 12:40 a.m. Saturday. The fall occurred at a time of very heavy snowfall, according to Patrick J. Callahan, UMass spokesperson. Malhotra was transported by an Amherst Fire Department ambulance to Baystate Medical Center.

"They didn't know the extent of his injuries, but police said he was severely injured," said Callahan.

Malhotra has since been transferred to UMass Medical Center in Worcester. Malhotra, originally from Virginia, is a resident of John Quincy Adams Hall.

Currently, the UMPD is still investigating the incident. No further information was available at press time.

The UMass campus has experienced similar incidents in the past. In September 2002, a male student fell from the top of a UMass fraternity house. According to members of the Greek system, the student was not a fraternity member. He was later released from the hospital.

On April 27, 2001, sophomore Thomas Degnan fell from the roof of Butterfield Hall. He slipped and fell while attempting to retrieve a pirate flag that was hanging on the dormitory roof. He fell 35 feet, landing on a cement patio on the first floor. He was released from the hospital several months later.

On Sept. 27, 1997, Adam Prentice, a 21-year-old junior from Hyannis, fell to his death through the roof of the Morrill Science Center Greenhouse. His death was reportedly caused by massive bleeding. It was indicated that Prentice was under the influence of alcohol at the time of death, causing then-Chancellor David K. Scott to reinforce a tailgating ban that had been lifted since 1992.

White House fears ousting of Russian liberals

By Steve Gutterman
Associated Press

MOSCOW (AP) — A sweeping victory by President Vladimir Putin's allies pushed liberal, Western-oriented parties out of parliament for the first time since the Soviet collapse, and the White House expressed concern Monday over the fairness of a vote human rights officials said marked a retreat from democracy in Russia.

The main pro-Kremlin party, United Russia, won nearly three times as many votes in Sunday's elections as its closest rival, according to preliminary results.

Its new power, together with the defeat of liberal parties and a surge by nationalists who have called for strong state control of the economy, raised questions about Putin's plans for what seems certain to be a second term following March presidential elections.

Putin, who has boosted the economy by introducing reforms but has been accused of stifling dissent and tightening control over the media, offered few hints of his plans for the

Flu vaccine shortage affects UMass students

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

A shortage in the supply of flu shots is affecting University Health Services and causing many sick students who are requesting the vaccine to be turned away.

UHS administers flu shots regularly and has even held workshops for students to receive a shot that will prevent the infection for a low cost.

Recently, the Center for Disease Control announced that the nation's supply of vaccines has run out, and vaccines at individual health centers and hospitals are very limited.

The University is taking drastic measures by only allowing those who have a significant threat of contracting the flu to receive the shot. Because it is recognized that influenza affects mostly infants and the elderly, nurses at health services are giving priority to high-risk patients.

Students who wish to receive the vaccination must go through an evaluation to assess their individual needs for the shot, UHS said.

Jacob Annis, an administrator at UHS, said there is too limited a supply for just anyone to come in and qualify for the vaccine. Health centers around the country are experiencing unprecedented requests for the immunization.

"Typically, urgent care is very slow this time of year," Annis said, "but we're getting swamped right now with patients who are experiencing flu symptoms."

Although it is too late for students who have the flu to receive a shot, many who are sick feel frustrated that there is nothing UHS can do, Annis said.

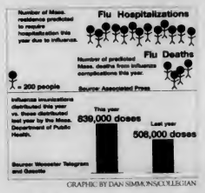
Francine Lynch, a UMass student who is sick with the flu, said she was told by UHS that it was the worst case they've seen this year. As for medication or ways to alleviate the symptoms, there is nothing that UHS can do for her.

"I waited at Health Services all night during the snow and all they basically told me was, 'You have the worst case we've seen,' and sent me home," she said.

Lynch said that she has been running a fever and experiencing chest pains and body aches.

The only thing she can do is wait it out, she said.

Nicole Gatto, a junior economics major, wanted to receive a vaccine from UHS and was turned away.



"They told me that I was in good health and probably didn't need one, but I'm scared if I do come in contact with people who have the flu," she said. "I mean, we all live in such close quarters, people are bound to spread it."

UHS said it is receiving a final shipment of vaccinations tomorrow, but after that is gone, there will be no more for the season. They are planning on vaccinating those who make appointments ahead of time and are evaluated first.

One hundred sixty-six people have made appointments for tomorrow, UHS said.

Cooley Dickinson Hospital said this illness would affect millions and contribute to possible 70,000 deaths.

Requests have been made to deliver more of the vaccination; however, it takes four months to make the vaccine, and at that point, the influenza season will be over.

U.S. soldier and Iraqi police officer killed in attack

Frequency of violent acts down, says military

By Christopher Torchia
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — Insurgents shot and killed a U.S. soldier guarding a gas station yesterday in northern Iraq, and an Iraqi policeman died trying to defuse a bomb, the U.S. military said.

The attack on the soldier from the U.S. Army's 101st Airborne Division took place in Mosul, 250 miles north of Baghdad, Brig. Gen. Mark Kimmitt said in Baghdad.

"Four Iraqi males traveling in vehicles stopped approximately 50 meters (yards) from a gas station in Mosul and opened fire on coalition soldiers guarding the station," Kimmitt said. "One coalition soldier died of gunshot wounds in that attack."

Hours after the killing, three U.S. soldiers in Mosul were wounded when a bomb exploded as their patrol passed, a U.S. military spokesperson said on condition of anonymity.

On Sunday, a soldier was killed and two others were injured when insurgents detonated a roadside bomb in Mosul. The killing came one day after another soldier from the same division was killed and two others were injured when insurgents detonated a roadside bomb in Mosul.

Iraqi police in Baqouba, 35 miles north of Baghdad, discovered an explosive device near the government building, Kimmitt said. A member of the police bomb squad tried to defuse the bomb, but it exploded and killed him.

Kimmitt said there were 18 engagements between Iraqi guerrillas and U.S.-led coalition forces in the past week, a marked decline over previous weeks.

"These numbers are significantly lower than recent norms, although we anticipate and are fully prepared for any upturn in attacks in the days and weeks ahead," he said.

A total of 445 U.S. soldiers have died in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion on March 20. Of those, 308 died hostile action.

Witnesses in Mosul said dozens of U.S. soldiers cordoned the city's central neighborhood of al-Muthana during a raid Monday, inspecting cars and searching people walking in the streets. At least three helicopters flew overhead at low altitude.

"We are looking for bad guys," a soldier said without elaborating.

On Sunday, U.S. troops in Samarra, 70 miles north of Baghdad, seized $1.9 million in cash and false identification papers in a raid targeting a man suspected of financing insurgents, said Maj. Josslyn Aberle, spokeswoman for the 4th Infantry Division.

"They didn't catch the original target but they detained one of his relatives and seized the money."

Aberle said.

Samarra was the site of heavy fighting Nov. 30 between Iraqi guerrillas and U.S. soldiers who were delivering new Iraqi currency to local banks.

In other developments yesterday, a South Korean company said it would withdraw its 60 workers from a power line project in Iraq because gunmen killed two of its engineers. Seoul's Omu Electric Co. has been building transmission towers in the north of the country since October under contract with Washington Group International, based in Boise, Idaho.

Israeli PM will work with international court

By Ravi Nessman
Associated Press

JERUSALEM (AP) — Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon agreed yesterday to cooperate with an international court's expected investigation of a West Bank security barrier.

Israel's justice minister, meanwhile, asked the government to reopen debate on the route of the barrier, which is still under construction.

Israel says the snaking line of trenches, walls, fences and razor wire is needed to keep out suicide bombers, who have killed hundreds of Israelis over the past three years of violence. Palestinians say the planned barrier route, which cuts deep into West Bank land they claim for a future state, amounts to an Israeli land grab.

The U.N. General Assembly voted yesterday to refer the barrier debate to the International Court of Justice in The Hague, Netherlands. The United States voted against the move although it has criticized the route.

"We think that the resolution could undermine, rather than encourage, direct negotiations between the parties," State Department spokesman Richard Boucher said.

Sharon and Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom met yesterday before the U.N. decision and agreed to cooperate if the case went to international court, according to Sharon adviser Raanan Gissin.

Israel would tell the court the barrier was needed for self-defense, he said.

"We'll discuss it and present our case in the court," Gissin said. "It will be a discussion of the right of Israel to exist, because the fence is meant to protect our existence."

Libraries will merge over break

By Jovan C. Smith
Collegian Correspondent

After 41 years of service, the Biological Science Library at the University of Massachusetts will close permanently at 5 p.m. on Friday, Dec. 19, and relocate to the newly renovated Integrated Sciences and Engineering Library.

The ISEL, now known as the Physical Sciences and Engineering Library, is located on the second floor of the Lederle Graduate Research Center.

Faculty, students and researchers who plan to use materials from the Morrill collection during Intersession should check them out before the facility closes on Dec. 19. BSL faculty will inform users of procedures used to request items during the transition.

Anne C. Moore, head of reference services and acting head of research and instructional services at the BSL, said students may forget about the increased walking distance because of longer hours, new computers, an increase in seating, flexible space and wireless Internet service for the laptop users.

"It has been hard to cover two places at once because we didn't have enough staff to cover hours. Branch Reference Librarian Naka Ishii said. "This is why the hours were short at the BSL."

The ISEL will have the same hours as the PSEL, which had longer hours than the BSL, Ishii said.

According to Ishii, with the additional hours the faculty is in need of hiring additional staff.

Before the fall, the research library conducted a survey open to UMass faculty and students regarding the merge and renovations to the PSEL. This survey was recommended to the Faculty Senate and was the deciding factor for merge, Moore said.

The BSL was created in 1962 and has had only five head librar-

5:03 p.m. A Schwinn Rocket Stage 2 yellow mountain bike was reported stolen from the Totman Gym.

ACLU rally will protest legislation

Five-college students and representatives from the American Civil Liberties Union will gather tomorrow at noon on the Student Union steps to rally against the USA PATRIOT Act.

The rally will feature three central speakers: Carol Rose, director of Massachusetts ACLU; Bill Newman, director of the Western Massachusetts ACLU; and Mount Holyoke College professor Chris Pyle.

Rose will address the effect of the USA PATRIOT Act on students. Newman will speak about the FBI on campus and the Freedom of Information Act.

Numerous representatives from student organizations will speak as well, including members of the Office of ALANA Affairs, the Graduate Employee Union, the Radical Student Union and Asian Americans for Political Action.

The USA PATRIOT Act was one of a series of legislation passed shortly after Sept. 11, 2001, designed to give greater power to law enforcement to combat terrorism.

The act has sparked discussion across the nation. Aron Israelite, president and founder of the UMass chapter of the ACLU said he believes that the legislation gives law enforcement too much power.

"The act is supposed to combat terrorism. It's about security, but I think ... it infringes upon civil liberties," Israelite said. "It has given them so much power, they are violating the basic freedoms Americans should hold dear."

Israelite, who founded the ACLU UMass chapter this semester, said he felt that it is important that the issue be put into a public forum.

"We want to bring this issue to the general public," said Israelite. "I think many students would be upset, as I am, if they knew what was going on."

The rally is sponsored by the UMass and Mount Holyoke College ACLU chapters, the Office of ALANA Affairs, UMass Democrats, the South Asian Student Association and the Arab Student Association.

future.

He promised to turn to the liberals for ideas and hinted some of their leaders might be recruited into the government — an effort to ease fears the Kremlin might roll back reforms.

But he also suggested the elections showed liberal views had little support among Russians, who gave most of their votes to parties that emphasized the importance of a resurgence of a powerful Russia rather than to concerns about democracy or rights.

"It is absolutely clear to me that these results reflect the real sympathies of the population," Putin said in a televised interview. "They reflect what the people really think; they reflect the realities of our political life."

Analysts said United Russia and its allies were angling for a two-thirds majority required to make constitutional changes — a lever they could use to extend Putin's term or let him run for a third term, provided the docile upper parliament house, Russia's regional legislatures and the president himself approve.

In a crushing defeat for liberal parties that have promoted economic reforms and advocated an open style of democracy, the Yabloko and Union of Right Forces fell short of the five percent vote needed to gain seats as parties in the State Duma, Russia's lower parliament house.

The once-formidable Communist Party also faltered, many of its former voters likely siphoned off by Homeland, a new apparently Kremlin-approved party whose leaders have assailed the West and shocked Russian business circles with their calls to crack down on rich tycoons, reverse post-Soviet privatization and trim oil exporters' profits.

Flamboyant nationalist Vladimir Zhirinovsky's Liberal Democratic Party of Russia has supported the Kremlin in key legislative votes, despite fiery rhetoric.

The library gradually expanded through 1970-71, and now provides librarians, reference sources, information books, journal articles and research help in the fields of biology and geosciences. It does not include medicine and health services.

With the closing of the library also comes some disappointment from the library staff.

"Librarians feel strong about the closing of libraries," said Ishii. "It's like closing a church. People who have worked in this building will miss this space."

Moore agreed: "It will be difficult to think of it not being here. It's like losing a loved one." She went on, saying, "The University has gone about this the right way, by taking their time in the decision process of the BSL. They went out and consulted people who it would impact."

Online shopping tops holiday retail both at home and abroad

With this season's holiday shopping in full swing, officials are beginning to predict which retailers will gather in the most sales this season. This year, it is apparent that the usual holiday revenue giants such as Wal-Mart and Target were not the only stores raking in shoppers on Black Friday.

Dec. 1, the Monday after Black Friday, was also the biggest shopping day of the year — online that is. Consumers returning to the office during the first December workweek spent millions within a few hours after 9 a.m. This consumer trend has been growing steadily throughout the last couple of years, as customers are choosing to do the majority of their shopping online, avoiding the hassles of the shopping malls and check-out lines.

While the snow this past weekend spoiled one of the busiest shopping weekends of the year, online stores such as Amazon.com thrived. This December in particular is an extremely important sales season for retailers — consumers have finally begun to open their wallets a little wider. Americans are buying more expensive gifts and are willing to spend more money per gift than in the post-Sept. 11 seasons.

According to USA Today, a new brand of shoppers has appeared on the World Wide Web just in time for the Christmas rush. American soldiers stationed in Iraq have begun to do the majority of their holiday shopping online, as there are very few shopping opportunities available overseas.

With little to amuse themselves during downtime and plenty of money saved from unused paychecks, troops are flooding the computer labs set up by the U.S. Army to do one thing: shop.

Although 130,000 soldiers may not make up a very significant part of the consumer pool, they do represent the incredible growth that online shopping has undergone. In America, this growth has been catalyzed by the luxury of high-speed Internet access and wireless connections available in the home. For the average American, online shopping has become easier than ever.

Everything that a store sells is usually available on the Internet, whereas the same product may be unavailable or out of stock in the store. With online wrapping often available, the simple transaction of a credit card number can eliminate nearly every holiday hassle.

While shopping online may seem to weaken the spirit of Christmas shopping, there is one obvious perk to this modern trend. In the past, soldiers fighting in wars overseas during the Christmas season had no way to reach their loved ones during the holidays. Shopping was often impossible, and packages were never guaranteed to reach the home front on time.

Furthermore, shopping in a war-ravaged country is not always safe. Soldiers are forbidden from many areas in Baghdad, and are required to wear helmets and bulletproof vests in other places. Although some Iraqi merchants — desperate for business after years of economic hardship — have been allowed to sell to the troops in safe areas, the goods are much different what the general Target would stock.

"Mink blankets have been very popular," said one solider.

By use of the Internet, soldiers are now able to communicate with loved ones and enjoy the holidays more than ever. Wartime is a hardship for not only the men and women who fight in it, but for those who remain behind as well.

Thanks to the growth and development of computer technology and the World Wide Web, our soldiers can feel a little closer to home this holiday season.

What do you really know about the USA Patriot Act?

Many of its effects are not visible to the average citizen. We are fortunate enough to live in a country where we don't need to think every day about our Constitutional rights. The only time we would need to think about those rights is if they are threatened.

I am of the opinion that now is one of those times. Here are a few facts about the Patriot Act:

1.) It was introduced into the House 45 days after Sept. 11, and passed with virtually no debates. The act itself is written on 132 pages, so it is unlikely that most congressmen would have been able to read it before they passed it. It was signed into law on Oct. 26, 2001.

The Patriot Act is an extensive piece of legislation. It is disheartening to think that it could have been passed so quickly with so little debate, even within the period of fear and shock that followed Sept. 11.

2.) The full name of the act is "Uniting and Strengthening of America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism." The stated purpose of the act is "to deter and punish terrorist acts in the United States and around the world, to enhance law enforcement investigatory tools, and for other purposes."

Despite the clever acronym, the act is anything but patriotic. The methods used to implement the act represent a level of wanton authority that has never existed in America. The most well-publicized example of deterrence gone awry is the indefinite detainment of foreign prisoners in Guantanamo Bay who have not been charged with anything. I wonder if it is truly necessary for America to compromise many of the principles that it has represented so well for so long in the name of fear and prevention.

Thankfully, the Supreme Court is now willing to hear cases brought by several detainees who argue that their detention is unjust and beyond the authority of the government.

The methods that must be employed to enhance law enforcement tools are not those that necessarily increase cooperation among law enforcement officials, but those that remove the rights that have protected Americans from governmental intrusion for 200 years.

We are fortunate enough to live in a country where we don't need to think every day about our Constitutional rights. The only time we would need to think about those rights is if they are threatened. I am of the opinion that now is one of those times.

Then there is the last stated purpose of the USA Patriot Act: "... for other purposes." Within this context, the ambiguity is startling and menacing. I wonder if the subtext of this statement is that "other purposes" are just "any means necessary."

3.) The act, among other things, expands the definition of terrorism to include domestic terrorism, which could subject political organizations to surveillance, wiretapping, harassment and criminal action for political advocacy. It also expands the ability of law enforcement to conduct secret searches, and gives them wide powers of phone and internet surveillance and access to highly personal records (medical, financial, student) with minimal judicial oversight. It allows FBI agents to investigate Americans for criminal matters without probable cause if they say it is for "intelligence purposes."

The right to privacy, for many, is an inherently American right. The right to associate without interference is also seen as such. While the Patriot Act doesn't explicitly remove these rights, the measures that must be taken to implement it inevitably do so in practice.

4.) Eight thousand Arabic and South Asian immigrants have been interrogated because of their ethnic and religious backgrounds, not because of any suspected wrongdoing. Thousands of men have been held secretly in federal custody for months and the government has refused to publish their names or whereabouts even when ordered to do so by the courts.

Fear and ignorance are no excuse for discrimination. Despite the fact that the act has specific provisions to prevent such discrimination, in practice it has only been perpetuated.

Ultimately, the Patriot Act affects us all in insidious ways that we might not even realize yet. It is also is the first in the list of laws that are trying to circumvent the Constitution in the name of security.

The University of Massachusetts chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union is sponsoring a rally on Wednesday, Dec. 10, at noon in front of the Student Union so that we can exercise our right of free association and free speech regarding the USA Patriot Act. The government hasn't entirely gotten to those ... yet.

Fantasy addicts and egotistical realists

Robert Carey

At the end of every semester, students fervently rush to catch up on schoolwork, tackle tardy assignments and study for oncoming finals before the blessed winter break.

I should be one of these people, but I find myself using most of my potential study time trying to finish up the last book in the "Lord of the Rings" trilogy before the movie comes out later this month. At that time, the masses of escapists will lurch forth from their introverted holes and make their way to the movie theater for the long-awaited premiere.

To say that I'm one of these escapists would be a half-truth. For me, a thing such as "Lord of the Rings" falls into the same category as my fantasy sports teams: an idle distraction that consumes a copious amount of time and contributes very little toward intellectual growth.

It is important not to become overwhelmed with these fantasy books, as most who get involved with them do. If you get hooked on the addictively hyper-imaginative fantasy worlds, you will completely lose your footing in reality. The demand and popularity of elaborate escapist literature has steadily increased, as people try to find a world that is benignly chaotic to balance off the vapid realities of the modern day.

The problem with this crap literature — though admittedly much of it is well-decorated crap literature — is its nearly complete detachment from reality. This detachment causes the meanings and themes of such books, which are usually in small number and too straightforward, to be concealed by over-focalized plots and settings. Most science fiction and popular fantasy literature falls into this category.

My sister is always after me to read her "Harry Potter" books, which I contemptuously refuse to pick up on the grounds that I read enough of this kind of crap literature as it is. If you're a reader, then a certain amount of crap is OK. However the temptations to gorge upon the intricately woven fantasies of another writer leads to a cerebral obesity, which once it has begun is hard to resist.

Conversely, having given the above rant I feel it is also important to steer clear of works that commit the opposite sin of reading pieces that use too little imagination.

The problem with this crap literature — though admittedly much of it is well-decorated crap literature — is its nearly complete detachment from reality.

Too many books today are pretty much memoirs and autobiographies taking on the guise of legitimate fiction. Often easily detectable by the make-up of the main character and the illogical progression of plot, these possess a kind of worthlessness that I find to be more offensive than fantasy literature, because such books pretend to hold profound value.

Students who are enrolled in the Commonwealth College's Dean's Book or capstone courses (horribly designed programs, by the way) might remember reading Dave Eggers' lengthy-titled book, "A Staggering Narcissistic Work of an Inflated Ego" (or something like that), or Kincaid's "AutoBiography of my Mother." The plot of these books meander from one randomly occurring event to another, which at times can be somewhat entertaining, though they are ultimately purposeless and unfulfilling. Whatever messages these books convey are usually too subjective and unintentional to be taken seriously.

Good art is the skewed reflection of reality. If the reflection becomes too disfigured or if it becomes an uninventive mirrored reflection, then the significance of the work is diminished. The most rewarding part of reading is learning something new. It is the writers' responsibility to make this experience as fulfilling as it possibly can for the reader.

I'm not saying that all fantasy literature and autobiographical pieces should go unread, but their worth should be taken at face value. The best books to read are ones that include a healthy dose of the imagination within the slightly fixable confines of reality.

Why write cheap entertainment? If you set out to write a medieval hero epic or something, then don't get hung up the history of magic omens and the attire of sub-human halflings. Keep a firm hold of the timelessness of human experience, and challenge yourself to create characters that the reader can relate to.

Look at what Shakespeare did with all of his characters. Through his imagination alone he reincarnated Julius Caesar and King Lear and gave them a depth that continuously attracts people to his plays. Presently, most works are out of sync with the best methods on the uses of the imagination, and the result has been the ever-growing temptation to write and read crap literature.

Mutual stereotyping of the sexes

Johnny Donaldson

I was listening to the radio in the car the other day, when the disc jockey for a Boston-based rock station — I believe her name is Mistress Carrie — began talking about a news story involving a new survey that was taken by the research group Synovate regarding male and female concepts of intimacy.

According to the Web site www.news.com.au, the group interviewed 1,000 random people between the days of Nov. 21 and 23 in order to gauge their opinions on sex and intimacy.

This is what they found: 31 percent of men want emotional intimacy out of a relationship, while only 23 percent of men said sex was the goal on a date. However, 27 percent of the women believed that sex was the only goal for men compared to 19 percent of men.

The DJ than proceeded to discredit the survey by basically saying that it was untrue and that men only want sex.

Why do stereotypes about the sexes still persist in this enlightened age of women in the workforce and metrosexuals on the streets of New York?

Why do stereotypes about the sexes still persist in this enlightened age of women in the workforce and metrosexuals on the streets of New York?

"Men are drunken, sex-obsessed louts with no intention other than playing the field and women are money-grubbing, nagging harpies." Neither of those statements are true.

Sitcoms and comedians paint men as bumbling dimwits too overcome by their egos to not let trouble get in the way, while women are the saviors of these holy fools. Sometimes though, women are demeaned as shallow, shrewish "ladies" who only love men for their big wallets.

Yes, sometimes this can be true. But more often than not, these are pathetic clichés meant to demean both men and women alike.

This DJ offended me by stating her belief that a man cannot be capable of emotional intimacy. Bull. To me, men and women are equal in all areas except physiology. Emotionally, mentally, spiritually, physically — both sexes are equally capable of the same achievements as the other. To put women on a pedestal by saying that men are only capable of being horny bastards is sexist and demeaning.

Why can't a man be able to be happy with emotional fulfillment? Sure, sex is fine, but it's not the only thing. I'm sure for any person a life of sex without human connection is empty and meaningless, and to imply that men are capable of having feelings in the area of romance and relationships is ridiculous.

I am a male, as I have stated, and would like it very much to have a girlfriend. I want to have that romantic, emotional connection to a girl who has the same feelings for me. I do not want to just go out and have meaningless sex with some stranger I barely know. This survey shows I am not the only man who believes so, yet people like this Mistress Carrie continue to push the myth that no man comes equipped with good intentions.

I don't believe in the stereotypes that some men have about women.

Despite my sometimes snarky demeanor, I genuinely respect females, having been raised with two sisters, and my best friends have always been female. I never buy into the belief about how all women are gold diggers. So why are men continuously believed to be sex crazed players? I am not one, and don't like being lumped into that category.

This survey might finally show that maybe — just maybe — a guy does have honest intentions and that the shady stereotype should just be retired.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

In Morris Singer's column featured on Friday, Dec. 5, Singer called the recent anti-Bush protests in Britain an example of "senseless opposition to our country from overseas."

What evidence do you have that they are "senseless"? You say these protesters can't debate the facts? The facts they have behind them are well known, but you make no mention of them. The threat from weapons of mass destruction in Iraq was and is questionable. American respect for the United Nations may be essential to our future security. Without attempting to refute these specific ideas, you do nothing to prove that opponents to the occupation of Iraq are "senseless."

You attempt to sidestep these questions by pretending that Bush's opponents at home and abroad are against the United States in itself, rather then the specific things it does. The British public has been strongly opposed to the war and their prime minister has betrayed them in favor of Bush.

Therefore, the protests you describe are in support of democracy and national sovereignty, not "anti-Americanism." If you have any evidence to the contrary, I don't see it in your column.

"All that really matters is that we are acting ... out of a benevolent interest for peace and security — principles that we have always stood for." It is absurd to suggest that United States foreign policy has always been consistent with these principles, but even if it were sometimes consistent, it still wouldn't follow that it is being consistent right now.

To refer to your own example, the United States did not get involved in World War II until its own military empire was directly threatened at Pearl Harbor. Until this point, the United States turned a blind eye to Hitler's genocide.

Similarly, Saddam Hussein's worst war crimes were perpetrated with United States support and raised little concern here until access to cheap Kuwaiti oil was finally under threat. If there was ever a situation where United States foreign policy was consistent with the goals of peace and security instead of might and greed, the Gulf region is definitely definitely not it.

If the current occupation of Iraq is benevolent and principled, then prove it. Show that the protestors' serious claims don't hold up. Don't pretend that they don't have any. If you can't do that, then calling protestors "anti-American" equates "Americanism" with blind obedience in support of imperialist domination. Our European allies don't "hate" us; they disagree with us.

We ought to recognize the difference.

Communication is the key to experimenting

Sex-iversity is a question and answer column designed to provide important information and answers to questions regarding sex, sexuality, sexual orientation, sexually transmitted infections and reproductive rights. Voiced by Julia Kristan, a member of the Voices for Planned Parenthood (VOX) group here at the University of Massachusetts, and an active volunteer for the Everywoman's Center on campus, the column is intended to help educate the University community about reproductive health, rights, legislation and responsibilities. Much of the statistical information provided in this column derives from research done through and obtained by Planned Parenthood and its national affiliates.

Q. I want to try some new things sexually with my partner, but I don't know how to ask. Do you have any suggestions?

A. The simple answer to this question is "communication." That will help you very much when you want to introduce toys or new positions to your sexual life, or even if you want to help anyone to start a sexual life.

If you look back at your health classes in high school, the odds are that your teacher primarily talked about saying no to various situations. The focus in such classes is often not on how to ask for sex and how to truly communicate your desires and feelings. I see this as problematic, as questions and communication revolving around sex help to ascertain consent.

Sex-iversity
Julia Kristan

Consent is a wonderful thing. Without it, sex legally becomes rape. With it, sex can be fulfilling and enjoyable for all parties involved.

A good rule of thumb I've found is that if you can't talk about it frankly, then you probably shouldn't be doing it. If you are feeling real shame or regret regarding sexual experiences, take a close look at what you believe and what you're doing. There's no reason to force things. Talking about sex and physical intimacy with a person you trust is a good way to practice communication.

If you have a friend or family member with whom you are close to, take advantage of the opportunity to talk about things. If you're talking about a topic for the first time, it might be a bit difficult. I promise things get easier the more open and honest you are. If you or your partner (or friend/family member) is turning bright red, take a moment and relax, and don't forget about humor. Sex can be a funny topic.

It's natural to be nervous as well. Being members of this society, the majority of us aren't raised with the ability to talk openly about sex and emotions. It's a skill that takes practice and a little bit of courage at first.

In a sexual relationship, each person has a responsibility to be honest and considerate. This means "checking in" with the other person regularly. Checking-in with someone can be as easy as asking, "Is this okay for you?" or, "How are you doing?"

Answering questions honestly is likewise important. If something feels painful, uncomfortable or just plain wrong, let the other person know. It's never too late to change your mind on what is OK. Consent on one act does not mean consent on another. Consent at the beginning of intercourse, for example, does not necessarily mean consent 30 seconds later. In a society that puts huge blame on rape and sexual assault survivors, asking questions before, during and after physical intimacy is vital.

Try using some of the following phrases out before you act:

"Do you want to try something different?"

"I was thinking of using a toy. What do you think?"

"Are you comfortable with this?"

"Is this hurting you?"

"Do you want to stop?"

"I feel ready to have sex, do you?"

"What do you want?"

Sex usually isn't like what you see in the movies — glamorous and fantastic every time. It can be messy, too short, too long, comical, awkward or just not right for the time being. Don't forget your pleases, your thank yous, and some protection. Those three things will go a long way to care for all parties involved.

'Singing' in the wrong key

All-star cast makes mediocre movie

Robert Downey Jr., above, and Katie Holmes, below, star in a new version of Dennis Potter's British TV miniseries, "The Singing Detective."

By Johnny Donaldson

If it does nothing else, "The Singing Detective" reaffirms that Robert Downey Jr. — as sadly troubled as he is — is one of the best actors of his generation.

'The Singing Detectve'
Directed by Keith Gordon
Starring Robert Downey Jr. Mel Gibson
Paramount Classics
Rated R
109 mins.
Grade C

As Dan Dark, a pulp noir novelist bed ridden by a severe case of psoriasis, Downey rages and bellows with an authoritative presence that we haven't seen on this perennially boyish-looking actor since, maybe, ever. Downey, as a man trapped in his own body, plays Dark as a man too tormented by his roiling, stormy soul to even want to try to help himself out of emotional self-destruction. Downey hasn't been this alive on screen in years.

"The Singing Detective" is also a movie that demonstrates that a movie musical needs magic to survive; otherwise it will look shriveled and tiny up on a 20-foot screen. This new version of "The Singing Detective," adapted from Dennis Potter's acclaimed British TV miniseries of the same name by the late author himself, is a tinny and off-key stab at replicating the feverish, mad splash of a genuine movie musical. Alas, this is no "Chicago" — this isn't even "Moulin Rouge."

The director, Keith Gordon, doesn't have the soul of a musician; what he has is the soul of a deluded karaoke bar patron. He has no sense of rhythm, nor does he have the heart to truly capture the poetry of music. To him, musical interludes are just another gimmick, and even then he can't trust them enough to avoid stumbling over his two left feet.

But my, Downey's good. His Dan Dark is a bitter, self-pitying man who can't — or won't — stop lashing out everyone around him. His skin is a flaking, mottled, rotting mess, a decaying roadmap of disease spotted by sores and legions. Dark can barely move without hurting, his body remaining withered and curled into itself. Psychologically damaged, paranoid and angry, Dark seethes and insults, screams and attacks, all because he wants to attack his own troubled self. Downey expertly bounces between Dark's festering anger, his sadness and the insecurities spoiling at his center.

Dark specializes in writing cheesy '50s noir stories, low budget affairs centering around the worlds of pin-striped gangsters, sultry, vampy femme fatales and hard-boiled gumshoes spouting the most theatrical of detective dialogue. Dark's stories involve a tough guy detective who likes to sing, spending his nights off warbling the era's pop favorites in smoky, shadowy clubs when he's not busy on the trail of some sort of corruption. As he lies in his hospital bed, unable to move, Dark begins to imagine himself starring in his own fantasy film noir world.

Fantasy and reality soon begin to merge and bend as Dark stews in his anger. He suspects that his estranged wife (Robin Wright Penn) is toiling with a shady movie producer (Jeremy Northam) to rip him off for millions, and so he imagines her as the doomed

Medeski, Martin and Wood jazz up art museum in whiteout conditions

Medeski, Martin and Wood entertained a crowd at the Mass. MoCA in North Adams, Mass., during the first snowstorm of this winter.

Winter colors leapt through the Massachusetts night and perched upon our shoulders; dark skies and white nights crept softly near as we stood shivering beneath the street light. I followed my footsteps toward the door as it seemed the evening might swallow me whole were I not to press forward.

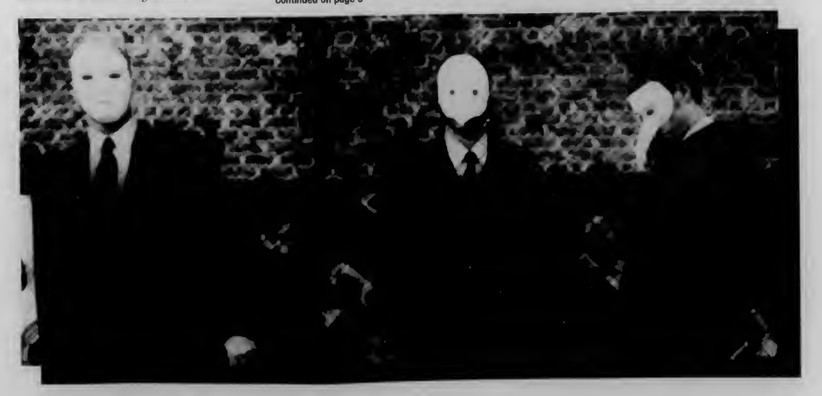
Dec. 6

Inside, my thoughts turned toward the journey here. The year's first great snowstorm had served as decoration for our transit: a nervous, two-hour jaunt down Route 2. Zero visibility and a growing anxiety over the safety of our voyage made our intentions seem questionable, but we never lost sight of why we had left the comfortable confines of Orchard Hill.

There was a show tonight.

And it was that faint glimmer of inspiration that carried us all the way to North Adams. There, beneath the cold, December night, Medeski, Martin and Wood would throw down a set of improvised music, the likes of which no words could describe.

Frank Zappa said it best: "Writing about music is like dancing about architecture." But I'm going to try:



Brooklyn-based neo-jazzers Medeski, Martin and Wood first took the stage together in 1991; 13 years and 13 records later, MMW finished their fall '03 tour at Mass. MoCA.

And the environment of this locale was more than appropriate for the boys. The funky, avant-museum's upside-down trees (you'll have to see it to believe it) were telltale signs of what was to come.

As we stepped inside the building's Hunter Center auditorium, we knew we were in for no ordinary show. Manic swirls of organ and sinister, sinuous bass lines cascaded across dirty jazz rhythms and dope hip-hop beats. The games had begun.

Early in the set, following a tremendously soulful piece navigated by John Medeski's Hammond B3, the trio broke into "Just Like I Pictured It," a cut off their 1998 Blue Note debut, "Combustication." Chris Wood's funky, ostinato line left plenty of room for Medeski's ininitable, freaky keys work and Billy Martin's expert, sloppy beats to cavort and converge. The tune's jazzy coda found Medeski on acoustic piano, filling up the space his crack rhythm section afforded him.

Tryst are no 'kids'

By Cameron J. Woods
Collegian Staff

In a time when bands are being deemed great because of their innovation in the styles of yesteryear such as garage rock, psychedelic rock and British punk, the band Tryst is not to be overlooked.

Their sound is something of '60s rock mixed with the distortion of alternative rock guitar. The result is something that sounds a bit light but leaves listeners actually feeling good.

Tryst
'Kids of Big Stars'
Limbo Music

The deep and resounding vocals of Tim Cohan, who also plays electric and acoustic guitar, are offset by the dreamy vocalizations of bassist Ellen Highstone. Sam McIlvain plays electric guitar with a classic feel and a love for the high-pitched notes. On drums, Elisa Chiusano pounds out the light and sometimes poppy beats that set the tone for the rest of the band.

On the opening track, "Spin My Wheels," off their disc "Kids of Big Stars," Cohan and Highstone melt their voices together in a short song focused on getting away from bad situations. The opening drive drumbeat gives it a light and almost fun feel, but the simple lyrics have a weight to them that keeps the song from floating away. It is definitely a song that could inspire some rhythmical nodding.

The second song is the title track of the album, "Kids of big stars." instantly the moody vocals of Cohan covey the feeling that it is pointless to live a life of trying to grow out of your parents shadows. The light sound of the track seems to carry a message telling the listener to just relax.

The next track, "Jayne Wright," sounds strikingly different from its predecessors. It has a more soulful sound and the bass guitar is much more pronounced, lending a sort of jazzy feel to it. Highstone trades in the light and airy vocals for a smoky sultry low-key style that is a sensual experience to listen to. The lyrics merely seem to be about a very juvenile love.

"Heavy and wide" is the next track, which has the deep, hard sound of a rock ballad; Cohan, with a bit of a John Travolta-esque sound, belts out a tune about a drunk man who violently loves a girl who wants nothing to do with him. Tryst's almost indelibly happy sound peaks through in this song seemingly at the worst points: "So you better step aside/ he's come off his hinges/and he swings out/heavy and wide."

The next track, "Ripple," is disturbingly light for the story that it carries. The song talks about moving to New York and then not being able to finish anything but the relationship he is in, which is left up in the air to be wondered. "No DNA to trace/ no murders face/ no smoking gun or knife to be found/ just a ripple/ where we went down."

The album continues with this theme of nicely revamped happy, yet somewhat antiquated-sounding, music accompanied by dark and — more often than not — depressing lyrics. The funny part is in listening to Tryst's bright melodies. It is not until one deeply listens to only the lyrics that you could feel brought down by this album.

Lizard King remembered in Paris

By Angela Doland
Associated Press

PARIS (AP) – Jim Morrison's former band mates burned candles, a rose and a poem at his grave in Paris yesterday, a tribute to the "Light My Fire" singer and cult figure on what would have been his 60th birthday.

"We're trying to evoke the spirit of Jim," Robby Krieger, former guitarist for The Doors, told dozens of fans kept behind police barriers. Many held white candles and old album covers.

Had the hard-living singer survived to turn 60, he would have been "happy, laughing, joking, a good man," Ray Manzarek, The Doors' keyboardist, told The Associated Press. The two were in Paris for concerts with their new band, The Doors 21st Century.

Morrison's tomb was covered with votive candles, flowers, beer cans, photos and a silvery "Happy Birthday" banner. Security agents patrolled the shady, cobblestoned Pere Lachaise cemetery.

After burning the poem and rose left behind by fans, Manzarek and Krieger asked reporters to leave for a moment of silent contemplation.

John Densmore, drummer for The Doors, did not attend. He filed a lawsuit against Manzarek and Krieger in February for breach of contract for touring without him under the name of a band that includes the words "The Doors."

Another lawsuit was filed by Morrison's parents and in-laws in May, accusing Manzarek and Krieger of tarnishing the former group's reputation by continuing to make new music and tour.

Morrison was found dead in the bathtub of his Paris apartment on July 3, 1971, at age 27. French police said he died of a heart attack, though his regular use of drugs and alcohol was likely a factor.

One fan at the graveside, Martin Skotniczny, a 23-year-old Polish art student, hitchhiked for 30 hours to get to Paris for the anniversary.

"Jim's music and poetry changed my life," said Skotniczny, who wears his hair shaggy and shoulder-length like Morrison's was. "He showed me a different side, a darker side, of my own mind."

Other notables buried at Pere Lachaise include writers Oscar Wilde and Marcel Proust, painter Eugene Delacroix and singer Edith Piaf.

Morrison's grave, which has a sober gray headstone marked James Douglas Morrison, attracts the most attention, and a full-time security guard watches over it. That doesn't prevent Morrison fans from leaving behind graffiti, some of it referencing his songs.

One fan scrawled on a nearby mausoleum: "This is not the end."

Medeski, Martin and Wood play inspiring show at Mass. MoCA

"Note Bleu" followed soon after, a bossa nova blues showcasing a simple, infectious melody. Medeski's improvisations over this tune, while frantic as ever, were gorgeous and expressive; Wood's bass work was airtight and aggressive.

The boys busted out some new stuff, too. A hip-hop piece with a nasty synth-melody made the crowd move, and a new funk number including sections where Wood's bass drops out and leaves Martin and Medeski to duel left this writer gasping for breath as the intensity of the tune just grew and grew.

Following the frenzy incited by their new material, Wood, on upright, ripped into a solo improvisation as Martin and Medeski left the stage. Snarling, he tore into his bass, running up and down the neck with impossibly fast accuracy and precision. And just when you thought the strings might break beneath the pressure he exerted over them, the world's tightest bass player broke into a familiar groove.

"Chubb Sub," an MMW classic, carried the crowd to boogaloo heaven and capped off the set. One of their biggest songs, the group kicked this tune like it was the last tune they'd ever play.

But there would be one more. When the boys emerged for their encore, the cacophonous crowd threatened to drown out the music. But when Medeski, Martin and Wood took to their instruments for one final tune, a hush fell over the freaks in attendance.

"I Wanna Ride You," a John Medeski original, concluded the trio's performance in typical MMW form. A gospel-influenced piece, the boys funked this one out until it was time for their big finish.

John Medeski took up his melodica (a hand-held mix between a harmonica and piano), Chris Wood removed the microphone from his upright, and Billy Martin picked up his cuica, a small drum. The three moved to the front of the stage and finished their tune completely acoustic; the crowd grew unfathomably quiet. A passage with an island vibe ensued, closed, and three of the world's most talented musicians were gone.

Riding home down Route 2, amidst a blizzard and decidedly hazardous driving conditions, all we wanted was a second set. MMW, one of the jazz world's most electrifying ensembles, will tour Japan in January. Mass. MoCA welcomes the Antibalas Afrobeat Orchestra early next year.

Keith Gordon directs poor remake of 'The Singing Detective' femme fatale in his mind.

Adrien Brody and Jon Polito are the resident wisecracking hoods, floating in and out of Dark's fever dream; Katie Holmes is the nurse who comes to represent everything good and pure in the Dark universe. For Dark, everything becomes a chaotic meld of noir, reality and '50s musical, with the cast lip-synching to hits of the decade.

"The Singing Detective" doesn't make a lick of sense, but it's not supposed to. It's meant to mirror the cracked, demented viewpoint of its troubled protagonist. But the original movie — unseen by this reviewer — was at least long enough to let Potter's unbridled imagination run wild.

This new version seems oddly compressed, as if it's being squished in a vice. The result is a movie oddly devoid of passion and poetry, a movie that is messy, unstructured and confused. It alternates between musical set pieces, baroquely overdone detective story passages, and real world, disease-of-the-week drama with a drunkenness that's off-putting in its disarray.

Gordon fails to bring any energy to this strange, supposedly madcap film. It seems that the movie's budget was mostly spent on its cast, as the production values seem leftover from the cheesiest of no-budget syndicated dramas. (Gordon can't even have his camera properly dissolve from scene to scene in this clumsy, visually flat movie.) Either Gordon doesn't have the flair or he doesn't have the budget, but whatever he lacks he can't realize his vision.

What he does have are the stars, even if he barely uses them. Holmes has a nothing role and Brody's hood never makes much sense to the screenplay. Mel Gibson, unrecognizable in Coke-bottle glasses and a bald cap, appears as a quirky shrink who helps Downey gain control of his emotional problems. But this flattened film needs the room to breathe because otherwise, it feels oddly rushed and forced.

In the end though, the scariest realization of all comes into play. This "Singing Detective" is nothing more than a daft version of one of those overcoming-the-odds dramas that populated TV since time immemorial, and its not even good

Super Patriots?

Off to the best start in franchise history, New England could be better than it was in 2001

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

FOXBORO — The New England Patriots would rather not be compared to the team that won the Super Bowl two years ago.

Truth is, they're better now than they were then.

At 11-2, the Patriots are off to the best start in franchise history. They have clinched a playoff berth with three games to go — two games sooner than ever before. And they have the inside track on the top seed in the AFC, meaning that any playoff games could be back in Foxboro where the snowy home-field advantage has been insurmountable.

"There's still a lot of football to be played. There are still a lot of challenges to be met," coach Bill Belichick said yesterday when talk of the Super Bowl season resurfaced. "Let's wait until everything's in, and maybe we can rank them then. But to rank one team halfway through against another team when they were halfway through, I don't know."

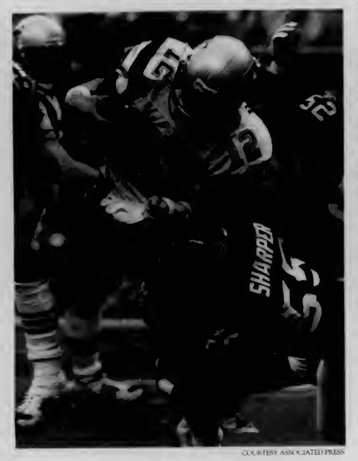
But the comparison is unavoidable.

When the Patriots won the Super Bowl after the 2001 season, they started 1-3, won four of their next five and then finished the regular season with a six game winning streak; three postseason victories made it nine in a row. This year, they started with a 31-0 stinker and improved to 2-2 before running off nine straight victories.

The latest came on Sunday when Tedy Bruschi intercepted Jay Fiedler's pass and returned it 5 yards for a touchdown to give New England a 12-0 victory over the Miami Dolphins and clinch the AFC East title for the Patriots. More than 45,000 fans braved a blizzard and sat in drifts of snow, celebrating the clincher by tossing fistfuls of snow into the air like crystalline confetti.

The Patriots have not given up a point at home in 10 quarters; the two straight home shutouts is a first for the franchise and two more than they had in their championship season. They have not given up a touchdown in their last four home games, and on average, they are allowing fewer points than two years ago and giving up fewer yards while gaining more themselves.

"When we won the Super Bowl, our offense wasn't stellar by any sense but we did enough to win," said quarterback Tom Brady, who surpassed the 3,000-yard plateau on Sunday. "All of us would like to do better and we are working at it.



"But I am proud of the guys. They have a lot of heart and a lot of fight. We find ways to win. And whether we need to drive down the field with hardly any time to score a touchdown, we figure out how to do that. And we hold the lead pretty well too."

They are also getting the requisite amount of luck: To Brady's famous tuck rule nonfumble in the '01-02 playoffs against Oakland, you can now add his pooch punt that settled in at the Miami 1 yardline and set up a game-clinching safety. And the requisite amount of weather karma: The image of Lonie Paxton doing snow angels on the field two years ago could be edged by the snow fireworks from Sunday.

New England has already earned the right to play one home playoff game, and it could win home-field advantage up to the Super Bowl with victories in its last three games. Since 1993, the Patriots are 12-2 in games played at 35 degrees or colder and 5-0 when snow is a factor.

And it doesn't seem to bother the fans, either.

"It was something I've never seen in my life," Patriots safety Rodney Harrison said, comparing the scene in the stands to the elaborate fountains of Las Vegas' Bellagio Hotel. "To see them out there, freezing for four hours like us. Guys really fed off of it. It gets you pumped."

Tiger PGA Player of the Year

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

THOUSAND OAKS, Calif. — A wild season in golf came to a familiar conclusion yesterday when Tiger Woods was voted PGA Tour Player of the Year for the fifth straight time, The Associated Press has learned.

The world's No. 1 player narrowly beat out Vijay Singh, said three sources close to Woods, speaking on condition they not be identified.

No one else has won the award more than twice since it began in 1990. Last month, Woods won the points-based award as PGA of America player of the year.

The PGA Tour planned an announcement at 6:30 p.m. EST. Tour officials have said they do not plan to release vote totals.

Despite not winning a major championship or the PGA Tour money title for the first time since 1998, Woods' peers decided he still had a better season than anyone else.

Woods led the PGA Tour with five victories, and he won the Vardon Trophy for having the lowest scoring average, at 68.41 his second-lowest ever.

Singh won four times and ended Woods' four-year reign atop the money list with $7.5 million in 27 tournaments, $900,000 more than Woods.

It was believed to be the closest vote since 1998, when Mark O'Meara and his two majors got the pick over David Duval and his four victories, the money title and the Vardon Trophy.

will be ready for us tomorrow."

For the Minutemen, other than filling holes in the backcourt, they will need to work hard under the basket, as the Blue Devils have two accomplished rebounders in Robinson and junior Rich Pittman. The duo combined for 36 total rebounds in the Blue Devils' first two games.

"Crash-the-glass rebounding is going to be a huge factor as it always is for us and that's where we have to really do a good job," Lappas said.

Junior captain Anthony Anderson will be vital to the Minuteman offense as he leads the team in scoring with 17.4 points per game.

Anderson was named Atlantic 10 Player of the Week after averaging 24.5 points per game against Vermont and Boston College, as well as scoring a career-high 29 points against Vermont. Anderson leads the A-10 in 3-pointers made (19) and is second in 3-point percentage (.514).

No Fiesta for Minutewomen

UMass splits weekend, takes second in Fiesta Bowl Classic

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

Turnovers are as costly as anything in the game of basketball, as they can completely swing momentum at any point in time. For the Massachusetts women's basketball team, it took only one weekend to see the results from both perspectives.

UMass	61
Utah St.	50
UMass	42
Arizona	74

Despite 20 turnovers, UMass managed a 61-50 win over Utah State Saturday. However, the Minutewomen (3-5) lost possession a season-high 28 times in the Fiesta Bowl Classic championship game against Arizona Sunday, and fell 74-42 at the McKale Center in Tuscon, Ariz.

The Wildcats (5-3) took advantage of the added chances, scoring 36 points off turnovers.

All-American candidate Shawntinice Polk and the No. 25 Wildcats were a much larger challenge for UMass coach Marnie Dacku and her players.

The UMass defense had no answer for Polk, who was named tournament MVP. The 6-foot-5-inch center posted 18 points, six rebounds and a pair of blocks Sunday. Junior guard Dee Dee Wheeler played a supporting role to Polk, finishing with 13 points, seven assists and three steals.

Arizona built a 14-point lead at 25-11 to open the game. At the 6:01 mark, the Minutewomen started their own run, scoring off two Zsedenyi 3-pointers and a Tatham free throw.

The lead was cut to seven points with 4:38 left until the 'Cats went on an 8-0 run, giving them a 33-18 at the break.

UMass was only able to hit 25 percent of its shots and committed 15 turnovers. 'Zona came out hot in the second half, building a 20-point lead just four minutes in.

Senior Glamora Maeweather led the way for UMass with a double-double on 13 points and 10 rebounds. Campbell, who was named to the all-tournament team, finished with nine points and nine boards.

Saturday. UMass won their third straight with the win over the Aggies, who are playing their first season since 1987.

The 20 Maroon and White turnovers were only nullified by the Aggies' 26. The difference was the same result as the 'Zona game: The team who scored the most points off turnovers won the game. UMass scored 32 points off the extra possessions while USU (0-3) only converted 12.

Campbell scored a game-high 19 points adding six rebounds and four assists.

Zsedenyi was on fire from behind the arc, nailing four of five attempts. The senior forward/guard finished with 14 points on 5-of-7 shooting.

In the first half, UMass set the tempo early, jumping out to 12-6 lead behind two Zsedenyi 3-balls.

The Aggies answered back with a 6-0 run, tying the game at the 14:48 mark. The game remained a struggle until the Minutewomen closed out the half with an 18-5 run, gaining a 39-27 lead — their highest first-half output this year.

Zsedenyi had eight points in only six minutes due to foul trouble, while freshman center Tamara Tatham scored all 10 of her points by half.

Neither team could get anything going early in the second half. Zsedenyi's 3-pointer at the 12:38 mark was the first score by UMass in the second half. The extended delay was not a problem as Utah State only scored four points in the stretch. Campbell's layup at the 5:59 mark gave the Minutewomen a 20-point lead.

Deadline for A-Rod

By Stephen Hawkins
Associated Press

ARLINGTON, Texas — The Boston Red Sox have about a week to close a trade for Alex Rodriguez.

Texas general manager John Hart would like to know by the end of the winter meetings on Dec. 16 whether the American League MVP would remain with the Rangers for next season. The Rangers have been discussing a trade that would send him to the Red Sox for Manny Ramirez.

"As long as this potentially is alive, it precludes us from having a road map of what we can do with anybody else," Hart said Sunday. "The sooner we have a resolvement, the better."

The deal would be a swap of baseball's only $20 million-a-year players. In a sign of how extraordinary the situation is, commissioner Bud Selig is allowing the Red Sox to speak directly with Rodriguez. In most situations, a tentative trade must be in place before baseball grants a window for a team to speak with a player under contract to another club.

"To the extent that it happened, the commissioner has approved it," said Sandy Alderson, executive vice president of baseball operations in the commissioner's office.

Asked whether he had granted permission, Selig declined comment.

The Boston Herald, citing unidentified sources, first reported Saturday that Red Sox owner John Henry had spoken to Rodriguez. Rangers owner Tom Hicks told the Fort Worth Star-Telegram that Rodriguez was allowed to meet with Henry more than a week ago.

"It was more of a get-acquainted meeting," Hicks was quoted as saying.

Rodriguez's agent, Scott Boras, said no meeting had been scheduled.

The Red Sox refused to confirm or deny the possibility of a trade.

Rodriguez agreed in December 2000 to a record $252 million, 10-year contract with Texas. Ramirez and the Red Sox agreed the same day to a $160 million, eight-year deal.

Hart said Sunday, after the Rangers refused salary arbitration for Rafael Palmeiro and Juan Gonzalez, that the team was preparing to move forward with A-Rod at shortstop and is "very excited" about that.

"I recognize that a lot of things can change, a lot of dynamics in the next week that could take us through the winter meetings," Hart said. "But to this point, there has been little or no contact with any clubs regarding Alex."

Rodriguez led the majors in homers his first two seasons with Texas, and hit an AL-high 47 last season with 118 RBIs. Ramirez had at least 33 homers and 104 RBIs in each of his three seasons in Boston.

Hart said he hadn't spoken directly to Rodriguez, but had several conversations with Boras, about the shortstop and other players.

He said there wasn't much to discuss about a possible trade at this point.

"This has been a lot built up over very little," he said.

If the trade happens, it would likely leave Red Sox shortstop Nomar Garciaparra on the outside looking in. Garciaparra, who has one year and $11.5 million remaining on his seven-year contract, rejected a proposed contract extension last spring but says he wants to stay in Boston.

His agent, Arn Tellem, told The Boston Globe that the talks between the Red Sox and Rangers are a "slap in the face" to his client.

Garciaparra told the Boston Herald that he's happy in Boston, but declined to comment on the possibility of a trade bringing Rodriguez to the Red Sox.

"My heart and my first option have always been (with Boston) and it hasn't strayed from that," said Garciaparra. "The ball's really in management's court. But if there is any question about my unhappiness, that's been answered."

Meanwhile, the Red Sox agreed to a minor league contract with outfielder Dave McCarty, who was invited to spring training. He would get a $500,000, one-year contract if he is added to the major league roster.

John Burkett, Bill Haselman, Todd Jones, Robert Person, Jeff Suppan and Todd Walker were not offered arbitration and can't re-sign until May 1."

UM heads to Mohegan Sun

Minutemen look to rebound against CCSU

By Becky Horowitz
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's basketball team will have to rely on its youth and depth in tonight's game against Central Connecticut State (1-1) at the Mohegan Sun Arena. Due to injury, the Minutemen's backcourt depth has been cut from four players to three.

UMass (2-3) will play without freshman guard Art Bowers, who went down with an ankle injury in Saturday's game at BC just 12 minutes in. UMass coach Steve Lappas will have to rely on freshman Maurice Maxwell to fill Bowers' starting spot.

"He's hurt, bad," Lappas said. "It's a bad sprain. A bad sprain could take anywhere from two weeks to a month, six weeks.

Honestly we won't know for a while. It's very swollen, he can't move. Missing Artie Bowers has more of an effect from a basketball standpoint then it does from a mental standpoint."

Although Lappas knows that the way his team plays tonight will be altered because of Bowers' absence, he's hoping the rest of his backcourt will be able to step up and fill the holes.

"[Chris] Chadwick and Brennan [Martin] are the two guys on the bench from the perimeter so they both have to play significant minutes," Lappas said.

In the chance that Lappas needs another player to fill the guard spot, he'll look to sophomore Jeff Viggiano to step up and play the shooting guard.

In addition, the Maroon and White will look to use the knowledge of assistant coach Pat Sellers to their advantage. Sellers is a CCSU graduate, and has spent the last four seasons on the Central Connecticut sidelines, where among other things, he was in charge of recruitment.

"Obviously Pat knows them well, he recruited all the kids there, including the new kids," Lappas said. "They've only played two games, they've got three, four new kids that haven't played that much or they've only played two games so you don't really know what they are. Pat at least gives you an idea of what they were recruited as and what they're supposed to be."

Sellers' knowledge becomes especially important when it comes to guarding senior forward Ron Robinson. Sellers can give the UMass big men some insight into the best ways to shut down Robinson.

"That's going to be important," Lappas said. "He's a really good player, he's averaging 16 points a game right now so we have to do a good job on [him].

Robinson is their focus offensively, they've only played two games so it's hard to really tell what they are right now being one and one, but they're going to be a formidable test for us."

Because UMass' zone defense was highly effective against BC, they will use it again tonight to both keep players out of foul trouble and spread the floor.

"We had decided early in October when we were having our meetings that we needed to play more zone this year because of our depth," Lappas said. "Our depth is going to be tested even more [tonight], so I would think that we're going to have to definitely play some zone.

Our zone is pretty good. We spent a lot of time on it lately, so it

Indoor takes first in Boston

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Snow, bad roads and limited rest seemed to have no effect on the Massachusetts women's indoor track team, as they cruised to a first-place finish with 59 points in a meet against Boston University and Maine Saturday afternoon in Boston.

The Black Bears finished the day with 58 points, while the Terriers settled for last place with 34 points.

The other three teams scheduled to appear at the meet — New Hampshire, Providence and Central Connecticut State — were unable to show up due to the snowstorm.

"[Overall] I was very pleased with the win," said coach Julie LaFreniere. "They've been working hard all fall, and I wanted to see the fruits of their labor pay off, so I'm glad the meet wasn't canceled.

Everything worked out well. They got the meet in, they got back on the road, and they got back home safely."

Junior Christina Huff had the best performance of the day for the Minutewomen, taking home first place in the 55-yard and 200-meter dashes with times of 7.26 and 25.58, respectively, and anchoring the second-place 4x400 UMass relay team.

Because of the small amount of athletes participating in the meet, Huff literally had no time to rest between the back-to-back events, as there were fewer heats for each individual race.

Freshman Troyanah Evans and senior Kishana Hudson complimented the effort in the 55-meter dash with times of 7.51 and 7.54, respectively, to give UMass a 1-2-3 sweep in the event.

Evans also placed third in the 200-meter dash and tied for fourth in the long jump with Minutewoman senior Chante Soares to round out a remarkable indoor track debut for the Minutewoman.

"[Evans] seemed a little nervous when she first got out there, but she pulled it together and did a nice job," LaFreniere said.

Senior Kyanna Stallings and senior Staceann Brown went 2-3 in the 400-meter dash with respective times of 1:02.04 and 1:02.50.

Senior Kate Markopoulos placed third in the mile run with a personal-best time of 5:11.89, and came back to help the 4x400 team finish in second.

The Minutewomen went 1-2 in the 500-meter dash on efforts from sophomore Elizabeth Budd (1:19.49) and senior Shannon Jackson (1:20.03).

Maine's Shira Panelli led for the majority of the race, but the Maroon and White pair stormed by her in the end to win the race.

"Neither [Budd nor Jackson] really knew how to run the 500-meter," LaFreniere said.

"They are more 400 runners, I think that extra hundred threw them off a bit, mentally ... they got the job done, and now they got that good experience under their belt."

Jackson also won the 55-meter hurdles and was the third leg in the 4x400, rounding out a stellar performance on the day in which she too, like Huff, barely had time to catch her breath in between events.

"I really liked [her effort]," LaFreniere said. "She's very competitive, and even though she was very tired, she went back out in the 4x400 and came back really strong and really helped us out in an overall sense."

Senior Kristen Ford finished highest in the 800-meter for the Minutewomen with a third-place time of 2:19.45.

Tricia Silva led the way in the 3,000-meter with a first-place time of 10:48.84.

Silva fell behind early in the race, but the closely-trailing junior Amanda Dahlberg stayed right on Black Bear Charlotte Howley's shoulder to allow Silva to regain the lead in the end. Dahlberg finished third with 10:52.71.

"Amanda is much quicker already at the first meet," LaFreniere said. "She's picked up right where she left off last season.

"I was very pleased."

Freshman Melissa Oliveira made sure her collegiate debut counted with a remarkable series in the shot put, finishing second with a throw of 11.92 meters.

Junior Jen Iasello won the event with a throw of 13.89 meters.

Rani Varghese instructs students on violence prevention during a workshop in the Campus Center last night.

Violence prevention examined

By Matt Elder

A pair of University Health Services employees led a workshop yesterday on relationship violence, saying that most of the violence that occurs goes unseen by those not directly involved.

Rani Varghese and Yeshi Chodon, a doctoral student at UMass who also works for UHS, led a workshop yesterday to educate students on the prevention of domestic violence among Asian American women. The workshop was sponsored by Sigma Psi Zeta sorority.

The workshop started with an exercise that showed everyone that each participant knows someone who has been involved in a violent relationship.

The group came up with different types of violence in relationships that included emotional, physical and sexual.

"A lot of time when people think of violence, they think of physical violence," Varghese said. She said that we only see a little of it.

Oftentimes relationship violence includes a difficult history of incidents leading up to a particular violent act, she said.

"A lot of the time, you don't see what has built up to the violence," said Angel Wou, a sophomore.

"Relationship violence doesn't just happen," Varghese said.

The group was given a fictional situation in which they viewed a woman being assaulted, and they each talked about how they would respond to the event.

"You can't help them unless they see the problem," said Kathy Lee, a junior, about relationship violence.

Participants in the workshop came up with different ways to interfere with the situation. People came up with ideas such as calling the police, getting a friend to get involved or them getting involved themselves.

"I think a lot of Asian women are taught not to talk back to people," said freshman Meg Her.

While some people disagreed with this, the group in whole thought it was true.

Asians live with the stereotype of being quiet and not speaking to people, various people said. One girl said that Asians as a group don't talk about their problems.

Lee said that a lot of Asian families are raised in a more aggressive environment, with spankings being common. She also said that she thought this behavior might bleed into relationships years later.

Varghese said that how Asians are viewed is something she calls, "The model minority." Asians are viewed as such, she said, because people think all Asians are successful and have nice jobs and cars.

She said that this view is only a small cross section of the community.

"You're supposed to be on top because you're Asian," Chodon said about the way people view Asians in general.

The group thought that there was a connection between drinking and violence. Varghese said that this give an opportunity to victim blame.

Members of the sorority discussed different situations in which one person has gotten drunk and another has taken advantage of them. This is more prevalent with women, they said.

Both Varghese and Chodon are trained as Voices Against Violence educators.

Student's condition upgraded to serious

By Erika Lovley

The condition of a University of Massachusetts student who fell from the third story bathroom window of MacKimmie dorm in Southwest residential area has been upgraded from critical to serious.

Freshman Kunal Malhotra, 18, is being cared for at UMass Medical Center in Worcester, with broken bones in his arms, legs, and a fractured skull. He is a resident of John Adams dorm.

"[Malhotra] was in critical condition for a day or so. From what I know, he's improving. I believe he damaged both of his arms and legs. He also damaged his face," said Chris Malhotra, Kunal's brother, a Virginia Tech student.

"The case is being considered a medical emergency right now," said UMass Police Department Deputy Police Chief Patrick Archbald. "There were very severe head injuries and apparent broken bones. There was labored breathing upon the officer's arrival."

Malhotra fell about 32 feet from the ledge of a bathroom window, striking a concrete platform on the first story, located between the overhang over the MacKimmie building near the building's rear entrance.

"We don't know when he'll be back [home] right now. He needs [to undergo] the necessary surgeries. We don't know when he'll be able to be moved from there," said Malhotra. "At this point, we are all concerned about Kunal and his health. If there is any other information regarding foul play, I'm sure the UMPD will find that out in their investigation."

Malhotra's parents are residents of Fairfax, V.A., and were unavailable for comment.

Initial reports stated that Malhotra was standing on the bathroom window ledge on the outside of the building for a period of time, but was encouraged by other students to come back inside. Malhotra apparently returned from the ledge, but then proceeded to climb back through the window. Reports indicate that it was at this time that he fell.

"We are investigating exactly what he was attempting to do, why he was on the ledge, and [possible] attempts he was making to go to the other window just to the east of him. We believe he was trying to get from one window to the other," Archbald said.

"We are working to find out what the intent was. There was no indication that he was trying to harm himself," he added.

According to the UMPD, Malhotra was present at a gathering before the accident occurred.

"We are not sure whether alcohol was involved. We are not ready to say whether or not that was a factor," Archbald said.

"I'd be very surprised if there were drugs involved. Kunal is a very upstanding, responsible kid," his brother said. "Kunal has never had an accident of this magnitude. I don't think he's ever sprained an ankle or broken bones. He's a pretty healthy kid."

Dr. Harry Rockland-Miller, a clinical psychologist and director of mental health at UMass Health Services, said that mental health services is capable of providing short-term, long-term and 24-hour therapy, as well as crisis intervention and group therapy for students who witnessed or were affected by Malhotra's accident.

"[Initial reactions] can vary. Some experience shock, numbness and anger. If they have prior trauma history, they can experience flashbacks or guilt," Rockland-Miller said. "This would be classified as a type of trauma."

Although Rockland-Miller was not able to release direct information regarding the treatment of involved students due to confidentiality reasons, he was able to give examples of possible treatment methods.

"When someone has witnessed something traumatic, or if there is shared trauma, such as on a residence hall, we might respond in a group way," he said.

This approach would include debriefing, the sharing of information, talking about the event, discussing the normal human response to trauma and seeking help through available resources on campus in a group setting.

"We have follow-ups with individual therapies. This is why we have 24-hour therapy available for situations like this," said Rockland-Miller.

According to Rockland-Miller, the warning signs that someone is having trouble coping with a traumatic event can appear long after the normal grieving period is over.

"Eating or sleeping patterns may be off, and drinking or drug habits may change. These are signs that need attention," said Rockland-Miller.

Mental health services is working with the University to account for the needs of all of Malhotra's friends and witnesses of his accident.

"When something like this happens, we are generally called on the scene that day or the next. Both mental health services, health service, residential life offices, the Dean of Students office and faculty mentors are all available for students who need support," said Rockland-Miller.

Hosts program promotes networking

By Jenna Corman
Collegian Correspondent

Chancellor John V. Lombardi is encouraging student involvement in a community outreach program for next year.

The Chancellor's Personal Hosts program allows students to meet and greet important visitors at University functions. The program promotes networking opportunities with visitors and alumni. Each student host is eligible for a personal recommendation from the Chancellor for future experiences he/she applies for.

"The Hosts program provides the campus with a group of students who can serve as participants and hosts at a wide range of events where we engage significant visitors from off campus. Usually, these are donor events, or events for legislators or trustees or alumni leadership. Because many of these people from outside our campus do not have frequent opportunities to see our students, we use the Hosts to give them a sense of the quality of the people who make up our student body," said Lombardi.

Hosts go through a training process, primarily with the Chancellor and his wife Cathryn. They meet at Hillside and go over expectations, event etiquette and prepare students for their job as hosts. Students in the program join the Chancellor at his home and other venues on campus for these events.

Joseph Corso, Director of Protocol, said student hosts are present at "all home football and basketball games; luncheons, dinners and receptions at Hillside; Commencement; Homecoming; Family Day; and other special on-campus events."

The Host program does a service for both the University and for students.

"For the Hosts, it is an opportunity to learn how to work with groups and individuals in these social settings, skills that will later on serve them well in their careers," Lombardi said.

"The Chancellor's Hosts Program allows students to enhance their UMass Amherst academic experience by serving as student representatives at social events, which provides a transition from the classroom to the social world of academia," said Corso.

Chancellor Lombardi brought the program to UMass in 2002 after having success with it at the University of Florida. Those who participate as Chancellor's Personal Hosts are also members of the Student Alumni Relations Society, better known as STARS. Members of STARS are eligible to apply to be a Host after being a member for at least one semester, having sophomore or above standing and possessing a mini-

Boston buys Canadian prescriptions

By Karen Testa
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — The city of Boston and the state of New Hampshire announced yesterday they will begin buying prescription drugs from Canada, jumping to the forefront of the growing but illegal movement to take advantage of lower prices across the border.

New Hampshire would become the first state to turn to Canada for drugs, and Boston would become only the second U.S. city — after Springfield, about 90 miles west.

"It's illegal, but it's about time we forced the issue," said Mayor Thomas M. Menino, a Democrat. "Why is the consumer the only one to pay full price for prescription drugs?"

The mayor said Boston will begin buying prescription drugs this summer for about 7,000 city employees and retirees.

New Hampshire Gov. Craig Benson said the state will begin buying medicines for prison inmates and Medicaid recipients as soon as possible. His spokesman would not be more specific on when it would start.

"It's time we stood up as a state and did the right thing and allowed citizens to purchase drugs from the most affordable supplier," said Benson, a Republican.

The Boston and New Hampshire plans were announced a day after President Bush signed the Medicare prescription drug bill, which forbids reimportation of Canadian drugs unless the U.S. Health and Human Services Department certifies their safety. So far, the department has refused to do so.

The Food and Drug Administration reiterated its warnings yesterday against any importation of drugs.

"For the mayor of Boston or anyone else to presume that they can make drugs safe simply by saying they are safe is extremely risky behavior," said Peter Pitts, FDA's associate commissioner for external affairs. "The public servants of Boston deserve better than a gimmick."

Money to be saved on Canadian drugs

Menino, past president of the U.S. Conference of Mayors, said he wants to meet with FDA head Mark McClellan and Tommy Thompson, secretary of health and human Services, to seek help in making the process safe and legal.

Under the New Hampshire governor's plan, the state prison system would save money on nine of 10 drugs most commonly prescribed for inmates. The state also will buy Medicaid drugs from Canada when the Canadian price is lower than the state's usual share of the Medicaid cost.

The state will also post a Web site within 10 days providing links to Canadian pharmacies where any New Hampshire resident can get a prescription filled. The pharmacies will be approved as safe by the state, Benson said.

Boston's 15,000 employees and retirees have drug costs covered in two ways: through outside health plans, or directly by the city. The second group, about 7,000 people who are mostly retirees, will have the option of buying from Canada.

The program would cut about $1 million each year from the city's $61 million prescription drug bill, according to city estimates.

Wanda Moebius, a spokeswoman for the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, said municipal leaders would do better to tell employees about programs for people who cannot afford prescription drugs.

"People's safety shouldn't take a back seat to savings," she said. "There are probably ways to save money, through competitively bid pharmaceutical benefit managers that don't open up the risks that importation does."

Menino said the program would be kept small at first, to ensure safety.

Outgoing Springfield Mayor Michael Albano, who has traveled widely to tout his city's importation plan, said Menino's move will force the FDA to take notice. Though importing drugs from Canada is illegal, the FDA has not tried to stop Springfield.

Albano said he expects the move to "send shockwaves across the country."

"I think the timing of it speaks volumes," said Albano, a Democrat. "It tells me that bill meant nothing to those of us who are looking for relief."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., appearing with Menino at an unrelated event yesterday, said he supports the mayor's plan.

Gay marriage debated

BOSTON (AP) — National and state conservative organizations began a two-day strategy meeting in Boston on yesterday to chart their response to a recent high court decision that could lead to America's first gay marriages.

"We're obviously very concerned about what's happened with the issue of marriage in Massachusetts and we're here gauging the temperature," said Genevieve Wood, vice president for communications at the Family Research Council, a Washington-based conservative organization.

Also in attendance at the meeting were representatives from Focus on the Family, another national organization dedicated to conservative issues, the Massachusetts Catholic Conference, the Massachusetts-based Center for Marriage Law, and the Massachusetts Family Institute, which organized the meeting.

Wood said no decisions had been made about strategy or how much money would be spent to convince the public and lawmakers to take actions against gay marriage.

The House and Senate is scheduled to meet in February to vote on a constitutional amendment that would define marriage as a union between one man and one woman.

Under the Supreme Judicial Court decision, issued Nov. 18, gay marriage could become legal in mid-May, after the expiration of a 180-day court-ordered waiting period designed to give the Legislature time to act.

Lawmakers are considering legislation that would give gay couples all the benefits of marriage without the title. House Speaker Thomas Finneran, D-Boston, has said it is also possible that the Legislature will take no action.

Bush rejects nuclear weapon offer

By Soo-Jeong Lee
Associated Press

SEOUL, South Korea (AP) — North Korea announced yesterday it would freeze its nuclear weapons projects in return for the United States providing energy aid and removing Pyongyang from a list of countries that sponsor terrorism. President Bush rejected the offer.

The North's terms amounted to a response to a plan offered a day earlier by the United States, Japan and South Korea for ending the standoff over the communist state's nuclear weapons program.

Bush's statement, and similar remarks by White House and State Department spokesmen, appeared part of jockeying for position in advance of another round of talks with North Korea. The impoverished North has often tried to use the nuclear confrontation as a means to win economic aid and diplomatic recognition.

While Washington and its allies have sought the dismantling of North Korea's nuclear programs, yesterday's proposal from Pyongyang offered only to "freeze" them as a first step. The North added, however, that the long-term goal is to "denuclearize the Korean peninsula."

"The goal of the United States is not for a freeze of the nuclear program," Bush said. "The goal is to dismantle a nuclear weapons program in a verifiable and irreversible way."

"That," he said, "is the clear message we are sending to the North Koreans."

The president spoke at a brief news conference with Premier Wen Jiabao of China, who visited Bush at the White House. The Chinese are working to revive stalled talks between North Korea and the United States, South Korea, Japan, Russia and China after a five-month pause.

According to a senior U.S. official, China has a sense of progress toward setting up new talks but does not believe the point has been reached yet.

Bush and Wen did not take up North Korea's latest overture, said the official, speaking on condition of anonymity.

"We spent a lot of time talking about North Korea here," Bush said after his meeting with Wen. "We share a mutual goal, and that is for the Korean peninsula to be nuclear weapons-free."

The president said the United States would keep working with China and the other countries in the six-party talks "to resolve this issue peacefully."

Details of the U.S.-backed proposal are unclear, but South Korean officials say it calls for "coordinated steps." Media reports say it seeks agreement on three principles: a peaceful solution to the nuclear crisis; a complete, verifiable and irrevocable dismantling of North Korea's nuclear program, and security assurances for North Korea.

A spokesman for North Korea's Foreign Ministry on yesterday called the proposal "greatly disappointing," because its aim is to "completely eliminate our nuclear deterrent force by giving just a piece of paper called 'written security assurances,'" which is "no more than a commitment."

Instead, North Korea proposed freezing its nuclear activities in exchange for "measures such as the U.S. de-listing the DPRK as a 'terrorism sponsor,' lift of the political, economic and military sanctions and blockade, and energy aid, including the supply of heavy fuel oil and electricity by the U.S. and neighboring countries," the spokesman was quoted as saying by North Korea's official news agency, KCNA.

DPRK stand for Democratic Peoples Republic of Korea, North Korea's official name.

"This would lay a foundation for furthering the six-way talks," the spokesman said. "What is clear is that in no case would the DPRK freeze its nuclear activities unless it is rewarded."

During a first round of six-way talks, held in August in Beijing, North Korea recommended a package deal in which each side takes four steps.

Under its initial proposal, North Korea would declare its willingness to give up nuclear development, allow nuclear inspections, give up missiles exports and finally dismantle its nuclear weapons facilities. In return, it demanded economic and humanitarian aid, security assurances, diplomatic ties and new power plants.

mum 3.0 GPA.

The Associate Director for Student and Parent Programs and Advisor to the Chancellor's Personal Hosts, Melissa Vara, said that the program was brought to STARS because the members are diverse and come from various majors, interests and backgrounds.

Those interested in joining STARS can attend any of its general meetings held every other Wednesday. Members interested in joining the Hosts program must apply the spring before they hope to participate. The program aims to accept 20 student hosts.

UMass junior and Chancellor's Personal Host participant Mandy Murray said, "The CPH program allows University students to meet influential people from the UMass system and Massachusetts as well. For me, it's a great way to make contacts for after college. For the University as a whole, the students involved in the program are good examples of the kind of people we have at UMass and show VIPs and beneficiaries of UMass that not all students who go here are malcontents who riot at the slightest provocation."

"It is our experience that visitors who have an opportunity to engage one of our Chancellor's Hosts leave the campus with a strong sense that this is a place of terrific students doing interesting things for the University. Nothing shows off our campus better than our students, and that is the premise of the Chancellor's Hosts Program," Lombardi said.

PROGRAM SUMMARY:
Recent reports from the Institute of Medicine and the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism confirm that colleges and universities can best grapple with substance use problems on campus by working with community partners to change the environment in which students make decisions about drinking and other drug use. Working from these reports, Dr. William DeJong will describe the environmental management approach to prevention, recent controversies over social norms marketing, and the need to concentrate on evidence-based strategies.
WILLIAM DEJONG, PH.D., a Professor of Social and Behavioral Sciences at the Boston University School of Public Health, is the project director for the U.S. Department of Education Higher Education Center. In addition, Dr. DeJong serves as principal investigator for the Social Norms Marketing Research Project, which is also based at Education Development Center, Inc.

Student feared dead

By Dave Kolpak and Curt Woodward
Associated Press

GRAND FORKS, N.D. (AP) — Missing college student Dru Sjodin is probably dead, the sheriff said Tuesday in confirming that preliminary DNA tests found Sjodin's blood in the car of the man suspected of kidnapping her.

"I certainly hate to be discouraging to the family or anyone, but it looks to me now that it's more of a recovery mission than a rescue," Grand Forks County Sheriff Dan Hill said.

In an interview with The Associated Press, Hill also revealed searchers found a shoe belonging to the University of North Dakota student near the Red Lake River after she disappeared. Divers have searched the river thoroughly, and don't believe the body is there, he said.

The shoe, identified by a college roommate of the 22-year-old Sjodin, is the only piece of clothing recovered so far, Hill said.

Sjodin's mother, Linda Walker, said family members were "outraged" by Hill's assessment. "Our family remains confident that Dru will be found," Walker said. "She is waiting for us."

Sjodin (pronounced sha DEEN) was last heard from Nov. 22, calling her boyfriend on a cell-phone from the parking lot of a Grand Forks mall where she worked at a Victoria's Secret.

An affidavit unsealed later Tuesday had only one new piece of information: Suspect Alfonso Rodriguez, Jr.'s account of his whereabouts at the time Sjodin disappeared. According to the affidavit, Rodriguez told police he had been at the mall watching a movie, "Once Upon a Time in Mexico" at about 7 p.m. that night. Police said the movie wasn't being shown at any theater near the mall that day.

The preliminary DNA match would be the most significant break yet in the attempt by authorities to tie Rodriguez, a convicted rapist, to Sjodin's disappearance. Hill said investigators tested blood from Rodriguez's car against DNA taken from Sjodin's toothbrush. Hill described the blood in the car as a small amount.

Hill also confirmed a media report that the interior of Rodriguez's car and its trunk had been extensively cleaned before his arrest.

Rodriguez, 50, has been charged with Sjodin's kidnapping. He has said through his attorney that he is innocent.

The Associated Press reported Monday that a knife was discovered in the trunk of Rodriguez's car, and later reported that a sheath found near Sjodin's car matched the knife.

Sjodin's father said Monday he was dismayed to find that police recovered a knife from Rodriguez's car. But given his criminal past, he said he was not surprised.

"You know what? It's probably true," Allan Sjodin said. "That's his modus operandi."

Rodriguez has a history of attempted kidnapping with adult women, and has used a weapon in at least one assault. Rodriguez was released from a Minnesota prison in May after serving 25 years for an attempted abduction in 1979.

EDITORIAL OPINION

Silencing student voices is unacceptable

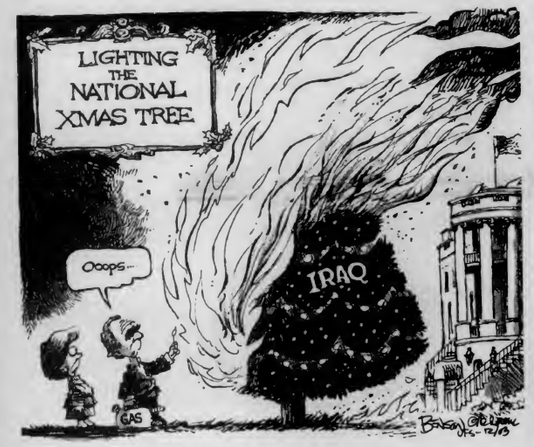
Lately there has been a lot of discussion about the restriction of our rights by government policies like the USA PATRIOT Act, but the one thing that has never been threatened is our freedom to speak out and criticize those policies that we deem unacceptable. That right is now being threatened.

Right here in Massachusetts, the students of Salem High School are being prohibited from voicing their opinions.

The most recent edition of "Witches Brew," the high school's student newspaper has not been printed. It has not been printed because the school's principal, Ann Papagiotas, has a problem with some of the editorials that were slated to be part of the issue.

There are three articles in question, student-written editorials that criticized some recent changes in the school's policies — things such as wearing hats and eating in class. One describes a lack of school spirit and criticizes the administration for not giving the students somewhere to go with their problems.

At first, Principal Papagiotas asked that a few changes be made to the editorials before they were permitted to run. The changes included providing some explanation from the administration's point of view for the recent changes. The students reluctantly agreed, and were surprised when the principal still would not allow the paper to go to print. Unfortunately, Herb Levine, the superintendent, is supporting Papagiotas in her decision. According to the Boston Globe, Levine referred to some students' opinions as "disruption or disorder," claiming that it can start controversy. Last time we checked, freedom of speech was about having the right to start controversy in the instances where controversy is the only way to bring about change.



Todd Graham, an editor of the paper and senior at Salem High, gave the Globe his opinion on the matter. "It's the student view. It's our voice, and this is what the paper is meant to be," he said.

Todd is absolutely right.

We, at the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, especially as fellow student journalists, think that restriction of freedom of speech in any form is completely unacceptable. High school students have just as much right to express their opinions as any other citizens of the United States. Any infringement upon that right should not be tolerated, particularly by school administrators who are supposed encourage students to think for themselves so that they can survive in the real world. We can only hope that this issue will be resolved in the only appropriate way, with the publication of the student's editorials in their original form.

However, if the students of Salem High School find that "Witches Brew" still refuses to allow free speech, we extend the invitation that they can certainly find it here, on the pages of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian. If they would like the chance to have their opinion on the subject heard, in an unrestricted arena, we would be more than happy to provide them with the right that their own paper would not. Even if they choose not to accept the invitation, we wish these students luck in their battle against the oppressive force that is their school administration.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

We, the people

Yousef Munayyer

"We, the people." Do you ever think about that? These first three words of the document that is the cornerstone of the American republic signify unity, democracy and a collective respect of the rights of man.

We, the people, of the United States of America, live in a society that is supposed to be free from oppression and has guaranteed rights. These rights were so important that the founders of this nation refused to compromise on the Constitution unless these rights were specifically spelled out and guaranteed to every citizen in the nation.

We, the people, work, study and live in a nation that is at the peak of world power. The leader of the free world and the beacon of "democracy."

We, the people, listened to Gov. George W. Bush, at the time of the second presidential debate in Michigan, speak out against the use of "secret evidence." It was these stances that lead the American Muslim Political Action Coalition to endorse Bush that year. Ironic isn't it?

We, the people, have been lied to.

We, the people, have been given rights and had them taken away.

We, the people, are being spied on.

We, the people, don't seem to care.

Do we care? That is the question. When the government passes legislation to strengthen the powers of the Justice Department to the point where just cause is thrown out the window, can we stand aside and say nothing?

Many congressmen admit they didn't even read most of the USA PATRIOT Act. Were they acting in the interest of "we, the people"?

The USA PATRIOT Act, TIA (Total Information Awareness), PATRIOT ACT II and the general attitude of those in power, with regards to our civil liberties and rights, is appalling.

When you use your credit card, write an e-mail, check out a library book or write a column for the paper, do not doubt that the government may be watching. These acts, which tear apart the fabric of this republic, allow for government agencies, like the FBI, to spy on you without reasonable cause or just suspicion.

Let's say you write a letter to the editor criticizing the government. Or maybe you buy a book at a local bookstore about the history of American foreign policy. Maybe you spend too much time or money at the wrong restaurant or coffee shop. Maybe you pray at a mosque. If you do any of these things, the aforementioned legislation empowers the spying to begin. Whether you are an American citizen or not, pay your taxes or not, say the pledge or not, live in Texas or not, you have just fallen under the crosshairs of the Justice Department and any rights you thought you had went out the window.

We, the people, have been lied to. We, the people, have been given rights and had them taken away. We, the peole, are being spied on. We, the people, don't seem to care.

Does this sound like the "land of the free" to you?

The President of the United States addressed the nation and the world after 9/11 and said that we were attacked by terrorists who hate our freedoms. If there is any truth to this, I ask, why is it that this administration has initiated the greatest onslaught on our personal freedoms in the history of this nation? If it is truly our freedoms they are jealous of and want to attack, aren't we letting them win by putting "we, the people" under Big Brother's microscope?

Many people come to this nation because they do not enjoy these liberties elsewhere and the United States has built a reputation across the globe, particularly in the 20th century, of being a nation that would accept refugees who were fleeing authoritarian regimes. Now, here in the United States, those who thought they would be free are once again the center of suspicion.

When talking about this issue, many tend to quote Benjamin Franklin because he rightly said: "They that can give up essential liberty to obtain a little temporary safety deserve neither liberty nor safety." This speaks to the very heart of the matter at hand. We, the people, in our silence, are watching the liberties, which were once actually fought for, slip away.

The talking heads will tell you that our troops are overseas fighting to defend our freedom. Yet al-Qaeda isn't the group who is tearing the Bill of Rights into shreds.

Franklin made an even more pertinent comment. Upon the completion of the Constitution, when asked what he thought, he responded: "It's a republic if we can keep it."

What do you see when you look at the American flag? I try to think about the founding of this nation, about those who fought to establish a republic that would set a standard for centuries, and about the rights that citizens have here.

What does it mean to be American? What does it mean to be part of "we, the people?" It means opposing any attack on our personal freedoms. It means it is your duty to speak out against the destruction of our rights. It means reminding the nation that "inalienable" rights are just that: rights that cannot be taken away from men. It means standing in opposition to legislation like the USA PATRIOT Act. It means believing that this is your republic and it is your job to "keep it."

Most importantly it means it's time to stand together as "we, the people" so that we will never become "we, the prisoners."

Beans, beans the magical fruit

Ben Feder

All right, it's time for some hard-hitting journalism. It's observational reporting at its finest, and nobody else is talking about it. What I'm referring to is the phenomenon of passing gas.

This ailment is a social malady, affecting physical and emotional bonds between people. I went into sleuth mode to uncover who cuts the cheese and what we tend to do to hide our dirty little secrets.

Now there are many ways for someone to break wind, each with their own set of rules and reactions depending on the time and place of the occurrence. Foremost is the infamous classroom fart. The usual culprit for one of these is almost always a guy. People our age have the tendency to always blame the male, especially in environments with people packed tightly together. Even when a female is the guilty person, she is most likely going to find a guy scapegoat in her near vicinity. (Some guys don't even believe in the existence of the female poot. It's as if there is a gas gene that only resides in the Y-chromosome.)

What happens once someone releases one of these stink bombs is a battle between sheer willpower and the gas cloud residing underneath their derriere. The person immediately forces all their weight downward to trap the vagrant vapor as if gravity will somehow focus itself tenfold on that one individual for this one brief moment in hopes to squash it out of existence.

Once 10 minutes have passed, the person will lighten up his load, whether shifting his weight or spreading their legs slightly; he lets down his guard. This is when the classroom stink will strike. At first it shoots straight upward so that its creator will smell it first. Panicky, the person prays that it will continue upward over his classmates' heads, so that an invisible mushroom cloud looms above while a column of stench exists only in the person's seat.

Soon, his neighbors sniff it, and a look of extreme discomfort takes over as they squirm in their seats, searching out the perpetrator. To the horror of the farter, he immediately mimics the actions of his victims. With the same look of disgust, he glances around as if suddenly hit by the odor. What this person is really looking for is the one individual who isn't reacting, showing visibly that they don't smell anything. This is the culprit's scapegoat. He immediately points out this individual to his neighbors, shifting the blame, saving himself for social exile.

The next kind of beef is one of infamous design. This mischievous gas is found at parties and is harder to keep hidden than its classroom cousin. What happens is once the person lets one fly he instantly realizes that there is no way to hide it. He must act fast to control the damage to the atmosphere, both in a literal and metaphorical sense.

A spectator will notice the smelly offender circling the room, making two to three laps before stopping. This is in order to escape the noxious cloud he left behind. What occurs is this person leaves a reeking trail as he moves through the mass. The stench quickly blankets the crowd and soon everyone smells it. Unbeknownst to the culprit, he has left a long, rank finger pointing to him as the miscreant. Since everyone there has seen the person walk by and they soon smell the odor, they quickly figure out who the guilty person is. So if you ever find yourself in this position, quickly run outside, it's your only hope.

This brings us to the bedroom fart. This strikes individuals as soon as they slip under the covers, especially when it's with someone else. This gas is of the classic silent-but-deadly genre since once the individual gets into a comfortable state, like in a bed, their muscles relax, allowing unwanted aromas to escape. What one hopes for when this happens is that they smell it before their mate does. The person will tightly hold the edge of the blanket down, trapping the air underneath, creating the equivalent of a hot air balloon.

Hoping that the gas will sift through the sheets, he snuggles up to his mate, and with arms around his or her waist, pushes them higher on the pillow and away from the opening in the blanket. Then selflessly, he creates an opening on his side of the bed, allowing the gas to escape, sparing the expense of embarrassment.

When not in a mixed setting or crowded environment, people play farting games, mostly at the expense of the perpetrator. Principal among these is the Doorknob game. When someone audibly rips one, they must immediately yell "safety." If not, anyone in hearing distance yells "doorknob" and punches the offender until they touch a doorknob. This game probably originated on long car trips where a doorknob was obviously not accessible, leaving the culprit sore and bruised for smelling up the car's cabin.

Besides, beans being the magical fruit, there are a lot of subconscious cultural codes we abide by when committing this normal, but foul crime. Even though we all pass gas, there's a game we play with rules depending on where we are, who we are with, and how it happened. Hopefully after reading this, we will have compassion for fart culprits. For it can happen to any of us at anytime, and remember the golden rule: "Ye who smelt it, dealt it."

Americans in Israel: A surprising trend

World Perspectives

Leah Vitale

About a month ago, upon visiting a developed "settlement" town in the West Bank called Efrat, I noticed an interesting phenomenon. My friend and I traveled to visit her family via bulletproof bus. We needed a bulletproof bus because Arabs from neighboring Arab settlements have shot many commuters to and from the Jewish developments. What struck me especially were the types of people who actually lived there. Whenever I'd heard about tension in the West Bank, I'd always imagined radical zealots with whom no one could really affiliate. Conversely however, throughout my entire weekend in Efrat, I did not meet one natural born Israeli! The entire "settlement of hostile settlers" was actually comprised of nothing but welcoming Americans.

After returning home to Jerusalem, I did some research to verify my observations. I found that one aspect of discussion about Israel that is either usually forgotten or simply not known about by most is the large American community living in the country. Whether it is due to a religious connection, ideological ties or simply an affinity to the geographical location, many Americans have moved to Israel in recent years.

According to statistics from the Israel Aliyah Center (In Hebrew, "Aliyah" is the word for immigration to Israel which means "rising up," referring to one's spiritual state being enhanced upon dwelling in the holy land), despite the violence incited by Palestinian terrorist organizations, 41,224 new immigrants have arrived to Israel in the past three years. Additionally, of those immigrants, interestingly, over 1,000 chose to live in the areas of Judea, Samaria and the Gaza Strip, areas often referred to as "the settlements."

Throughout last year alone, about 2,040 North Americans moved to Israel and the numbers are up more than 20 percent this year. A common belief is that many feel compelled to show their support for the country as it faces heightened violence in its conflict with Palestinian terrorism. According to the statistics, the number of North Americans immigrating to Israel has not been so high in 25 or 30 years.

So what does this mean for the future? According to the American Jewish Committee, by the year 2080, Israel's Jewish population will likely double, reaching 10 million. Therefore, within the next 20 years, Israel will most likely be home to the absolute majority of the world's Jewish children. By 2080, 77 to 86 percent of all Jews under the age of 15 will be living in Israel, leaving the Diaspora Jewish communities feeble.

Along with a growing American presence in the country, American attitudes toward Israel seem favorable. In a recent poll based on these attitudes conducted by The Israel Project, the majority of respondents felt positive about the country. According to the census, of those Americans with college or post-graduate education who are also regular readers/viewers of a national newspaper, news magazine and or network/cable news shows with incomes of $75,000 or more, just over 50 percent of those polled in October identified themselves as supporters of Israel while only 12 percent said they backed the Palestinians in the conflict. In addition, in a poll conducted by the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research, which questioned 1,318 respondents in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, it was reported that 55 percent of respondents said they supported "armed attacks" in Israel, and just over 95 percent were reported to have an anti-American sentiment.

Such statistics are, to some degree, extremely surprising for a college student in Amherst, where the presence of unbridled Palestinian apologists and propaganda seems to prevail. As educated Americans, it is imperative that we research conflicts from several different sources and remain constantly informed about affairs all over the world. By keeping ourselves up to date regarding the conflict in the Middle East and remembering that it is necessary to remove ourselves from our ethnocentric "Pioneer Valley bubbles," we will be able to most accurately understand and be aware of situations such as this one. Such action is essential in order for us to be knowledgeable Americans who are able recognize the vast world surrounding us.

'Hip' fashions that 'hopped'

The Red Line

Peter Dale
Justin Chellman

The other day we found ourselves watching a couple of the landmark movies of the 1990s hip-hop generation, Juice and New Jersey Drive. One of the main things that we found ourselves checking for and talking about with our friends was how much we've changed the way we dress since then, from a little before our time with the movie "Juice" (1991) to my high school days with "New Jersey Drive" (1995).

It's crazy how fast things like that change when we look at it in retrospect. In 1991 and a little bit before that, the mood in Hip Hop was in its pre-The Chronic days. Groups like A Tribe Called Quest and De La Soul, and emcees like Big Daddy Kane and Heavy D were a lot more relaxed and the attire was very colorful and African. Even Tupac, who starred in the movie, was in his pre-thug life days and rocking straight legs a monochromatic hoodie and a jean jacket.

The Hippie steeze of groups like Tribe and De La became very popular and replaced the style of before for some, who may have been wearing Kangols and Adidas. We sat there and thought how wild it was that it was OK to wear a neon green or orange shirt in the early '90s. Then, so soon after, in 1995 a change in the sound of hip-hop happened, making for a much harder sound.

This changed not only the slang used but also the entire way people looked. In "New Jersey Drive" we were reminded of the way that our friends and we wore our clothes in high school in the days of the height of Wu Tang and Mobb Deep. Everything was a lot darker, the music was rough and the beats real hard and so was the content.

The clothes were hoodies (lots of hoodies), really baggy pants, dark colors, big bubble jackets like a triple fat goose, camouflage army gear, black Timberlands and Carhartt's. The trick was to try and look as tough as possible. That was the era when people fought over 8-ball jackets, Reebok Pumps and Jordans.

We don't exactly know when it happened, mostly because we didn't really change with it, but somewhere along when Puffy reached his peak, style changed again to a more high-class steeze. Hillfigger was replaced by other designer clothes, and to be a true baller you no longer could look grimy or tough. You needed to appear like you had cash, even if you didn't have any.

Watching these movies made me kind of miss the days of the ol' mid-'90s style. But now that big baller style has changed up again to the new trends of late. Now people are back to an '80s look. Just going around town, you may notice someone with graffiti on his gear, like a jean jacket, on their kicks or on a mesh trucker hat (like Pharrell from the Neptunes has). And also with all the throwback jerseys, which was a style in the early '90s, and all the popular sneakers are throwbacks to the popular ones back in the mid to late '80s. But what is funny now, is to get this type of look it will cost you a lot of cash, when it really wasn't all that much for it a few years ago.

Of course this is just another stop in the ever-moving train of style. It will go to another stop soon and leave this style cold like straight legs are now. With the way things are going it wouldn't be surprising if they came back. We wouldn't want to wear them, but that's only because we're stubborn. Also if you ever catch yourself thinking or reminiscing about stuff like this, Bobbitto put out a dope book recently called "Where'd You Get Those," about sneakers from the '60s to the late '80s, and he relates it to music, sports and the times, and how they effected what people wore. But if you're about my age and want to stroll down the style memory lane, just rent the aforementioned movies and check for the attire.

Comic Relief

UMass ready to be cracked up

Tracy Morgan
Tues. Oct. 16
Fine Arts Center

Former "Saturday Night Live" star Tracy Morgan brings his comedy act to the University of Massachusetts' Fine Arts Center tonight at 8 p.m. Morgan, who just recently began his own prime-time show on NBC, will be the third SNL alumni to hit the FAC Concert Hall this year, following Jim Breuer last spring and Darrell Hammond in September.

Morgan was known on SNL for his characters Astronaut Jones and Brian Fellows. He has also done appearances in the movies "How High," "Jay and Silent Bob Strike Back" and "Head of State." Morgan has donated his voice to "Crank Yankers" as the character Spoonie Luv along with his own stand up special on Comedy Central. He can also be seen playing the goofy sports fan from ESPN sports video game commercials.

Fans of the comedian have questioned Morgan's new show, "The Tracy Morgan Show," due to the lack of believability in Morgan's portrayal of a loving father. However, Morgan proves the critics wrong by showing signs of becoming this generation's version of Bill Cosby and according to a report on IMDB.com, the NBC officials love his show.

Morgan's two sons in the show, played by Bobb'e Thompson and Marc Jefferies, almost steal the show from Morgan with their humorous actions and lines. Morgan's show, although a bit sluggish at times, has the potential to be a tremendous hit.

Tickets to Morgan's performance can be purchased at the FAC Box Office. Ticket prices are $8 for UMass undergraduates and $15 for all others. See www.umass.edu/fac/ for more information.

New Offspring album will 'Splinter' fans

Long time punk rockers still going strong

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

In 1994 The Offspring were amongst the leaders of a pack of young musicians — including Green Day and Rancid — who were determined to bring back punk. Their hit album, "Smash," was groundbreaking, but not in the way that the band combined punk attitude and pace with pop melodies. After all, bands like Husker Du were doing that well before The Offspring had even formed — but in the way that it mainstreamed punk while maintaining integrity.

The band had huge hits with songs such as "Come Out And Play (Keep 'Em Separated)" and "Self Esteem," and while The Offspring weren't quite hardcore enough for some "punks," they found themselves millions of adoring fans, punks and non-punks. They also found themselves a place in the history books with "Smash," one of the greatest, if not the greatest, selling indie album of all time. Not only that, but The Offspring found themselves as one of the main bands to jump-start the '90s pop-punk movement that brought punk more into the mainstream than ever before.

The Offspring 'Splinter' Columbia Records

COURTESY THEOFFSPRING.COM

Greg Kriesel, Dexter Holland, Kevin "Noodles" Wesserman and Ron Welty make up The Offspring.

Then The Offspring found themselves in a curious position. Their success (along with them leaving Epitaph Record for the major label Columbia) made them easy targets for the finicky, insanely strict and laughable nonsensical punk community. The Offspring were branded sellouts and have found themselves unfairly targeted by punk purists, pop purists and everyone in between. The fact of the matter, though, is that love 'em or hate 'em, The Offspring are not sellouts.

While punk rebellion has been so watered down and commercialized by bands like Good Charlotte and blink-182, any open ear can tell that The Offspring are serious when they let out their rebel yells. It's fitting, then, that the band opens their seventh album, "Splinter" with the lyrics: "We are strong / We are right / We won't be pushed aside / We'll go on / We will fight / We will not compromise / We will never lose to you." Is this a mantra for today's disaffected youth or the battle cry of a band unfairly accused by everyone — from their first fans to today's rock critics — of selling out?

The true beauty of The Offspring is that that the answer to that question is — both.

The band proves they still have the goods on the very next song, "The Noose," a reeling, fast-paced anthem that is classic Offspring and one of their best songs to date. And it's not just a matter of one great song; The Offspring prove on "Splinter" that they are still a force to be reckoned with. It's the combination of songs like "The Noose" and other fairly expected Offspring tunes like "Long Way Home" and the break-neck "Da Hui" with the more experimental songs that truly define the Offspring sound.

In fact, those aforementioned punk purists who shun The Offspring for songs such as "Race Against Myself" need look no further than songs like "Dirty Magic," from the band's 1992 "Ignition" album, to see that The Offspring have never really been a straight punk band. The only difference between the band's more recent albums and their first are really just the recording quality and this should not be a complaint. "Splinter" truly shines as a recorded album, the bass thumps and the guitar cuts, just the way it should.

"Splinter" really follows directly in the footsteps of the bands previous album, 2001's "Conspiracy Of One," and while "Splinter" is an excellent record it never quite reaches the marvels of the previous, severely underappreciated and undersold, album. "Race Against Myself" is reminiscent of "Denial, Revisited" from "Conspiracy Of One," and the balance of the familiar Offspring pop-punk and the band's more experimental side is pretty much at the same ratio as "Conspiracy Of One," although "Splinter" leans a bit more towards the standard sound.

It is, unfortunately, important to note how relatively poorly "Conspiracy Of One" did. One can't help but think that the album's disappointing sales would negatively affect the bands ambition; luckily there are no signs of this yet. Aside from "The Noose," the album's other stand-out track, "Spare Me The Details," is far less typical. The song features an acoustic guitar in the foreground but is far away from acoustic punk songs like Green Day's "Good Riddance (Time Of Your Life)."

"Spare Me..." is just the opposite; actually, it's an upbeat, viciously catchy song with a strong rhythmic backing and a decidedly un-Offspring keyboard line. In it, frontman Dexter Holland laments his unfaithful girlfriend and his friends who keep telling him the story of her unfaithful activity. Although on paper the lyrics look painful and spiteful, the song's sheer catchiness makes it impossible not to bob up and down as Holland sings, "I'm not the one who acted like a ho / Why must I be the one who has to go / I'm not the one who messed up big time / So spare me the details of last night."

Holland's clever and, at times, silly lyrics have long been one of the main draws to The Offspring and he certainly does not disappoint on the new record. The lead-off single, the aforementioned "Hit That" is a slightly silly song but is thankfully infinitely better than recent Offspring hits such as "Original Prankster" from "Conspiracy Of One" and "Why Don't You Get A Job?" from 1998's "Americana." In fact, "Hit That" is a modern youth-culture parody/commentary on the same level as "Pretty Fly (For A White Guy)," although "Hit That" should prove to stand the test of time much better than the overplayed-to-death "Pretty Fly."

"Splinter" isn't without its own slight annoyances though. "Worst Hangover Ever" is a ska-tinged song with a predictable punchline. It's not annoying on the Novel spans cultures

'9 of 1' takes an honest look at the world

By Cameron J. Woods
Collegian Staff

Oliver Chin has created a graphic novel that in an innovative and original way depicts the aftermath and personal reactions to the 9/11 tragedies. Some may feel that such a serious subject matter should not be committed to such a frivolous medium as the graphic novel, but Chin rose above the limiting connotations of this style of book and created perhaps one of the most honest works regarding most shocking event in resent U.S. history.

'9 of 1: a window to the world'
By Author Oliver Chin
Frog, Ltd.
Grade A

The premise of the story revolves around an 11th grade history class, in a southern California middle school. The story briefly pans over the day before and the tragedies, and picks up on the class receiving their new assignment, which sets the rest of the book in action. The children are told that they are to interview someone that they do not know, who is also at least twice their age, about their feelings towards Sept. 11.

True to form, the comic book style cut right to the children's reports which, with subject matter as painful as this is a welcome relief. Crammed into the next 80 pages we are given accounts from the lives of an array of people, from an account of a retired Russian soldier who was active during the Soviet attempts to quell Afghani rebellion, to the retelling of the experience of the Japanese internment camps in America by an elderly Asian widow.

There are nine stories in this book, 10 if you include that of the children. Each tale is told from a member of a different national origin and from a different walk of life.

What ties these nine individual and geographically — as well as temporally — isolated stories together is that they all revolve around the tragedies of life and the old adage that history repeats itself. The fact that all of these tales are in essence fiction does absolutely nothing to detract from their believability. These are the stories of not only lives lived in tragedy but the lives lived in tragedies that have repeated themselves throughout history, despite historians' best attempts to educate. The stories also argue the most basic connections of all humanity — our desires, dreams and even the fundamentals of our beliefs. Through the fictional lives of these characters we are shown true life.

Priced at $12.50 this book is not only affordable, but also a value. Though it may sound like heavy reading for something during finals time the 107 pages are dominated mostly by the images that tell as much of the story as the words.

Osbourne recovering from broken neck

By Michael McDonough
Associated Press

LONDON (AP) — Ozzy Osbourne — once a wild man of heavy metal music, now a dazed dad in a reality TV show — recuperated in intensive care yesterday from injuries including a broken neck vertebra after an all-terrain vehicle accident.

Sharon Osbourne flew to Britain from Los Angeles to be with her 55-year-old husband after the latest dramatic incident in a colorful career that has included biting the head off a bat and urinating on the Alamo, among other antics.

"Apparently he was on his quad bike and he hit something and he fell and the bike landed on top of him," Sharon Osbourne told reporters yesterday at London's Heathrow Airport.

A quad bike, akin to a four-wheel-drive motorcycle, is used for recreation and by hunters and farmers to reach inaccessible places.

Sharon Osbourne visited her husband at Wexham Park Hospital in Slough, west of London, where he underwent emergency surgery Monday to restore the flow to a damaged blood vessel, said Dr. Dick Jack, hospital medical director.

Osbourne fractured his left collarbone, eight ribs and a neck vertebra in the accident Monday on his Buckinghamshire estate in southern England.

"It's satisfactory but it's going to be slow. I don't expect any major changes certainly for 24 hours," Jack said of Osbourne's recovery.

He said he believed there was no risk of paralysis from the fractured neck vertebra, although doctors were awaiting a final report from radiologists before removing an immobilizing collar.

The accident occurred while the singer was taking a day off from promoting "Changes," a duet with his daughter Kelly, his London publicity agency said in a statement.

The song, released yesterday in Britain, is a likely contender for the Chrismas No. 1 spot in singles charts.

Ozzy Osbourne, whose real name is John Osbourne, grew up in a blue-collar family in Birmingham, central England. He served two months in prison for burglary at age 17.

He rose to fame with the 1970s metal band Black Sabbath. He left for a solo career, shocking many with lyrics focusing on the occult and startling performances.

Osbourne bit the head off a live dove at a meeting with record company executives in 1981. The following year he did the same to a live bat at a concert in Des Moines, Iowa, although the bat reportedly bit back, and Osbourne reportedly had to undergo painful rabies shots.

Increase of violence on television

New study proves validity of disturbing rumor

By David Bauder
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — Fights, gun battles and blood are increasingly making their way into homes each night through television, according to a study released yesterday.

The study by the Parents Television Council counted 534 separate episodes of prime-time violence on the six major broadcast networks during the first two weeks of the November ratings "sweeps" in 2002. That was up from 292 violent incidents during the same period four years earlier, the organization said.

Although the study is slightly outdated, the PTC says preliminary data from last month shows the trend toward increased violence is continuing.

The violence is getting more serious, too. The study found 156 incidents where guns or other weapons were used during the two-week period in prime-time in 2002, up from 67 four years earlier.

"In both quantity and quality it is getting worse," said Brent Bozell, founder of the conservative media watchdog group. "I think it is a cause for concern."

Fox narrowly beat CBS, 151 to 148, for having the most violent incidents, the PTC said, even though Fox broadcasts an hour less each night than ABC, CBS and NBC. Fox executives say they never comment on PTC studies, although they privately note that some of their more violent shows in 2002 have since been canceled.

Four of the networks — ABC, Fox, the WB and UPN - had more than double the violent incidents in 2002 than they had four years earlier, the study said.

NBC was the only network where the level of violence went down, from 51 in 1998 to 42 last year, the PTC said.

During the four-year period, CBS' forensics drama, "CSI: Crime Scene Investigation," became the nation's most popular television program. CBS has already completed one spin-off of its most successful show and is planning another.

At the same time, HBO's "The Sopranos" was one of the nation's most influential programs. Although its violence level wasn't studied here, the broadcast networks took note of the drama's success and tried to imitate it.

There was no immediate comment from the TV networks on the PTC's study.

Among the incidents cited in the study from last year: Gil cutting a finger off a dead man's body in "CSI"; a man being shot in the forehead on NBC's "Boomtown"; a warlock on the WB's "Charmed" taking a human heart from someone still alive.

Television isn't operating in a vacuum, Bozell said, noting violent content in video games and in music. And he said that it's likely television was even more violent during the 1970s and early 1980s, with Westerns and police dramas popular.

"It's a cyclical thing, I think," he said. "But this is cyclical with an edge to it."

The PTC isn't opposed to violence on television, particularly if it comes with a moral message that makes clear the consequences of actions, Bozell said. But the networks should be mindful of what they're beaming into homes, he said.

"If you believe that the product has consequences and you believe you can influence an audience, particularly impressionable youngsters, then I think television along with all the entertainment media ought to be mindful about what they're teaching," he said.

One positive finding for the PTC was that three networks - CBS, NBC and the WB - cut back on the level of violence during TV's so-called family hour, between 8 and 9 p.m. For the WB, that's due almost entirely to losing one program, "Buffy the Vampire Slayer."

Otherwise, the PTC found that violence increased during every time slot.

New Offspring well received

same level as "Original Prankster" or ". . . Get A Job" but it doesn't add much to the album and most listeners will probably find themselves skipping over it by the third or fourth listen. The last track "When You're In Prison" is completely, 100 percent different from anything The Offspring have ever done.

It's a very odd, old-fashioned sounding song where the only prominent sounds area curious vocalist (that sounds nothing like Holland), a simple, almost old-time cartoony horn and string line, and a popping, old-vinyl effect. The song's lyrics are, well, an instruction guide to get by in prison without attracting any, uh, unwanted attention. The song is not painful to listen to, it's not even that annoying, the "don't pick up the soap" lyrics, though slightly predictable, warrant a few chuckles, however the listener may find themselves skipping this song after a couple plays.

"Splinter" is a very good album and true Offspring fans (not those looking for raw, violent punk or those looking for cheap novelty singles) should find a lot to appreciate. While "Splinter" is not The Offspring's best album, it certainly holds its own and listeners with an open mind could find themselves listening to this album as much as any other Offspring release. The audience that enjoyed "Conspiracy Of One" will particularly enjoy "Splinter." However, if there's any justice for these long running, but still going, punks, "Splinter" will sell the way "Conspiracy Of One" should have.

Minutemen stumble

position, and it cost us."

"I don't really know what it was tonight," sophomore forward Jeff Viggiano said. "We may have just gotten too confident and comfortable and started turning the ball over."

Trailing 52-51 with just over 27 seconds remaining, CCSU opted to play for the last shot and found Robinson on the low block, where he was fouled on a quick spin move to the basket. He then hit both free throws, giving the Blue Devils a one-point edge with just under six seconds remaining.

Armed with a foul to give, Central Connecticut was whistled for contact against junior Anthony Anderson before the captain could advance the ball beyond half court, forcing the Maroon and White to inbound the ball deep in their own backcourt with under four seconds to play.

After Lappas called for a time out, Viggiano set up to inbound the ball along the sideline. Unable to spot a wide-open Freeman standing alone under the hoop, Viggiano forced the ball in to Anderson and had it slapped away as the buzzer sounded, giving CCSU its second one-point win over UMass in as many years.

"[On the last play] we ran Maurice Maxwell along the baseline and [Viggiano] looked at him, but Rashaun Freeman was wide open and Viggiano just didn't see him," Lappas said.

After jumping out to an early 5-0 lead, UMass' lead grew to as high as six in the first half when a Freeman jumper made the score 22-16 at the 7:40 mark.

Leading by four to start the second half, the Minuteman pushed the advantage to nine with an 8-2 run highlighted by a pair of Viggiano dunks, the second of which made the score 41-32 with 15:28 remaining in the game.

Central Connecticut continued to chip away, however and eventually tied the game on the strength of a 7-1 burst that culminated with a Robinson lay-up that knotted things at 47 with 7:24 left.

The Blue Devils then took their first lead since the 5:49 mark of the first half as a Robinson jumper made the score 51-49 with 4:20 on the clock.

The Minutemen regained the lead at 52-51 just over two minutes later when Anderson drained a long three as the shot clock expired, but did not score again.

Living the dream

2:46 — My friend Jay calls. His car won't start. Jay was bringing the Wings. Uh-oh.

3:09 — My girlfriend hears the news about Jay and says, "We need another Wingman." Comedy.

3:11 — Jamal Lewis scores on a pitch from five yards out. If this guy isn't an MVP, it's only because the Ravens don't make the playoffs. And if he keeps playing like this, they will.

3:16 — The Bengals offensive line is reminding me of the Drew Bledsoe-era Pats' pass blocking. It's that prevailing "you deserve better than this" feeling.

3:25 — The Vikings have a simple offensive scheme. Get guys who can catch anything and can run fast, and find a quarterback who can throw the ball high and far. Some of Daunte Culpepper's touchdown passes remind me of the way you could throw the ball any distance in Tecmo Bowl.

3:29 — Jon Kitna hits Will Demps between the numbers. But Demps plays for Baltimore. It makes me sad. I love Kitna. Seriously, I have a jersey from his Seattle days. I know, I know.

3:31 — Lewis again. Why bother throwing the ball? This guy is a truck.

3:35 — Frank Wycheck gets his 500th career reception, joining Kellen Winslow, Ozzie Newsome and Shannon Sharpe. That's some nice company for a guy who is one of the most underrated players of his era.

3:41 — The only game that is within one score is the Lions-Chargers game. Wow, is it 4:00 yet?

3:45 — The Ravens are just good enough to be scary but just bad enough to be overlooked. They are the team that nobody wants to play.

3:54 — Another blind-side turnover caused by the Baltimore pass rush. Put this game in the books.

4:01 — The Bucs stop New Orleans on fourth down to end it. Only Indy-Tennessee left for the 1 p.m. games.

4:05 — Wings are here. Hallelujah.

4:16 — Steve McNair drives downfield and gives the Titans a chance to tie. On the conversion attempt, the Colts tip the ball and stay ahead. This has turned into a classic game.

4:20 — At long last, the snow bowl begins in Foxboro.

4:24 — Peyton Manning catches his own pass, forcing the Titans to take a time out. You couldn't script a better game.

4:25 — Justin McCareins fumbles the ball on a punt return. Game, set, match Indy.

4:32 — Miami commits a personal foul, giving the Pats a 1st-and-goal. Side note: I love Bernie Kukar's accent. It's just enough that you have to know the hand signals to understand exactly what is going on.

4:35 — Vinatieri's kick just barely goes over the upright. 3-0 Pats, thank you, God.

4:37 — Just checked the Chiefs game just in time to see Priest Holmes poke the ball in. The "veteran" Morten Andersen kicks the extra point. I realize that "veteran" is NFL-speak for old.

4:39 — I flip to the San Francisco-Arizona game. "Even though Randy Moss was a knucklehead, his teammates realized he was a knucklehead and didn't let it bother them." What? I think I'll avoid channel 719 too.

4:41 — Oakland had four yards passing today. Glad I missed most of that one.

4:45 — Kevin Harlan announces there is over one foot of snow in New England. Talk about an understatement.

4:46 — Jim Nantz says there are more than two feet of snow. I always liked you, Jim.

4:49 — There's no footing on the field and the Pats line up with five wides and a shotgun set. Seriously.

4:56 — "I think I said [Eugene] Wilson was from Central Florida. He's from Illinois." How does this guy have a job?

5:00 — Harlan and Randy Cross are conversing on camera. Aren't there FCC regulations against showing people with hair like Cross'?

5:07 — A Dolphins O-lineman breaks his helmet. File that under "Things I've never seen before."

5:16 — Snoop Dogg just said "wait just one minizzle" to Jerry Stiller in an AOL commercial. I never thought I would see those two in the same place. Ever.

5:35 — Vinatieri misses. How does that happen, even in a blizzard?

5:35 — Phil Simms on a Denver punt: "That kick was so bad, it was good." Thanks for the wisdom Phil.

5:52 — The clown commercial is on again. It really is kind of frightening.

6:15 — Rodney Harrison nails Fiedler on a blitz. PICK UP THE BALL! FALL ON IT! Mike Vrabel finally grabs it. Sweet.

6:18 — Arizona's on the board. Only down 29 points.

6:19 — Armen Keteyan and Simms are having a discussion about keeping their hands from getting dry in Denver. Kill me now.

6:21 — Jay Fiedler is beginning to throw with accuracy. Could we get some more snow in here please?

6:32 — Portis busts it loose to put Denver up 10. Home field here we come.

6:38 — Deion Branch is railed but holds on to the ball for a first down. He's money today.

6:43 — Fiedler's pass gets tipped by Tedy Bruschi, who somehow holds on, and walks in for the touchdown. Just to add to the absurdity of the game, Vinatieri's extra point hits both uprights before going in. Fans are throwing snow all over the place. Only in New England.

6:48 — Denver is up big. Home field is in the Pats' hands.

6:56 — Promo No. 17 for "Undercover Christmas." It still looks like the worst movie ever made. I don't care if "Oscar nominee" Tyne Daly is in it. Obviously she made a mistake.

6:58 — How many big interceptions has Ty Law made in his career? Add one more. There's your true defensive leader.

7:06 — Tom Brady pooches a punt that gets downed at the 1-yard line. Who needs a punter, anyway?

7:09 — Fourth and 8 from the 3. A safety. What a perfect way to finish off this game. A full day. I need a nap.

LEADING THE PACK

Thomas Pock, November's CCM Hockey East Player of the Month, leads the Minutemen with nine goals this season. UMass will play New Hampshire tomorrow night at the Mullins Center. The opening faceoff is scheduled for 7 p.m.

Northeastern breaks streak

less teams in college hockey, the Huskies (0-9-2 overall, 0-7-1 HEA) pulled out a 1-0 victory at Vermont. Junior Keni Gibson turned aside 25 shots to earn his second career shutout. The last one came against BU on Jan. 6, 2002.

It was a bright day for the hurting Huskies, as freshman Ray Ortiz scored his first collegiate goal to give NU the win. Ortiz has three points on the year, thanks to the assists he notched against Merrimack (Oct. 24) and UMass Lowell (Nov. 1). The Charlestown native was named Superskills Hockey Rookie of the Week for his efforts.

It's appropriate that it took an Eastern College Athletic Conference team to break NU's streak. Bruce Crowder's charges are 12-3-2 in their last 17 clashes against ECAC foes.

HANG ON SLU-PY

St. Lawrence showed Hockey East some poor hospitality this weekend, taking wins from Lowell (7-6-3, 4-3-1 HEA) and New Hampshire (10-4-1, 5-2-1 HEA) at Appleton Arena. Rich Peverley's game-winning power play goal at 15:00 of the third period gave the Saints a 5-4 victory over UNH. Friday night, and TJ. Trevelyan added to the two points he earned against Lowell with a goal at 15:14 of the second period Saturday to lift SLU over UNH, 3-2.

Goaltenders Mike Ackley and Mike McKenna combined to stop 56 of 62 shots in the two-game span.

THERE'S NO BUSINESS LIKE SNOW BUSINESS

While Hockey East teams did manage to play seven of the scheduled 10 games this weekend, BC and Providence (6-5-3, 2-5-2 HEA) were snowed out Saturday, as were Maine and Merrimack. The Massachusetts State Police even got involved, as it and the Hockey East brass decided to postpone Massachusetts (9-3-2, 5-2-1 HEA) and BU Sunday afternoon. Thus far, only the Maine-Merrimack clash has been rescheduled, for Jan. 6 at Merrimack's J. Thom Lawler Arena.

Bonnies under fire

By John Wawrow
Associated Press

BUFFALO, N.Y. (AP) — The NCAA could level an unethical conduct charge against former St. Bonaventure coach Jan van Breda Kolff for his role in a player eligibility scandal that led to his dismissal, interim school president the Rev. Dominic Monti said Tuesday.

"They are pursuing an additional allegation of unethical conduct against Jan," Monti said in an interview with The Associated Press.

Monti said the allegation against van Breda Kolff was made by the NCAA following its investigation. He said it was in addition to the three infractions St. Bonaventure acknowledged it committed, and will be raised at a hearing in Indianapolis on Friday.

The hearing, before the NCAA's committee on infractions, is the final step before the college governing body will determine whether to pursue further sanctions after forward Jamil Terrell was ruled ineligible last spring for failing to meet junior college transfer guidelines.

The NCAA could rule next month.

When the team was stripped of 12 wins and barred from the postseason, players boycotted their final two games.

If the NCAA sanctions van Breda Kolff, now an assistant with the NBA's New Orleans Hornets, he could be restricted from returning to coach at the college level for a set time. Any school considering hiring van Breda Kolff during that time would have to petition the NCAA for approval.

Van Breda Kolff's lawyer, Lew Conner, would not confirm or deny whether his client faces a sanction of unethical conduct but said: "Any allegation of wrongdoing against Jan van Breda Kolff by anybody will be fiercely contested to the absolute fullest extent allowed by law."

The NCAA declined comment.

Van Breda Kolff has previously denied any wrongdoing involving Terrell's transfer, saying he was left out of the loop when Athletic Director Gothard Lane raised the issue of the player's eligibility with school President Robert Wickenheiser.

Wickenheiser, at the request of St. Bonaventure's trustees, resigned a week after the scandal broke, accepting full responsibility for approving Terrell's transfer. The school's board also sought and received Lane's resignation about a month later, and fired van Breda Kolff.

A school investigation found no direct evidence that van Breda Kolff knew of Terrell's ineligibility, but ruled he should have tried to determine the player's status considering the questions raised.

The Rev. Monti compared van Breda Kolff's defense to that of what he called, "the three little monkeys: the see no evil, hear no evil, say no evil."

Added Monti: "And that's precisely Jan's response: 'I didn't know anything. I didn't say anything. I didn't do anything. I didn't hear anything.'"

Monti said he was encouraged heading into Friday's hearing, hoping the NCAA weighs the actions St. Bonaventure has taken since the scandal occurred. Besides noting the departures of Wickenheiser, Lane and van Breda Kolff, Monti added that the school fully cooperated with the investigation.

"This is kind of the last thing hanging out there, the last uncertainty," Monti said, referring to the NCAA's final ruling. "You know you have to go through it. And the only thing that would kind of reopen it again is if they issued a judgment of penalties that we didn't anticipate."

UMass has Devil of a time

Minutemen can't finish on the road

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

UNCASVILLE, Conn. — Again?

Reeling from a heartbreaking 76-75 overtime loss at Boston College on Saturday afternoon, the Massachusetts men's basketball team traveled to the Mohegan Sun Arena seeking revenge from Central Connecticut State for a 46-45 loss that marked one of the low points of the Minutemen's 2002-03 season.

However, none would be served, as the Blue Devils again slipped past UMass by just a single point, winning 53-52 before a crowd of 3,554.

UMass	52
CCSU	53

"It's another tough game to lose," UMass coach Steve Lappas said. "I just told the kids that we have 10 days to get ourselves healthy and regroup. Six games into the season we have our backs against the wall, obviously.

"We just need to respond now."

The Minutemen were without the services of starting guard Art Bowers, who severely sprained his ankle against BC and is out indefinitely.

UMass, which will take a week off for exams, will return to action on Dec. 20 when Marshall visits the Mullins Center.

"We need to get back on the right track," junior center Gabe Lee said. "We can't play like we did tonight and expect to do well the rest of the season."

Ron Robinson led all scorers with 21 points for the Blue Devils. Guards Demario Anderson and Justin Chiela both added nine for CCSU.

Sophomore forward Rashaun Freeman led the Minutemen with 15 points and 13 rebounds, while junior center Gabe Lee posted 12 points and eight rebounds.

It was, however, the numerous lay-ups and close-range shots the Minutemen were repeatedly unable to convert combined with 15 second half turnovers that ultimately sealed their fate.

"We had a lot of [easy baskets] that looked like they were in and just came out," Lappas said. "If we make a couple lay-ups then we win the game pretty handily, we just didn't finish around the basket.

"But the bottom line is that we shouldn't have put ourselves in that

Messy weather can't stop HEA weekend games

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

The Northeast became a winter wonderland last weekend, and while three games involving Hockey East teams were cancelled, the rest of the slate provided some heated action despite the frigid weather outside.

Notebook

The first example came Friday night, when Boston College (10-2-3, 6-0-2 Hockey East) and Boston University (4-5-4, 2-4-2 HEA) met up for the first time this season. The Eagles continued their winning ways with a 5-3 victory that maintained their perfect conference record. BC has beaten the Terriers in the last four regular season meetings, and Friday's win — coupled with the postponement of second place Maine's (11-2-1, 6-2-1 HEA) second visit to Merrimack (4-10-3, 1-6-3 HEA) Saturday — ensured the Eagles would stay atop the Hockey East standings through the weekend.

Tony Voce provided the spark for the Eagles with a hat trick, and the Eaves brothers chipped in with five points combined — sophomore Patrick scored twice, and senior Ben had three assists.

Friday night's game was goalie Sean Fields' 100th in a BU uniform — a new team record.

The Terriers have struggled early, and Jack Parker's crew is sure to enjoy the nearly three-week break they'll have after Dec. 13's game against Niagara. BU is classically a strong finisher, though, and come Jan. 2 against defending National Champion Minnesota, the Icedogs will have something to prove.

It's still a bit early in the season to crown BC, or dismiss BU, but there are a few trends that shed some light on the disparity that exists on Commonwealth Ave.

The Eagles have been stellar on the penalty kill, stifling all but six of the 71 man-up opportunities their opponents have had this season. Also, junior Ryan Shannon has at least one point in nine consecutive games, dating back to Nov. 5 against Lowell. In that span, the Eagles have gone undefeated.

BU, meanwhile, is struggling to score timely goals, with just five third period goals in 13 games.

At last

It took 12 games to do it, but Northeastern finally notched its first win. In a battle of the last two win-

The beauty of the NFL Sunday pass

Matt Brady

It's every sports fan's dream. Get up at noon. Take the dog for a walk. Plop down on the couch to watch every NFL game on DirectTV's NFL Sunday Ticket.

1:01 p.m. — Kickoff in the Cincy-Baltimore game.

1:08 — 65-year-old Gary Anderson hits a 40-yard field goal. Anyone else yearning for Al Del Greco?

1:11 — First "Real Men of Genius" commercial of the day. One of the best ad campaigns of the past few years.

1:13 — "Now that's a Larry Allen block right there." Seriously, all Cris Collinsworth needs is a "BOOM!" and he's got his own bus, video game and a Tinactin contract.

1:19 — The dog is blocking the receiver for the remote. This day is off to a flying start.

1:23 — Byron Leftwich hits Jimmy Smith in stride for a beautiful touchdown. This kid is definitely going to be better than Carson Palmer.

1:27 — Aaron Brooks finds Boo Williams for a wide-open touchdown. Two touchdowns in four minutes. I'm definitely on with the remote today.

1:32 — I decide it's time to check the bottom of the barrel today — Oakland/Pittsburgh and San Diego/Detroit. Fortunately, both games are in commercial. Nice.

1:34 — Beasley Reese is doing the Jacksonville-Houston game. Note to self: avoid channel 709.

1:35 — "It'll be third and … about the size of that official's shoe." Dick Enberg, you make me chuckle. McNair sneaks it in from two out and the Titans are up 10-0. I've seen all four touchdowns in the NFL today.

1:41 — Oakland-Pitt is the only game not in commercial. Seriously, that's not funny.

1:49 — CBS shows a Saturn commercial featuring running clowns. Not the funny kind. The scary kind.

1:55 — NASCAR on FOX gets a plug during the Minnesota-Seattle game. First, the season doesn't begin for three months. Second, do they think Seattle and Minnesota are key markets for NASCAR?

1:58 — I happen upon a commercial with a guy with back hair. Thank you, remote inventor.

2:04 — Ed Hochuli is the best referee in the league. He is decisive, clear and usually right.

2:14 — Anthony Wright nails Travis Taylor downfield. Remember when people were talking about the quarterback controversy between Kyle Boller and Chris Redman? Yeah, that was this season.

2:30 — The halftime show bonanza. Who's worse, Terry Bradshaw or Deion Sanders? Please, just let it end…

2:34 — Jeff Fisher says, "This means time out" to the ref while making a "T" with his hands. Hysterical. Abusing the ref should be rewarded when it's done creatively.

2:42 — Philly goes up 17-10 on a shovel pass to Duce Staley. This is the team to beat in the NFC, which makes AFC fans excited.

Wheeling and dealing

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — Now that the first big offseason deadline has passed, baseball's offseason marketplace has started to get busy.

Anaheim Angels closed in on Bartolo Colon, Nomar Garciaparra expressed dismay at Boston's talks to acquire Alex Rodriguez, and Kazuo Matsui arrived in New York on Monday to complete his deal with the Mets.

There were only two free-agent signings, with right-hander Kerry Ligtenberg agreeing to a $4.5 million, two-year contract with Toronto and outfielder Eduardo Perez settling on a $1.7 million, two-year deal with Tampa Bay. But other deals were percolating.

Twenty-five free agents were offered salary arbitration before Sunday's midnight deadline. They have until Dec. 19 to accept and can re-sign with their former teams through Jan. 8. The 139 free agents not offered arbitration can't re-sign until May 1.

Among those cut off by the deadline were Greg Maddux and Atlanta, Ivan Rodriguez and Florida, and Vladimir Guerrero and Montreal.

"There was absolutely no possibility this was going to fit into our operating scheme this year," Braves general manager John Schuerholz said of Maddux. "I would have loved to have seen him say, 'I want to stay with the Braves no matter what. I want to achieve these goals wearing a Braves uniform. I want to stay.' We all would have loved that. But our economics and his economics weren't anywhere near each other."

Colon was close to a big money-deal Monday.

While neither Colon nor the Angels discussed the talk, both Anaheim and the Chicago White Sox believed the right-hander was on the verge of a deal with Anaheim, said two baseball officials who were familiar with details of Colon's negotiations with the two teams. The pair spoke on the condition of anonymity.

Anaheim offered a $48 million, four-year contract, one of the officials said. Once a preliminary agreement is reached, the right-hander still must pass a physical.

Colon was only 15-13 with a 3.87 ERA this year, but he's coveted for his durability and consistency.

His agent, Mitch Frankel, did not return several telephone calls from The Associated Press. Angels general manager Bill Stoneman refused to confirm or deny talks.

"We've been more active this offseason than last," Stoneman said. "We're still trying to get some other things done. In terms of what they are, we're only going to comment on that stuff once we do have something that we announce publicly."

The Angels could be dealing again if the Alex Rodriguez-Manny Ramirez trade goes through. Garciaparra would be out of a job, and it's believed the Red Sox could trade him to the Angels for a pitcher, possibly Jarrod Washburn, or second baseman Adam Kennedy.

"I'd definitely be hurt," Garciaparra said Monday in an interview with Boston's WEEI radio. "I'm in a place that I've given so much of my life and so much of my effort."

Head-on collision sends two to hospital

GERALD H. LING/COLLEGIAN

Firemen tend to a car wreck in the Orchard Hill Residential Area.

Two motor vehicles collided around 3:30 p.m. yesterday in a head-on accident that shattered glass, deployed an airbag and sent the two male drivers to area hospitals.

The accident, which happened close to the driveway of 439 E. Pleasant St., involved a maroon Chevrolet pickup truck with Massachusetts plate number 177 9CE and a maroon Chevrolet Corsica with Massachusetts plate number 215 TYD.

According to Chief Keith Hoyle of the Amherst Fire Department, one driver was taken to Franklin Medical Center in Greenfield and the other was taken to Holyoke Hospital.

Both drivers appeared to be wearing their seatbelts, said Officer Todd Lang of the Amherst Police Department.

The names of neither driver could be released because of the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act, Hoyle said.

Items found inside the vehicle included a University of Massachusetts Stockbridge School of Agriculture key chain and an Amherst Regional High School parking permit.

The Corsica appeared to be badly damaged. The inside of the front of the car was completely exposed, and the engine was pushed back into the passenger compartment. The pickup truck also sustained heavy damage.

Officers blocked the flow of traffic upon arriving at the scene. A Pioneer Valley Transportation Authority bus was stuck in its southbound route, unable to continue through the scene of the accident and unable to turn around on the street.

At around 4:15 p.m., Amherst Towing Company began removing the two vehicles. A group of workers remained afterward to clear up the debris.

No one from the Amherst Police Department was available for further comment on the incident. Amherst Fire Department could not release any information about the identity of the victims or their medical statuses.

Community rallies against Patriot Act

ACLU joins students in protest

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts' chapter of the Americans Civil Liberties Union held a rally in front of the Student Union yesterday, in an effort to protest many aspects of the USA Patriot Act.

There were seven speakers at the rally, representing the ACLU, Asian Americans for Political Action, the Graduate Employee Organization, Office of ALANA Affairs, the Muslim Students Association and the Department of political science at Mount Holyoke College.

Bill Newman, head of the Western Massachusetts chapter of the ACLU, spoke of the presence of the FBI on college campuses, particularly at UMass. Newman alleged that he requested records of the FBI's correspondence between the UMass Police and the Amherst Police Department, but has received no information from either department.

"UMass won't disclose any records," he said.

Newman also informed the crowd that according to an article in The Springfield Republican, the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority, which is the bus system that services the UMass campus, will soon be installing small microphones in the front of every bus. He claimed that this new measure would be an infringement of people's civil rights.

"The price of getting on the bus is the price of a ticket, not the price of privacy," he said.

Tru Lang of Asian Americans for Political Action, spoke on behalf of the group regarding deportation of immigrants due to parts of the Patriot Act. Lang said that as a result of the Patriot Act, many Cambodians are being deported back to their country of origin, even if they no longer have family or community ties there.

He used an example of one woman who had been living in the United States for approximately 22 years.

He said she was convicted of shoplifting and was sentenced to deportation. The woman was a mother of two and had no means of survival in Cambodia. He explained that she "had survived the killing fields in 1980 and came to the U.S. at the age of nine."

"Now her children would not have a mother to care for them," he said.

Lang also said he was disappointed with the low turnout of students who attended the event, particularly Asian American students. There were only about 50 students who attended the event.

"I don't see many Asian faces in the crowd," he said, "I'm disappointed in the apathy among Asian American students."

Rene Gonzalez of the University's Student Government Association's ALANA caucus spoke at the event. He said most Americans have a feeling that laws that make a totalitarian society would not happen in the United States, but his disdain toward the government was clear.

Gonzalez compared the type of government in the United States to fascism. He also said that the little opposition of U.S. citizens to the policies of President George W. Bush is not dissimilar to the rise of Adolf Hitler in World War II.

"In Germany, the [support of Hitler] happened first with little things. Then they had a politician with the unquestioning support of his people," he said. "That's what fear in a conformist nation does. That's what's happening [in the United States] today."

Attorney Levi advocates for civil liberties

By Kate Walsh
Collegian Correspondent

On Nov. 18, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, the highest court in the state, ruled that it is unconstitutional to deny same sex couples the right to marry, a move that could possibly make Massachusetts the first to legalize gay marriages.

Jennifer Levi, co-counsel in Goodridge v. Department of Public Heath, the case that invoked this landmark decision, and a staff attorney at Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders (GLAD), spoke at the University of Massachusetts last night about the case itself, the evolving transgender movement and the definition of marriage.

"What is traditional marriage? Is it marriage that denies interracial couples the right to marry? Is it marriage that takes away the rights of woman?" asked Levi.

The Goodridge case was first filed by GLAD in Suffolk Superior Court in April of 2001, as seven same-sex couples sought to remove the discriminatory barriers to marriage that the state had imposed for same-sex couples. They were ruled against in May of 2002, reason being that Massachusetts had an interest in connecting marriage to heterosexual procreation. The Supreme Judicial Court heard the case in March of 2003, and it was ruled on less than a month ago.

Levi began by framing her discussion on the Goodridge case around the transgender movement and transgender civil rights, explaining that the background behind these two issues is important because people need to question why someone's sex should ever matter in conjunction with marriage.

"The question of why sex should be relevant in a legal matter is most often answered by homophobia, society's interest in ensuring that gay and lesbian people can't marry, or society's interest in ensuring that men and women get different roles," she said.

Levi also explained the reasons behind "why marriage matters." According to her, it is a safety net that provides protections under the law for couples that they cannot otherwise receive. She discussed how civil unions, although a step in the right direction, are

Coolidge toy drive brightens the holiday season

By Matt Elder
Collegian Staff

"When I was a kid, I didn't have any toys," Assistant Resident Director Carlo Zepeda said.

That was his reason for leading last night's toy drive at Coolidge dormitory, where over 200 children's faces lit up while receiving their holiday gifts.

Students, Residence Assistants, the University of Massachusetts cheerleading team and the Doo Wop Shop all assisted the children in picking out their toys from large piles. The toys were donated by local businesses and Coolidge residents.

"The athletic department helped us out a lot," Zepeda said. He said the department donated about 80 or 90 toys to him.

Zepeda also received help from John Santanella of Hasbro, who donated about 200 toys and said he collected about 560 toys for the 400 kids in the Amherst Survival Center, a center in downtown Amherst that helps out needy families. All the toys that weren't taken last night would be donated to the center, he added.

Five members of The Doo Wop Shop started off the festivities with a round of songs as the children received balloons. Some members of the group helped pass out toys later in the afternoon.

"We always try to sing for the kids," said Anum Spriggs, a senior who has been with the group since his freshman year. "It's definitely a good cause," he said.

Members of the cheerleading team performed cheers as the kids received their toys.

The children chose gifts ranging from Barbies, Hulks, basketballs and board games. Mike, a 10-year-old from Hadley, wanted a Nerf basketball while Zaniya, a three-year-old, preferred a small play set.

"Where's the arts and crafts?" asked David Allard, a nine-year-old.

The decision wasn't an easy one for Steven Kacey, 10. "I don't know what I want," he said. After numerous options, Kacey chose a Dragonball Z toy.

Alicia Druker, a sophomore RA in Coolidge, walked around the drive snapping pictures of various kids smiling with their new toys.

Some parents received so many toys for their kids that they needed trash bags to carry all everything to their cars.

"It feels good to help out unfortunate kids," said Beth Porozio, a freshman who has been helping out with the drive for about a month. Porozio said she went door to door around Coolidge and collected money from the residents, then went and bought toys.

"The kids need presents and Christmas," said Kathryn Dye, a resident of Coolidge. Like Porozio, she went around and collected change and used the money to buy toys.

"The residents were amazing," Zepeda said about the help he received from within his building.

"It's beyond a success for me," Zepeda said at the end of the drive.

Zepeda said he had doubts on how successful the drive would be at first; he initially became discouraged when the drive began as the same time the campus disturbances started.

"I just didn't give up," he said.

Next semester Zepeda said he will hold a book drive, and next year he will run another holiday toy drive.

"It's time for me to give," he said. "The residence halls have never done anything like this before."

SGA responds to merging of banks

By Ferron Salniker
Collegian Staff

Last night the Student Government Association addressed the effect on students of the merging of FleetBoston Financial with Bank of America and the recognition of Charles DiMare, director of the Student Legal Services office.

Also during the meeting, which was the last regular scheduled meeting for the fall semester, the Rules and Ethics Committee announced the dismissal of charges brought on to Senator Gladys Franco and SGA Speaker Jared Nokes.

In November, Nokes was accused of ignoring the SGA constitution and violating numerous bylaws in a petition for his impeachment filed by senators Gladys Franco and Eduardo Bustamante.

Franco was accused of, among other offenses, failure to adhere to an enactment of the SGA.

"This was more of a result of lack of communication between Franco and the coordinating council," said Rules and Ethics Chair Joe Giarusso when commenting on the charges against Franco for ignoring a requirement to provide a detailed individual report from a trip to San Francisco, Calif. for conferences on race and ethnicity during the spring of 2003.

All discussion of charges was dismissed, although the charges could be brought to the floor with a three-fourth majority vote.

Chair Jason Bissonnette, who also announced his resignation from his senate position after four years of service, passed a resolution concerning the recent announcement that FleetBoston Financial will merge with Bank of America. The motion concerned the benefits the UMass community receives through Fleet Bank including fee free withdrawals from ATMs, free checking accounts and payroll check cashing at any FleetBoston Financial branch. In the merger announcement, Bank of America stated that it would look into relationships currently in place under Fleet. The senate enacted that University administrators would work to maintain the benefits that have direct effects on students.

In an act of recognition, Senator Adrienne Girard brought a motion to the floor to congratulate DiMare for his 25th year anniversary of becoming a practicing attorney. The motion also commended DiMare for his many years of service to students at UMass. President Dave Carr also worked on the motion, but was absent from the meeting.

Also announced at the meeting was the resignation of the Levi O'Brien, Chair of Administrative Affairs.

"[Senator O'Brien] is quitting senate for personal reasons," said Associate Speaker Christopher Eckle. "He's taken on a lot this semester, and he felt that he couldn't give his best to the SGA."

Senator James Brenan was appointed as the new Chair of Administrative Affairs.

Senator Dan Pomeroy was also appointed to a new position last night, as Chair of the RSO Advocacy Committee.

Motions to appoint Lisa Jollimore and Stacy Canepari to the SCERA Governing Board were passed. Katy Donaghey was appointed to the SLSO Governing Board.

According to Nokes, the SGA will have 15 vacant seats next semester. For more information on becoming involved with the senate, call the SGA office at 545-0342.

not equal to marriage, hence the need to bring about the Goodrigde case. Marriage provides legal protection at the federal level, while civil unions are only able to go as far as the state level.

Levi also discussed the transgender movement in relation to, and separate from, the gay and lesbian civil right movement. She talked about how the first sex discrimination law suits brought about by transgender people in the 1970s were ruled against on the basis that the court believed these people had not been discriminated against because of their sex, but rather because of their change of sex.

"I ask you to imagine if someone in a workplace was Presbyterian and then underwent faith transformation and became a Catholic, and they were fired because of that transformation," she said. "It's hard to imagine justifying that."

Although the Goodridge decision does set a milestone for civil rights cases in the United States, Levi pointed out that the effect of the decision has been stayed for 180 days in order to give the legislature the opportunity to respond. But Levi is optimistic.

"Even though this becomes a political hot potato, there is established widespread support for the outcome of this case," said Levi. "I think it will be at best a bumpy road ahead, but I'm hoping that in 181 days we'll see something positive."

Levi is a staff attorney at GLAD, New England's leading legal organization for ensuring equal justice under the law for gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender people, and people living with HIV/AIDS. She is a graduate of Wellesley College and the University of Chicago Law School. Levi's speech was hosted by Legal Studies class 497C, Civil Rights Laws in the United States.

EDITORIAL OPINION

Endorsement puts Dean further ahead

On Tuesday, former vice-president Al Gore officially endorsed 2004 presidential hopeful Howard Dean of Vermont. If recent opinion polls were not enough, the Gore endorsement makes Dean the clear democratic front-runner in the upcoming race.

Dean was the front-runner prior to the endorsement of Gore, but according to most, he lacked credibility. Gore all but erases that problem. A respected, influential and powerful figure amongst democrats, Gore will give Dean the credibility he needs to be viewed as a serious candidate.

Tom Daschle, the Senate minority leader, called the endorsement a "big prize" for Dean and his campaign, and stated that it puts Dean further ahead in the race for the democratic race than anyone has been so far.

Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, Gore's vice presidential running mate in 2000, was "taken off guard" by the endorsement, as Lieberman put it recently.

"What really bothers me is that Al is supporting a candidate who is so fundamentally opposed to the basic transformation that Bill Clinton brought to the Democratic Party," Lieberman said, possibly in regards to the Dean/Gore stance on the war in Iraq.

While Dean and Gore are both highly and openly critical of the war (being anti-war has been one of the foundations of Dean's campaign thus far), Lieberman has supported it. Dean's open opposition to President Bush and his staff certainly contributed to Lieberman's criticisms.

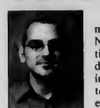
It is unusual for these types of attacks to occur this early into the presidential race, but Dean's relative inexperience on the mainstream political scene and his lack of credibility has accelerated the process.

While his lack of credibility and prominence may lead to attacks from both sides, Dean is actually using it to his advantage.

"We're not like the rest of these Washington campaigns," Dean said recently in South Carolina. The fact that he has been able to play off his lack of experience and still be considered a front-runner is why the Gore endorsement is such a big step forward for Dean.

But the question arises — was the Gore endorsement planned in advance by Dean? Did Dean, in fact, change his views in order to get the upper hand in the nomination race?

Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, who at one point was far ahead of his democratic competitors and now trails Dean badly in the polls, accused Dean of "flip flopping sides" on his stance on the war. Dean has openly admitted to backing an alternative to last fall's resolution that would have given the president the ability to wage war against Iraq without approval of Congress.



Kerry has said that Dean is wearing "two masks" and the endorsement by Gore cannot be taken seriously because that no one knows, which Dean is being endorsed: "Howard Dean exercised the exact same judgment that the rest of us exercised (regarding the Iraqi war resolution). I'm saying there are several Howard Deans."

Know one can truly know what led Gore to endorse Dean, and not another candidate (most specifically his former running mate). Gore has said Dean's opposition to the war and his ability to inspire the grassroots have been his biggest draws. Whatever the reason, and putting partisan politics aside, the Gore endorsement is a serious blow to the rest of the 2004 Democratic hopefuls, regardless of whether or not it may be the result of devious political tactics, or the honest opinion of a Washington heavyweight.

Time to bring back the draft

Jeff Napolitano

This past January, Congressman Charles B. Rangel from New York introduced legislation that would reactivate the draft, which was discontinued in 1973. Public opinion appears to be strongly against such efforts, with a Gallup/CNN poll finding 80 percent of the people opposed to such action and only 17 percent in favor. Initially, I shared the popular sentiment, but for several reasons, I've come to believe that a fair draft, including both men and women, with exemptions only for those with medical conditions and deferment for students, is highly preferable than the current system of enrollment.

Having a draft would force our population to confront the havoc it chooses to wreak upon other nations of the world.

My first reaction came from the desire to have nothing to do with perpetrating the war against the people of Iraq. I was strongly opposed to it, and am strongly opposed to ongoing U.S. occupation. Originally, I perceived a draft to be a form of support for war, but I now believe that a draft would result in a more calm population, less hasty to jump into war.

To understand why, we must recognize the military for what it is: essentially a private army composed of those who either wish to base a career in the military or those with no better options. In a country where the minimum wage is insufficient to survive and medical benefits hard to come by, the U.S. military is an institution largely for those with nowhere else to go.

Because such conditions make soldiers especially dependent upon employment, the government can, by and large, do what it will and not have to worry about dissent. Just like a private corporation, with the ability to hire and fire at will, closed to public scrutiny by a great extent, the U.S. military has far less restrictions upon it than if it had to accommodate a constant flow of conscripted citizenry.

This was not always the case, however. One of, if not the most important reasons the draft ended, was due to the soldier's revolt in Vietnam. In the 1960/70s, the conscripted U.S. army began rebelling against what was seen as either an immoral war or an officer corps with little regard for the lives of its subordinates.

By 1971, conditions were so bad in the army that the Armed Forces Journal reported, "... our army that now remains in Vietnam is in a state approaching collapse, with individual units avoiding or having refused combat, murdering their officers and noncommissioned officers, drug-ridden and dispirited where not near-mutinous..." (The popular term "fragging" comes from the mutinous act of rolling a fragmentation grenade into the quarters of one's officer.)

Shortly thereafter, the draft was ended, and the current system was put into place. Reactivating the draft now would bring about a collection of citizens which would not be so subordinate to the will of authority and would serve as at least some form of balance against egregious exercises of power.

Secondly, and most importantly, having a draft would force our population to confront the havoc it chooses to wreak upon other nations of the world. It is easy to support an abstract conflict, which one is completely removed from and difficult to sympathize with its victims. A conscripted military that created a direct link between choice and consequence would require a more rational process and sense of compassion, if only for the sake of self-interest.

If it were the blood of our upper, or even middle, classes which would spill, then we would surely observe a reduction of recent belligerent hypocrisy, illustrated best in a conversation I had with an adamant proponent of the latest war in Iraq: Surely, he was in favor of invasion, but when asked if he was willing to, or willing to have either of his sons, pick up a gun to fight, he readily admitted that he would not. Such moral cowardice would be far less abundant in the presence of a draft.

If the people were forced with the consequences of their actions, if a person who called for war actually had to fight it instead of delegating it to some working-class kid trying to find a way to pay for his education, if those who yelled "support our troops" were forced to actually be the troops, I am sure we would have far less of the recent mindless flag-waving and a far less warlike country.

A draft would force a more thorough examination of the causes of war, which would very likely save many lives. Had the U.S. public paid more attention to the proposed grounds for our latest war, those very fraudulent claims might have been quickly dismissed and tens of thousands of lives saved from disaster. Finally, while mandatory military service might be distasteful to some, it should not exclude it from being a responsibility we should all share.

I live in a computer world

Sanam Hakim

I live in a computer world. When I need to write a paper, I sit in a chair and whack my fingers on a keyboard until it's finished. I don't ever have to actually go to the library because I can find all the information I need by clicking on the little blue "e" on my desktop. For this reason, I hate it when teachers want me to photocopy the pages of the books I used in my research papers. Once a year per class, I am entitled to blame a missing paper on my computer for an extension.

I live in a computer world. If I subtracted the money I would have spent on CD's from my tuition money, I would lose almost two semesters. The last time I actually bought a CD was in junior high school. I get mildly annoyed when I get a CD as a present, because it takes more effort to open my cd-rom drive than to open a program. There are also probably songs on it I don't like, and there are so many other things I could have bought with $20.

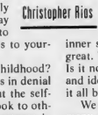
I get mildly annoyed when I get a CD as a present, because it takes more effort to open my cd-rom drive than to open a program. There are also probably songs on it that I don't like, and there are so many others things I could have bought with $20.

I live in a computer world. On my computer, I can talk to five people at the same time, while finishing my owls and eating a sandwich. I don't ever have to walk anywhere to ask anyone anything, because I can just ask them online: this includes my roommate. I can fool the masses by using the "away from keyboard" excuse when I'm really at my computer. (This, in my opinion, is a very underrated concept. If you are talking on the phone with someone, it is not socially acceptable to leave in the middle of a conversation, then say, "Sorry, I was away from telephone," which is socially acceptable online.) Everyone on my buddy list will know where I am at every moment of the day because my away message will change to my location and activity. Everyone on my buddy list will know if I am still awake or not, based on my away message and idle time.

I live in a computer world. If I had a 911 key on my keyboard, I probably wouldn't even need a room phone. I don't need to register for classes over the phone, because I can just do it through Spire (which isn't as bad as everyone says). I wouldn't need to order food, because I can order pizza online and pay cash for it. If I ever needed to call anyone, I can IP-relay them right from my computer.

I live in a computer world. I don't include my parents in this world. Actually, I think it's pretty weird that my mom has a screen name, and I think it's really funny that she gets confused when I say "ttyl" or "brb." I think it would be even weirder if my grandmother had a screen name, even if she spoke English.

I live in a computer world. I might consider saying yes to an online proposal, my wedding invitations will probably be sent via e-mail, and my entire wedding will probably be documented on my personal Web site. If my friends or family can't make it to my wedding, they can probably watch it live through a high-quality low-bandwidth wireless Web-cam. (Wait a few years; it will be the next big thing).



I live in a computer world. I will probably have a nine-month countdown in my profile for my first child. If my water breaks while I am sitting at my computer, I will probably put up an away message that says, "In labor, call the cell." Each of my children will probably have their own Web site, complete with annually updated pictures and sound recordings of their first words.

I live in a computer world. When I'm old, I will probably make a screen name like "HipOleGranny85" just to annoy my grandkids, who will all have me blocked. I wouldn't mind if my kids put me in a senior citizen home, as long as I have my own computer with an ftp server and Internet access. My chances of dying with my head on my keyboard are actually pretty high. On the day of my death, one of my final requests might just be, "Can you log off my screen name?"

I live in a computer world. But, before you sit back, look at my picture, laugh, and say, "Wow, this girl is pathetic," remember this: you probably have an away message up too.

Your own worst enemy

Christopher Rios

We spend much of our conscious life asking questions. We continually search for answers, for reasons why it is the way it is. If you're like me, you are relentlessly tough on yourself. You can give leeway to nearly every person you come into contact with. However, when it comes to yourself, you demand perfection.

Where does this idea come from? Childhood? Life experiences? Or are we all perhaps in denial or unhappy with who we are? Without the self-love one should give themselves; we look to others to find self-worth, beauty and greatness in us. Is it this idea and longing and need for acceptance what we call love? Do we not love those we wish would love us back? The old saying tends to be true; we pursue and desire that which we cannot have. I have continuously put myself in situations where there are unobtainable goals. But why? Is the hope and the dream of the payoff worth the pain of failure and rejection? I am here to say it is not.

We have all seen the movie, heard the line, "when life knocks you down, get up and keep fighting." But when is it time to concede defeat? Life is hard enough, but battling oneself is a losing battle. A struggle to change, be perfect, be liked, be loved. Why is it tough to be happy sometimes? For most of us when we were kids, a toy or small trinket seemed to do the trick. But now we search for deeper gratification. We walk with many, but we walk alone. We search for our own identity amongst hundreds of thousands. We search to be unique, to be special, different from the pack. It's funny how one person feeling this way about you is enough.

We can fall in love with many things and many people. If it was so great, I would not be sitting here writing with 'color blind' on repeat.

We have all been hurt; he or she can do it to you. How can one person have so much power and control over your mind, body and soul? I finally understand the lyrics "you're a god." Do 'they' not fit some of the definitions we give to a god? Fall in love, and I'm sure you'll understand. All powerful, with the ability to create and control all that is you. We get hurt and rejected, and we keep going. Seeing a man fall hopelessly in love is like watching a mosquito fly into a bug zapper. It's eminent death. It's sad that we see the light, yet still fly directly into it, willing to march to our end. The problem is that the light is so beautiful, filled with so much hope, and with so many ways to fulfill you, that one cannot help but pursue it.

In life, in business, we are supposed to make risk assessments. If the costs and potential hazards are too great, you are not to embark in the idea. When did the pursuit of love become the exception to the rule? Are self-esteem, happiness and mental stability important enough to not forego such an extreme risk? But yet we frivolously risk it all, at the chance, the hope, of love. Ah, yes, this is what makes love great, this incredible, amazing thing we would be willing to throw it all away for. NO. This misconception and lie has led to the downfall of many.

Love isn't great and love isn't amazing — love hurts. Amazing things happen all the time. A person who will not bend or break for their beliefs, a person who will stand in front of a moving military tank and not budge. Now that is a great thing. It's inner strength and being true to oneself that is great. The game of love is nothing to hold high. Is it not all just a game? We scheme with words and ideas to make that one person love us. Must it all be games and tricks? Naw, love ain't grand.

We can fall in love with many things and many people. If it was so great, I would not be sitting here writing with 'color blind' on repeat. I'd be out there falling in love with as many things and as many times as I could. Wouldn't we all keep falling in love as much as we could if it was so great? O.K., argue that we cannot choose who we fall in love with, can't we though? Do we not have things we look for, physical or personality traits, don't we all have different tastes? This idea of love has got everyone confused. Most are so sick and tired and lonely that they are willing to love anyone who will love them back. The saddest part is that we willingly accept rejection. We are fine with the idea of getting hurt. Would you allow anyone to physical harm you without a fight? Of course not, however we allow her, or him, to constantly hurt us, and we are so easy to find a reason, chalk it up to incompatibility or other issues at hand, when the truth is we should not allow anyone to hurt us. We keep allowing them to break us, and the conception that it is in the pursuit of love has proven to be the most powerful get-out-of-jail-free card.

I have personally had it with 'her.' I'm tired of the power she has over me, and her selfishness and the way 'she' makes me feel. I'm tired of how no matter what I'm doing or how I feel, she can change it. No cheesy lines, no romantic insights, just a frustration with being who we are and not being satisfied with what we have to offer. We must find 'her/him'; for some reason it's not the same without them. This is merely a fear of being alone. My advice, get a dog. At least when you call, they will answer.

In the end we are all just pursuing happiness, taking the route of love to find it is the most difficult one, yet that is the road we continually travel on. It is not the road less traveled, it is the road flooded with traffic and so many obstacles, that when you come out on the other end you are not the same person you were before. Take a different route, love things about yourself, even if she/he doesn't. The endless quest for love will have you beating yourself up and dreaming of ways in which you wish you could be different. You will question yourself, and that inner voice will not cut you any slack. This is why you are your own worst enemy. I say this to you, knowing that when I see 'her,' all my wisdom and ideology will be thrown out the window, all in the hope that this could be the one.

Hope for those with winter blues

Becky Martins

The holidays are not joyous times for all. Sometimes people find life empty and meaningless amidst the festivities and cheer.

Everyone has a bad day. It is only normal. But when feelings of sadness and insignificance become prolonged, there becomes reason to worry. Commonly, such a state is known as depression — an illness, according to the National Institute of Mental Health, that affects both our minds and bodies and is extremely hard to simply lift ourselves from. Millions of people suffer from depressive disorders worldwide and seek treatment to alleviate their symptoms and return to a normal life.

But each winter, depression rates are at their highest. According to mentalhealth.about.com, statistics consistently show that people develop a form of depression at the beginning of the holiday season and by spring, the illness has diminished. The type of depression has even become so common it was given a special name: Seasonal Affective Disorder, or SAD.

It is believed SAD may be caused by an array of things. During the holidays, we are surrounded with images of happiness, love and togetherness. But, according to mentalhealth.about.com, some individuals experience the "holiday blues" and associate this season with the negativity in their lives, even as far back as childhood. Some feel bitter if their current lives lack the warmth and good feeling the holidays seem to encompass. This time of year may also trigger memories of times not so good and cause individuals to dwell on them. Basically, the holiday season seems to trigger negative emotions in some people, eventually causing them to suffer from SAD.

But mainly, as mentalhealth.about.com states, research most supports the theory that SAD occurs because of the shortage of light. As we approach the holidays, the nights grow longer and the days shorter. In northern regions, the process of increased darkness marks the approach of colder weather. Most of us adjust to the natural occurrence, and the only difference we notice is an earlier sunset and a brighter morning to awaken to. But some people find themselves feeling sad, empty and alone as their light exposure gradually decreases. It is hard to believe a lack of daylight could spark bouts of depression, but year after year, the theory proves true.

Some individuals experience the 'holiday blues' and associate this season with the negativity in their lives, even as far back as childhood.

For those suffering from SAD, there is hope. According to mentalhealth.about.com, exposure to bright light has proved successful in alleviating symptoms, since it takes the place of the daylight we are missing. Researchers found that sitting under lights 30 minutes a day could improve someone's mental state. The light can even be fluorescent, since it has been found that any type is effective with SAD patients.

Many people throw around the world 'depressed' to simply define their feelings on a particularly bad day. But there is a difference between being sad and actually suffering from the mental disorder. Luckily, statistics show that suicide rates are at their lowest during the holidays, despite what many myths may state. But depression is still extremely common during this time of year, and should be dealt with accordingly. It may even be as simple as exposing ourselves to more light.

The holidays are always regarded as cheerful times. Thus, people experiencing negative emotions may not understand their origin, since it seems odd to feel so poorly during 'the most wonderful time of the year.' But they are not alone. During this holiday season and throughout the desolate winter months that follow, we should all be aware of our own emotional state, as well as that of others. It is important to help others, and ourselves, now and throughout the year, to overcome obstacles and regain a healthy mental state. People are not doomed to forever suffer from depressive disorders. There is a way out.

Winding down again

Jen Hodson

It's finally here. The last week of classes is winding down to an end, and thank God for that. I am exhausted, and I'm sure most others out there share the same feeling right now. An overwhelming sense of relief passes over me, as I realize the end of this semester is almost here.

Students are rushing to get last minute semester work and studying done, so they can head home for a nice relaxing winter break. I myself can't get over the amount of work on my plate. Although I have no finals and I'm sure I will regret saying this, I almost wish that I did. This is only because all my final papers and projects are due in the same week and on the same days.

The worst part is, is that I physically don't even have enough time in my day to complete the assignments for the next day's class. Ah yes, that's when endless nights of drinking Jolt Cola or pots of coffee kick in. Take my advice though, never drink both at once. That's a recipe for heart attack in a can. And you know it's bad when your away message says, "Taking a one-way ticket to hell," or "Gone to class," or "Don't talk to me till the semester is over."

Sometimes I wonder if professors even realize that their class isn't the only one that students are actually enrolled in:

"Dear Professor X, my name is Jen Hodson, and I am a student in your journalism class. I was wondering if I could take the time to possibly ask you for a favor. Would it be okay to get an extension on my paper so I can breathe now? It would be greatly appreciated. Thanks so much!

"Sincerely, a heavily asthmatic student."

Along with schoolwork, the pressure of doing well and graduating on time can make a student feel like they are being pulled in a million different directions. It doesn't particularly help when one's ADD kicks in either.

Example: "Hey Jen, did you forget that I told you to pick up your little brother?" "Uh, the who did what now?"

It's okay though, because any mistake is excusable during finals. It's like the commercial, "It's okay because I ate Subway last night." Which is true. I really did, but that's neither here nor there.

I keep reassuring myself though that there's only one week left, and before you know it Christmas and New Years will be right around the corner.

Christmas, ah yes, we have entered back into the season of purchases and returns. You know the routine, watching babies cry to get their picture taken with Santa, and people fighting over parking spots in the mall. "Hey, I was here first, jerk!" "Yeah, yeah, cool your jets Tony Danza."

We have entered back into the season of purchases and returns. You know the routine, watching babies cry to get their picture taken with Santa, and people fighting over parking spots in the mall.

But of course there are always perks, such as being back home with the rest of the family eating Christmas dinner, and unwrapping presents under the tree. Listening to holiday music, sleeping on the couch and watching my mom put reindeer antlers on the cat; yes, these are a few of my favorite things.

And pretty soon, we will be celebrating the birth of a new year. This is it. 2004: the most important year for seniors everywhere. In less than six months, the graduating class will be leaving this institution, but this time as a final departure. Will we all be asking ourselves the same question?

Where has the time gone?

I can't even fathom the idea that I have spent the last four years of my life at UMass. The thought of that time frame just boggles my mind. The pressure is on for us now to start getting recommendations, writing resumes and applying for job positions. We are tomorrow's future and whether or not that is a good or a bad thing; we'll just have to wait and see.

As for the time being, I will soak up the rest of what's left to enjoy, while I spend my final time here and look on memories past. The teenagers we were four years ago are far different from the young adults we've progressed into today. Who knows what will become of us? Maybe this time next year I will be wishing I was back at school worrying over papers and projects. Then again, maybe not.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

ON CHOOSING COMMUNITY SERVICE

Molly Eggleston's Dec. 8 column makes some valid points regarding the community service requirement of the My Body, My Health course at the University of Massachusetts. However, there are some areas in the piece that could use some additional information.

I agree it is not generally a good policy to "require" community service. In this case, though, the author (and other students enrolled in the course) had the option to (1) drop the course and thereby not complete the requirement or (2) choose from one of the many community based organizations in the Pioneer Valley, make a relatively small service commitment and enter the experience with an open mind.

The service opportunities in the Pioneer Valley are wide, varied and available in range of issue areas. "Stacking chairs at an event" is by no means a requirement of service. With a bit of research, perhaps Eggleston and her classmates could have found service placements in an area that suited them better.

While I do not generally agree that service should be required, an eighth hour placement in an elective course is by no means the travesty Eggleston makes it out to be. Instead, think of it as an assignment that, instead of requiring research in a library, requires research in the community outside of UMass. The point of the assignment was not only to "encourage [students] to give back to the community" but to show students what they had to gain by engaging in service.

Eggleston asked, "Why not make community service an extra credit opportunity?" Community service learning is available as an extra credit opportunity (through the UMass Office of Community Service Learning) to any UMass student who wishes to add service onto a course he or she is taking or who wants to engage in a more intensive independent study.

PROUD TO READ FANTASY AND SCIENCE FICTION LITERATURE

Robert Carey, in his Dec. 9 column, "Fantasy addicts and egotistical realists," voiced his opinion on a popular genre of literature.

As an avid reader of this genre, I'd like to know the titles of pieces of science fiction or fantasy Carey has read and wonder if he knows anyone who reads novels of this sort regularly. Would he consider them "cerebrally obese?"

If this author does not read "crap literature," how can he assume it is an "idle distraction that consumes a copious amount of time and contributes very little toward intellectual growth" or that people who read this genre will "completely lose [their] footing in reality" by continuing to do so? Readers of "crap literature" may be trying to escape from reality, but if you look around, it's easy to understand why. We are a country divided, both over international events and ones in America.

The themes of science fiction and fantasy novels are inundated with extraordinary elements, yes, but their underlying themes, which "are usually in small number and too straightforward," are actually prolific and universal. "The Lord of the Rings" trilogy, for example, is about a group of individuals who work together as a team effecting change, despite their differences.

I'm an English/journalism major and agree on the benefits of works of non-"crap literature," such as Shakespeare, whom Carey mentions. He specifically calls attention to the characters King Lear and Julius Caesar, claiming they help define great literature. Have you ever read "A Midsummer Night's Dream," in which fairies interfere in the lives of humans through magical means? Shakespeare wrote quite a few plays that could easily fall into Carey's category of "crap literature."

From Homer's "Odyssey" to novels such as "Brave New World," many works that are considered "classic" are full of "over-focalized plots and settings." The "Harry Potter" series, which Carey says he refuses to read "on the grounds that [he] read[s] enough crap literature as it is," in fact caused a resurgence of the love of reading in many children who disliked reading "boring" books.

As for me, I'll be first in line to "lurch forth from my hole" and head to the theater when "Return of the King" opens, proudly reveling in my place as one of many in a "[mass] of escapists." And, I will do so with a firm grasp on reality, accented and enforced by my love of "crap literature."

VOICE FOR THE ADOLESCENT

I am a student at Virginia Tech and would just like to let you know that the article, "What she does not know will kill you" by Matt Brochu is amazing. Although a few states away, I saw that his article has made its way here and to many more schools across the nation.

Brochu is truly a talented writer and has managed to express what every adolescent holds deep down inside. Students nation wide are quoting him in away messages, profiles, Web sites and much more. Congratulations to Brochu and all of your staff for holding the talent and ability to affect people nation wide.

ADDRESSING GENERALIZATIONS

We want to thank you for your coverage of the Violence Prevention workshop sponsored by the Sigma Psi Zeta sorority and led by Yeshi Chodon and Rani Varghese of Health Services on Dec. 10. This workshop looked at violence in some Asian-American communities.

We feel it is imperative to address violence in a variety of communities in order to understand the specific dynamics of how violence manifests for various people. We understand that in an article, workshop or letter it is impossible to cover all aspects of how violence impacts a specific community, or all of our communities, but we would like to add a few things.

First of all, it is critical not to stereotype any group, or assume that one individual speaks for a community as a whole. For example, one student participant is paraphrased as saying "a lot of Asian families are raised in a more aggressive environment, with spankings being common." While this might be her perspective, it is important to remember the diversity of experience in all communities, Asian or otherwise. If we look at the big picture of violence, we see that rates of violence are similar across all racial, ethnic, religious and class backgrounds.

Second, the article mentions connections between drinking, sexual violence and victim blaming. Much too often, statements like "she should have known better" or "she shouldn't have had so much to drink" are used to minimize, deny and justify sexual violence and divert responsibility from where it belongs — on the person who perpetrates the act of violence.

Finally, we hope that articles and workshops of this sort will continue to allow all UMass communities to discuss and find ways to effectively challenge all forms of violence.

Bringing back Truffula Trees

Gilad Skolnick

There is one country in the world that ended the 20th century with more trees than it began with; a country that has devoted over a century to reforestation and greening the land. I'm not talking about the United States or Liechtenstein.

In the beginning of the 1900s, this country's indigenous forests were just about completely eliminated by centuries of neglect, with hundreds of years of warfare, grazing and logging taking a heavy toll on environmental resources. When it declared independence, there were fewer than five million trees in the entire expanse of the country. Today it boasts over 200 million trees, according to bridgesforpeace.com.

It was a desolate barren land covered in deserts, forgotten and ignored by many. It's particularly rare in this day and age, in a world where just about every country is tearing apart their forests to have one country with very limited resources, devout its time to restore its beauty to what it was centuries ago.

Mark Twain in the 1800s, visited this place and described it as, "a desolate country whose soil is rich enough, but is given over wholly to weeds ... a silent mournful expanse ... a desolation." Not so, anymore.

Twain's description of this place reminds me of how the land looks in the end of "The Lorax" by Dr. Suess, a place which has been scrapped to the bone of any natural resources.

In the meantime, this nation has been working hard to reintroduce to the land animals that were hunted to extinction. Many animals mentioned in old texts could no longer be found here when independence was declared half a century ago, also victims of centuries of neglect and over-hunting.

The Fallow Deer was gone from here and was thought to be completely extinct until a herd of 25 was found in the '50s in Iran, according to the World Wildlife Fund. By 1972, the Oryx was completely extinct in the wild, and WWF reported the Roe Deer was hunted to extinction over 50 years ago as well. This nation has been on a continuous mission to restore its land to its diverse wildlife, so far succeeding in reintroducing all these animals into the wild, many of which can now only be found in the wild, in this place.

Today there are 116 different species of land animals in the country, compared with 140 in all of Europe, a landmass 300 times bigger. This country also boasts 375 nature reserves, which make up 16 percent of its land area, according to bridgesforpeace.com. Species now being raised for future release into the wild include the White Oryx, Ostrich, Persian Fallow Deer, Roe Deer and Asiatic Wild Ass, a feat that was once thought to be completely futile.

I'm very happy to see that this country, already plagued by terrorism and a struggling economy, is willing to devout so much time, energy and money to helping the environment. Able to both care about its people and its surroundings suggests that this country is a model to us all on protecting our dwindling natural resources.

Able to both care about its people and its surroundings suggests that this country is a model to us all on protecting our dwindling natural resources.

When it comes to fossil fuels, this country has made a concerted effort to use renewable energy. The world's largest solar power station is currently under construction here, according to distributedpower-solutions.com, while just about every home sports a solar panel used to heat water.

As countless animals are reintroduced into the land while dozens upon dozens of animals are becoming extinct daily in the rest of the world, I am inspired — inspired that there are places out there that make the environment a priority, and do not use the economy or a struggle against terror as an excuse.

This country is none other than Israel, a country once just about completely denuded of its natural treasures. The United States, and the rest of the world for that matter, should look at Israel as a guide, leading all of humanity into an age of greater environmental awareness.

Johnny's Top And Bottom Movies Of 2003

THE TOP

BY JOHNNY DONALDSON

"Lost in Translation" — Sofia Coppola's brilliant, lovely, moving, gorgeous postcard to Tokyo is quite possibly the best demonstration of the fact that Bill Murray is a man who needs an Oscar now. He's terrific as a Hollywood actor filming a series of whiskey ads in Japan, and he's matched by Scarlett Johansson as a lonely newlywed who befriends Murray over their shared feelings of isolation. Coppola's piquant romantic comedy is a pitch-perfect story of two lost souls connecting in a bustling, alien metropolis and is the one movie, above all others, that's necessary to seek out and savor for all its small, carefully crafted nuances.

"The Secret Lives of Dentists" — Alan Rudolph directs this stylish depiction of a marriage falling apart with equal parts caustic wit and genuine feeling. Campbell Scott as a dentist who suspects his wife (Hope Davis) of infidelity has never been better and Denis Leary steals scenes as the foul-mouthed personification of Scott's anxiety.

"Finding Nemo" — Shot in liquid images so supple and tactile that you almost feel as though you are right there floating in the ocean, "Finding Nemo" is a kid's animated film that's also the year's greatest example of truly beautiful pop art. A multi-tiered comedy that works for both kids and adults with sacrificing either audience. Deeply, movingly heartfelt, absolutely beautiful and wondrously funny, it's unexpected proof that the best showcase for the comic talents of Ellen DeGeneres and Albert Brooks are as animated fish.

"American Splendor" — A gloriously messy, skewed, jumbled amalgam of documentary, animation and wry suburban comedy. Based on the comic books of underground legend Harvey Pekar — which are in turn based on Pekar's life as a shambling, insecure misanthrope — "American Splendor" is a witty, heartfelt celebration of iconoclasm done with a remarkable, rubbery soul that bends the meaning of movie-making to its wondrously stretched limits. Paul Giamatti and Hope Davis (again) have the roles of a lifetime embodying the withered frame of Pekar and his wife, but it's the movie's notions of new cinematic boundaries that truly astound.

"The Magdalene Sisters" — Peter Mullan directs this harrowing fact-based tale with such burning, galvanizing humanity that it tears directly into your heart. "The Magdalene Sisters" is, essentially, a women's-prison picture turned into high art, but even as the tragedies and degradations pile up, the movie hints at a hopefulness and strength that even devastation can't tarnish.

"Thirteen" — With "Thirteen" you get to see a star being born. Evan Rachel Wood looks like she could be your average bubbly blonde teen starlet, but she acts with a tender fearlessness that zooms right into the roiling heart of her characters. Here she plays Tracy, an angelic seventh grader who slides into the abyss of self-destruction when the adolescent pangs of wanting to belong hit. Tracy's fall from sweet, wounded teenybopper to raging, desperate hellion may make for the scariest film of the year.

"Cabin Fever" — A flesh-eating virus that turns skin into rotting, raw shards of meat. A mute boy who delights in karate kicks and biting people. A party hearty sheriff's deputy with the soul of a stoner. Eli Roth's twisted, blackly comic horror film is this generation's equal to the guts-and-glory imagination of "The Evil Dead."

"Bend It Like Beckham" — Exhilarating. Gurinder Chadha's joyous comedy follows less (the supremely charming Parminder Nagra) an Anglo-Indian girl who longs to play girl's soccer but is torn between her desires and her duty to the tradition of the old world. The story is pure cornball formula, but Chadha directs it with such jubilant glee that one can't help but feel their spirits soar.

"Mystic River" — Powerful, dark, unrelentingly sad, Clint Eastwood's finest work of art in years is a Greek tragedy brought to the level of a working class Boston neighborhood. Sean Penn, Kevin Bacon and Tim Robbins turn in brutal, honest, harrowing performances as three childhood friends whose lives intersect once again when the daughter of one is murdered. At times overwrought, but nonetheless an unflinching depiction of grief and retribution.

"demonlover" — It derails in the final half hour and turns into the most elliptical, unfathomable film David Lynch. Until then though, Olivier Assayas' sleekly clinical, assured exploration of eroticism, alienation and corporate betrayal fascinates and beguile. Assayas has the hypnotic kick of a natural born filmmaker.

UMass-bred band drops into Springfield

On The Drop Tonight
The Fat Cat
Springfield

Friends compare their sound to Sublime, 311 and Incubus, but On The Drop lead guitarist and University of Massachusetts graduate Mike Baez says he can't really put a finger on what kind of music he, bass player Brian Taylor, drummer Tom Montilli and lead singer Jim Muro create.

On The Drop, a quartet based out of Boston, produces a reggae driven rock sound with jamband-like qualities.

Tonight they travel west to the familiar confines of the Pioneer Valley to play a set at the Fat Cat in downtown Springfield. Three of the four members of the band graduated from UMass.

"We are a high energy band with an original sound," Baez said. "It's pretty cool."

Last year the band released its first EP, titled "Cookies." The four-song disc provides listeners with a taste of the heavy bass lines and rocksteady guitar riffs that drive the On The Drop sound.

Their new LP, "Not Afraid," will be available in January.

The show begins tonight at 10 p.m. and there is a $5 cover charge.

The best unheard albums of 2003

Timothy Gabriele

Let me start by explaining my strategy in bringing you, loyal reader, my selections for the top 10 albums that you didn't hear in 2003.

Firstly, I would like to detach this particular list from any presumptions of musical snobbery. This is not a grocery bag of flavor of the months that can easily be discarded by next year, nor is it a hollow indier-than-thou-art boast from a bloated elitist setting out to prove how cool he is. In fact, the foundation of this list is the egalitarian ideal that every one of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian's readers should have access to each one of these stellar records. Let me also point out that the title of this list should not be taken literally. There are most likely at least a handful of you who have heard of more than one of these titles. In fact, I will be the first to admit that there is plenty of stuff both mainstream and underground that I have yet to pick up (I hear the new Jay-Z is fantastic). I apologize for any glaring omissions. However, I firmly believe that these 10 (or 12) albums stand as the pinnacle of musicianship in 2003.

I decided to focus on the broad range of tones that the majority of people on campus may not have been exposed to rather than simply picking anything non-mainstream. For instance, while MTV and radio have still not caught on to the Postal Service's "Give Up" (which may be the best album of 2003), there are enough heads bobbing up and down to it daily to eliminate the need for it on a list such as this. Similarly, Broken Social Scene's "You Forgot It In People" was disqualified after I noticed that more than a few people were sharing it on canofsleep.com.

Lastly, let it be said that I tried my very best not to cheat. You see, like most music geeks, I have a fondness for making lists. This fondness is only overshadowed by my inability to be exclusive when I feel very strongly about an album. Bear this in mind when you discover the "tie" for the number two position. I can only really justify making a top 10 list with eleven albums by stating that the M83 is currently available as a European import and will likely not see a stateside release until at least Spring 2004. Coupled with the M83 album is a similarly minded album from Canada's Manitoba, which is readily available from your local music dealer, for those who do not want to deal with those stiff tariffs on French electronica.

Alright, 'nuff said. Here they are.

1) Various Artists- "Lost in Translation" Soundtrack

The soundtrack to the best film of the 21st century so far should not be casually ignored. Sofia Coppolla's fantastic tailor-made mix-tape is like super eight footage of that hyperkinetic feeling of being young and alive in a world of possibilities. The digital high never outsteps its boundaries and remains as subtle and engaging as the film itself. A soundtrack that features the triumphant return of My Bloody Valentine's Kevin Shields, back in perfect pop form with Beach Boys-esque "City Girl," is certainly not one to be taken lightly. His influence can easily be felt in several of the other items in this top 10 and throughout the broader musical landscape.

The highlight of the album is ... well, My Bloody Valentine's "Sometimes," placed gorgeously after the delicate Shields original "Ikebana." But since that song is 12 years old, the next best thing is Death In Vegas' "Girls," which sounds like it could have been culled off from the "Loveless" sessions. "Girls," which also appears on DIV's otherwise lackluster 2003 album "Scorpio Rising" is pure texture and shimmer, big drums and sweet coos, and pure blissful reverb. The only downside to the album is the exclusion of a proper version of Roxy Music's "More than This," which makes a particularly moving appearance in the film. Perhaps next year, a "karaoke" second edition of the soundtrack will find its way onto wish lists of starry-eyed shoegazers everywhere.

2) M83- "Dead Cities, Red Seas and Lost Ghosts" Manitoba- "Up in Flames"

Both of these albums hooked me nearly instantly. The M83 album is still relatively new to me, but I remain certain that it will soon find its way into the pop music vernacular. Imagine if you will, a cross between the string sections of "Sigur Ros," the ethereal warmth of "Boards of Canada," the blistering intensity of the final two tracks on "Dark Side of the Moon" and the prettiness of the best tracks off of "Selected Ambient Works II."

Add an immensely rich choir of analogue synths, and you're almost ready to experience "Dead Cities, Red Seas and Lost Ghosts." It is albums as beautiful as this one that make the hopelessly idealistic belief in a utopian world without wars. Perhaps the album's closest sonic equivalent is the Western Hemisphere's "Up in Flames" by Canada's Manitoba (man, Canadians do treat their electronic music good).

In the span of two albums, Manitoba has gone from crafting sweetly pleasing but overall unremarkable glitchery to the most organic laptop album ever made. Sure, there are plenty of "real" instruments (voice, recorders, flutes, sax, drums, drums, drums) featured on this album for all the technophobic naysayers, but it's the studio wizardry that really shines.

The band's 1960s fetish ("Hendrix with KO," "Everytime She Turns Around It's Her Birthday") aptly emphasizes the exciting feeling of psychedelic experimentation on this holistically appealing sensory experience. Their live show is also not to be missed.

3) Ellen Allien- "Berlinette"

Continuing on our trip around the globe is Germany's Ellen Allien, the founder of the Thom Yorke approved BPitch Control records. Although most of BPitch's catalogue still has not found its way to the States, those lucky enough to be in the know were treated with a neo-electro's shining moment when Allien dropped "Berlinette" this summer.

This meticulous bleep-tweaking temptress can use a vocoder like no others before her, and she drops as many jaws on the dance floor as she shakes asses. Electronic music has always prided itself on its ability to change rapidly to meet the demands of the technology of the hour. More often than not, it is not the music but the technology that suffers from the inability of artists to rigorously explore the space they are given with their new tools.

"Berlinette" is filled with hi-fi gadgetry and expert knob-twiddling, but the talented Ms. Allien has used taken her time to fashion aural soundscapes that sound like no other in the history of music.

4) The Bug- "Pressure"

After raising eyebrows with a string of high-profile singles and a masterful accompanying piece to Francis Ford Coppola's "The Conversation," Kevin Martin (aka Techno Animal, Ice, God, the Bug) received the blessing of the two patron saints of IDM to release this explosive and fierce reggae dancehall jam record: Aphex Twin's "Rephlex" released it overseas and Kid606's Tigerbeat6 was the American distributor. Never one to confine himself to a genre nor constrain himself from redefining one he feels has grown stale, Martin's The Bug project has sent waves through the hip-hop, reggae, and electronic undergrounds. Don't worry. The white English-man never attempts to cop a Jamaican accent and bust out his best UB40 impression. Instead, he employs the manic energy of a myriad of worthy collaborators including Daddy Fresh, the Rootsman and Roger Robinson. The second track entitled "Beats, Bombs, Bass and Weapons" sums it up the best. This album sets out to do the same thing that Techno Animal's DHR did, to beat the hell out of you with noise.

5) Tok Tok Vs. Soffy O- "Tok Tok Vs. Soffy O"

Perhaps the biggest discontent for the current Electroclash movement stems from the way that it often sounds exactly like pop music, only boring. Though Soffy O has been bumping out of the same speakers as Miss Kitten and Felix lately, she hardly sounds like she's been having too many dull moments in the past few years. That is, she actually vocalizes on this album. So before you rush out to the store, make no mistake that this is pop music that would sit well alongside the likes of Kylie Minogue or, gasp, even Britney. Where Soffy O avoids the pitfalls, and subsequently the popularity, of her product-moving superiors is in her choice of Neptunes, so to speak. Coming hot off a string of releases on Ellen Allien's Bpitch Conirol records, Tok Tok have harnessed their inner Depeche Mode for some surprisingly immediate and glossy synthpop that doesn't suck.

6) Lightning Bolt- "Wonderful Rainbow"

Forget the White Stripes. This Providence twosome's new album is the real music to rock out to. For the kids, it's instrumental hardcore music with bite and vigor without resorting to forced growls and hollow chants. For old-timers, it's Borbetomagus by way of The Boredoms with specific focus on melody. Luckily for us, that focus never compromises the massive wall-of-sound that one bass and one drumkit can deliver. It is truly a wonderful rainbow, though you're never quite certain whether it will start raining blood at any moment.

7) Erase Errata- "At Crystal Palace"

The owls on the album's cover are not what they seem. Don't bother trying to figure out the twisted carnival of broken, wrangled melodies and dada lyrics on this little slice of San Fransiscan No Wave revival zen. Just be satisfied that lead Cheshire cat Jenny Hoyston's twitch is most likely bigger than her bite. After all, if it weren't, why would this frantic and wiry artpunk album be so damned danceable?

8) Sweet Trip- "Velocity: Design: Comfort"

Speaking of broken records, what were Sweet Trip on when they made this overwhelmingly complex and intricate album and how can we can get the government to issue a mandate requiring every man, woman and child to take some? Sounding like The Notwist if they took 24 years to finish every album or Four Tet if he swapped a breakbeat for a Ride album, not a second passes on this buzzing and heavily modulated album where something new and unexpected does not strike the ear. The strangest aspect of this album then is how utterly accessible it sounds and how even the most dizzying, breakneck-speed RPMs work better to relax you than any chill out album ever made.

9) Broadcast- "Haha Sound"

People squint their eyes and contort their faces when I describe Broadcast as a mix of the Beach Boys, West Side Story and Portishead. It's only a matter of a single spindle drop onto one of Trish Keenan's moog-backed "oohs" and "aaaahs" before they are the unlikely converts to this unique and wonderful band. "Haha Sound's" lush productions pull off what was once thought impossible by this critic. They actually improve upon 2000's "The Noise Made by People."

10) Read Yellow- "Read Yellow EP"

So maybe this album is even more well-known on campus than the other albums excluded from this collection, but much of the country has yet to catch on to the Read Yellow phenomenon. UMass' darlings spiced up their Sharks demo tape with a fine toothpick to show limitless potential on their debut. Taking their cues from that brief period of time between MC5 and "And You Will Know Us by the Trail of the Dead" called punk rock, these four tracks are everything that rock 'n' roll should be; raw, dirty, sexy, and sincere.

UM football to remain I-AA

"The work of the committee and the findings of this report will only serve to better the University's football program and athletic department as a whole.

"We're excited about the success our football team has enjoyed and the excitement it has generated among supporters of the program, and we will continue to work at finding the best possible ways to accentuate what is a very positive aspect of the University as a whole.

"In an effort to position the Massachusetts football program and athletics department for furthered success, the ad hoc committee recommended the following actions."

The Chancellor of the Amherst campus will develop a five-year plan for intercollegiate athletics that includes the continued development of the current football program at the Division I-AA level, without reducing or eliminating scholarships.

This plan will include the following elements:

-Development of 501c3 athletic association to encompass the entire intercollegiate athletic department's revenue and expenses.

-Development of a fundraising plan capable of sustaining the intercollegiate athletic program at competitive levels for football and the other sports the university sponsors.

-Development of a capital plan to address facilities issues for football at the Division I-AA level and other sponsored sports at the Division I level.

-Development of a budget plan that ensures fiscal solvency of the intercollegiate athletic program within three to five years.

-Development of a promotional plan that will build the audiences for Minuteman intercollegiate sports in football, basketball (men's and women's), hockey and other programs as appropriate.

The chancellor will work with the athletic director to monitor the changing environment of the college football landscape to identify opportunities for alterations in the level of football competition. When such opportunities arise, another review of the support presently available for Division I-A football will be requested.

The chancellor will also report on the progress of such initiatives annually through the president to the Athletic Committee of the Board of Trustees.

Committee members theorized that UMass has the potential to improve operations, performance and the revenue-generating capacity of its athletic program, and that the Institution needs to do so if it hopes to take advantage of such opportunities that may arise in the future.

Future ballers should stay in school ing the biggest mistake of his life? Most likely not, but there are many possibilities. Just ask Leon Smith.

Smith was a big man beyond years after leaving for the big time in 1999, straight out of Martin Luther King High School in Chicago. After being picked 29th overall, he was cut by the Supersonics and has struggled to find identity in the NBDL. Smith is just one of many players about whom we ask, "How good could he have been?"

Think about all the untapped potential that a coach like UConn's Jim Calhoun could have got out of Smith. Calhoun has produced solid college centers that made the professional jump with less athleticism than Smith. Guys like Travis Knight and Jake Voskuhl — players who, in their own right, are good enough for the pros, but no better than Leon Smith. In fact, the Huskies' current center, Emeka Okafor, was a raw talent coming out of Houston and could be the No. 1 or 2 pick in this upcoming draft. Who could go before Okafor, the most dominant defensive force in NCAA since Tim Duncan? Of course, it's a high schooler.

Dwight Howard has not signed his intentions to any school, but he seems like the kid could be in the NBA by next season. He's a 6-foot-11-inch center with great footwork. Looking at this kid, all that comes to mind is Kwame Brown — a talented man-child with big expectations. But at 225 pounds, Howard could use some weight training, and could use a year in college to find out if he can dominate like Carmelo Anthony did. Then, he can go for cash and fame. It's working for 'Melo.'

The point is, for every LeBron James success story you will have three Leon Smith-type failures. Dontonio Wingfield was a high-flying, scoring machine after a year with Bobby Higgins and the Bearcats, and he took off and didn't even get drafted. Florida's Donnell Harvey could have been an all-star someday if he developed his post game and understood the concept of defense.

If you stay in college for four years, then declare you've got no excuses if you don't make it. If you cut your collegiate career short or skip it altogether, you have no one to blame but yourself. The opportunities for an education, great coaching, development, maturity and everything college could offer were there, but you wanted the money now.

Hey Mayo, you'd look great in UNC jersey, and I bet Roy Williams knows a thing or two about point guards. Think about it.

type of season that we were having, and that's the only team we didn't beat last year in Hockey East. It'd be a good note to end the semester on, and it would be nice to jump over them in the standings."

The two teams are deadlocked at 11 points apiece in the Hockey East standings.

While the Wildcats have another conference game before the holiday break, against Merrimack on Saturday, tonight is the last chance for the Minutemen to make strides in Hockey East before the new year.

"It'd be nice to get a win over this team, and stop that cycle," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "It's real important for us to play well at home, real important for us to play well against a top team. That's all the motivation right there. And hey, if we do a good job and beat them [tonight], we're ahead of them in the standings."

The prolonged break from competition brings with it the threat of rust, but neither Cahoon nor Mauldin think the Minutemen will have any trouble hitting full speed tonight.

"I'm not really too worried about it," Mauldin said. "Our practices have been intense, with a lot of energy. The guys haven't been home in a little while, I think we'll be O.K."

The hosts are also hoping for a large turnout at the Mullins Center tonight, and the athletic department staff is following suit. The first 2,000 fans to enter the arena will receive Hawaiian leis for tonight's "Cahoonaville Night" promotion. UMass hopes to break the attendance record set on Nov. 14, when 7,113 people saw the Boston College Eagles down UMass 4-1. That crowd was the largest ever to see a home UMass hockey game.

Ticket sales have reportedly been high this week, and a large crowd, according to Mauldin, might just be what the Minutemen need to break their eight-game losing streak against UNH.

"It's almost like a playoff atmosphere," he said. "Any time you have 5,000, 6,000 in here, or anywhere, it's going to be like a playoff atmosphere. Obviously you want to play better, you want to be that much more ready for the game."

While they're still among the best in the conference, the defending Hockey East champion Wildcats have been underachieving this year. Even goaltender Mike Ayers, who shared Player of the Year honors with Boston College's Ben Eaves last season, hasn't been himself.

Although his .904 save percentage is fourth-best in Hockey East, a 2.75 goals against average has him down at seventh among HEA netminders.

UMass football to remain I-AA

Groundwork continues to be laid for potential jump to Division I-A

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Basing their decision on the results of a feasibility study conducted by Chicago-based Grenzenbach Glier and Associates, members of a special ad hoc athletics committee announced today that the Massachusetts football program should remain at the Division I-AA level, but continue to lay the groundwork for an eventual move to Division I-A.

"As with any major initiative requiring a significant capital investment, we need to make preparations and to be ready to strike when we see an opportunity that will bring us a high degree of success," said James J. Karam, co-chairman of the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees Ad Hoc Committee on Athletics.

"There is a strong and eager constituency for Division I-A football, but we should not take this step until we have all the ingredients needed to make the move an unqualified and enduring success," committee co-chair Robert Meers added.

Meeting in Boston at the office of the UMass president, members of the athletics study committee reviewed the findings of the study that examined the feasibility of developing a privately funded Division I-A football program at the University's flagship campus.

Citing significant uncertainty in two critical areas — the present economy and the lack of prospects for affiliation with a major conference — the authors of the study recommended that the University continue to further the development of its athletics and football programs and revisit the possibility of a jump to Division I-A in three to five years.

The study also notes, "The question of Division I-A football at UMass Amherst is generally regarded as a decades-long campus conversation."

Over that period, UMass had fielded a highly successful I-AA football team which won the National Championship in 1998 and Atlantic 10 titles in 1999 as well as this past season.

"UMass is one of the premier I-AA football programs in the country," Massachusetts head coach Mark Whipple said in an interview a week prior to the announcement of the committee's decision. "No matter what division we're in, all we're aiming to do is win football games and graduate student-athletes.

"But there should be no question where this program wants to be, and where its fans and supporters should want it to be, and that's [Division] I-A."

The study also noted various factors that make a move to Division I-A desirable for a football program. Included among them were potential boosts in student and faculty recruitment that the move could support, along with the possibility of generating additional private financial funding among alumni and other various contributors.

Factors included in the report that indicate the need for a more deliberate approach when considering the move are the national and regional economic slump, which increases in difficulty the ability to generate funds necessary to make a Division I-A football program self-sufficient, as well as the recent shifting among the major Division I athletic conferences that makes it difficult to acquire appropriate conference affiliation.

Karam, a current member of the University's Board of Trustees, declared that the study "is already paying significant dividends," and adds that, "as a result of this undertaking, we have developed a roadmap for success. We have been able to make powerful new friends for UMass Amherst football, and we see that UMass football is generating new levels of excitement and energy.

"This augurs well for the future ... under Chancellor John Lombardi's leadership, an athletics program that already enjoys considerable success is going to reach new heights."

Interim athletic director Thorr Bjorn agrees.

Mass Attack seeks revenge from defending HE champion UNH

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

It's been 12 days since the No. 8 Massachusetts hockey team last played a game, 16 days since the Minutemen's last win, and 22 days since their last game against a Hockey East team.

Needless to say, they're ready to get back to hockey. They'll get that chance tonight when the No. 5 New Hampshire Wildcats visit the Mullins Center (7 p.m.).

UMass hasn't posted a victory since Nov. 25, a 4-2 non-conference win over Vermont. Since then, the team has lost a 7-2 decision to Nebraska-Omaha, and fought to a 1-1 tie with UNO the next night. As a result of its trip to Nebraska, the team saw a number of its players contract the flu.

For the Minutemen, however, it couldn't have come at a better time, because after the postponement of Sunday's game at Boston University due to the Nor'easter that struck the region, the squad had a full 12 days to shake the affliction that weakened its ranks.

Tonight, the Minutemen have their first shot at the team that eliminated them from the Hockey East playoffs since March 14, when the Wildcats ended UMass' historic playoff run with a 5-4 win at the FleetCenter in Boston.

In that game, the Minutemen battled back from a pair of two-goal deficits, but Preston Callander's goal at 17:01 of the third period gave the Wildcats the final edge.

UMass has never had much success against UNH. The all-time series is skewed heavily towards tonight's visitors, and the Minutemen haven't beaten the Wildcats in over a year and a half, dating back to March of 2001.

UNH is the only Hockey East team the Minutemen didn't defeat at least once last year.

"There's a little revenge factor," UMass junior forward Greg Mauldin said. "They eliminated us from the 'Cinderella'

Swimming and diving set for break

By Matt Barstow
Collegian Staff

Heading into the holiday season, the Massachusetts swimming and diving teams have much to celebrate. The Minutemen (3-0) are coming off an impressive showing at the Nutmeg Invitational, where the squad captured 12 events during the three-day competition.

Formatted to duplicate the Atlantic 10 Championships, 19 freshmen from the men's and women's teams experienced tournament action for the first time.

Junior Dylan Smith helped lead the Minutemen, with wins in the 100 and 200-yard butterfly. Smith was previously named the A-10 Swimmer of the Week after taking four events against BU Nov. 8.

Also wining two events was freshman Greg Chartier, who placed first in the in the 400-yard individual medley (4:05.08) and 500-yard freestyle (4:38.48). Chartier finished the day by swimming a leg on the winning 800-yard free relay team. Following the meet, Chartier was named the Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week for the second time this season.

Fellow freshman Gordon Leonard tallied two victories as well. The sprinter took gold in the 50 and 100-yard free, with times of 21.91 and 47.81, respectively.

"This team is starting to show a lot of depth," men's coach Russ Yarworth said. "The youngsters have tons of talent and the upperclassmen are great leaders, this [weekend] was team effort."

The Maroon and White won't have much time to celebrate their success, as they prepare for a trip to the tropics, Saturday, Jan. 4, where they will compete in the San Juan Invitational in Puerto Rico. The Invite is a non-scoring affair that will pit Massachusetts against unknown competition.

"We won't know who we're facing until we get there. I think Army and Notre Dame will be there, but since it's a scrimmage random teams that can afford to go will be there," Yarworth said. "The kids raised all the money for the trip, and it should be a nice getaway."

After six days in Puerto Rico, the Minutemen will fly back to New England for the Rhode Island Invitational Saturday, Jan. 10 and 11, in South Kingston R.I. The squad will need to be careful not to let URI, Dartmouth and La Salle, de-rail their run for a fourth consecutive A-10 title. The squad will be forced to shake off jet lag, as they will fly into Rhode Island from San Juan on the eve of the Invite.

After the weekend competition in South Kingston, the teams will travel to New Haven Connecticut for the dual meet at Southern Connecticut St., Saturday, Jan. 18.

Divers from the men's and women's teams will be on a training exercise, so UMass will enter the competition at a disadvantage.

"The Dual meet versus Southern Connecticut will be the reverse of what we dealt with in the St. John's meet, except this time it will be our swimmers who will have to play catch-up for the forfeited diving points," Yarworth said.

UMass will finish off the break with a dual meet at Boston College, Saturday, Jan. 24. According to Yarworth, UMass has extra incentive to defeat BC (4-1).

"I think we've only lost to BC once in my career, but back in '87 or '88 they beat us to break our 43 meet winning streak, and we don't forget that too easily," Yarworth said jokingly.

By this point in the season, the Minutewomen will face a tough opponent in the Eagles (6-1).

The Maroon and White are entering the break led by captains Diana Alberti and Lauren Rowell, who were named this week's Co-A-10 Female Performers of the Week. Alberti, the teams butterfly specialist, won her event in both the 100 and 200-yard distances, with times of 59.15 and 2:07.42, respectively.

Rowell took top honors in the 200-yard IM (2:09.93) and the 200-yard back (2:09.06).

Both sprinters swam a leg on the winning 200-yard medley relay team, which was anchored by fellow tri-captain Christen Dexter and sophomore Aimee Bourassa.

The undefeated 200-yard free relay team had another impressive performance, winning in 1:38.83.

Pats place Paxton on IR, resign Centers

FOXBORO — The New England Patriots have placed long snapper Lonie Paxton on injured reserve and resigned veteran fullback Larry Centers, the NFL's all-time leader in career receptions among running backs.

Paxton injured his knee in the team's 12-0 victory Sunday over Miami.

Sean McDermott, who has played for Miami, Tampa Bay and Houston in his three-year NFL career, will assume Paxton's duties of snapping on punts, field goals and extra points, head coach Bill Belichick said Wednesday.

Centers appeared in the first six games of the season for New England before injuring his knee. He rushed for 69 yards and caught 17 passes for 96 yards and one touchdown.

The Patriots chose to release Centers with an injury settlement rather than place him on injured reserve, which would have precluded him from returning to action this season.

To make room on the roster for Centers, the Patriots waived veteran wide receiver J.J. Stokes, who was signed Nov. 18 after being waived by Jacksonville. He appeared in two games and caught two passes.

Also Wednesday, the Patriots signed punter Travis Dorsch to their practice squad and waived rookie offensive lineman Jamil Soriano from the practice squad.

Dorsch was the fourth-round draft choice of the Cincinnati Bengals in 2002 but appeared in only one game. He is the second punter to be signed by New England in as many weeks. The team cut Ken Walter last week and signed rookie Brooks Barnard, who punted 10 times for a 36.5 average in the Miami game.

Staying in school the better option

Todd Foster

Imagine you're a 15-year-old boy who is about to start his first day of high school. You would probably be excited, as well as confused about your new surroundings. A new class of seniors has been waiting three long years to mess with your head. Or maybe you are the most popular kid in school who is already being called "the next LeBron," and have NBA scouts waiting for you in Algebra.

Welcome to the life of O.J. Mayo.

Mayo is already 6-foot-4-inch, and has been the main-man since seventh grade for Rose Christian School in Ashland, Ky. At the age of 14, the teenage phenomenon averaged 23.1 points per game for the high school varsity squad, creating a huge media buzz before the kid reached puberty.

Then, he decided to transfer to North College Hill High School in suburban Cincinnati — King James' stomping grounds. Everything from his own Web site to local news stalking his every move has made the kid a media craze before his first report card. Now, I bet you're thinking, 'what a great life,' but don't you feel there is something wrong with this picture?

How can you tell some teenager, whose mind isn't developed enough to think past the instant money, cars, women and fame, not to skip school?

Obviously, Mayo already believes he'll be in the NBA, so he's basically going to have to learn just basic math for the rest of his career.

It's an absolute travesty to corrupt a young mind into thinking his future is set in stone. What if he gets injured and can never play again? Could he possibly not be truly good enough for the NBA, and fade into obscurity after mak-

RAs vote on first contract as a union

Future pay raises become key issue

By Ferron Salniker
Collegian Staff

Last night the resident assistants at the University of Massachusetts were scheduled to vote on ratifying their first-ever union contract.

"This is a truly historic agreement," said James A.W. Shaw, President of the International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America Local 2322 in a recent press release.

"Student workers, just like all workers, have important workplace concerns that are best addressed through collective bargaining," said Shaw. "This is a great contract that improves and protects the working conditions of RAs. This contract proves the value of a union not just for RAs, but for all workers."

Currently, as stated in a press release from the UAW Local 2322, RAs currently earn $50.29 per week. Recently, a committee working with UAW Local 2322 settled a tentative contract with University negotiators that calls for a wage increase of about 31 percent over the span of a two-year contract. The tentative contract would raise earnings to $61.76 per week for the 2003-2004 academic year and raised again to $64.71 for first-year RAs and $66.18 for returning RAs.

The contract also includes a binding grievance/arbitration procedure, improved parking privileges and guaranteed quality-working conditions. Once ratified, the contract would run from July 1, 2003 to June 30, 2005.

If RAs approve the agreement it will be the first time in the country that RAs have negotiated a union contract.

"We are very pleased with the tentative agreement that has been reached regarding our undergraduate student resident assistants," said Chancellor John V. Lombardi in a recent press release. "We recognize the leadership role these students play among their peers within our residence halls. We applaud the work they do and we are very pleased that we will be able to increase their stipends."

The University of Massachusetts RAs had already made recent history last year, by becoming the first RAs in the country to form a union. The campaign to unionize began in February 2001, in April of 2001 RAs petitioned the Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission for a union election. The University opposed the RA efforts.

The MLRC determined in January of 2002 that RAs do have the right to organize. On March 5, 2002 RAs voted to form a union, but the university refused to bargain, leading to a spring of union demonstrations, including one sit-in that led to 35 arrests. By summer of 2002 the parties agreed to bargain.

Cuts may cause departments to merge

By Megan Daley
Collegian Correspondent

With the repercussions of budget cuts still hurting the University of Massachusetts, officials are contemplating merging some departments to save money, according to one member of the Faculty Senate.

Faculty Senate Secretary Ernest May said one such merge is between the journalism and communications departments. The journalism program, which "is getting smaller" in terms of faculty, could be housed under the Department of Communications, said May.

Another merge that is under consideration may affect the language departments. If the change occurs, all languages will be grouped in one department instead of separate ones. This department will be called the Department of Language, Literature and Culture, May said.

May said four Public Health departments may also combine. The Nutrition and Exercise Department, however, will remain independent. The Entomology and the Plant and Soil departments may merge under the College of Natural Resources and Environment, she said.

May stresses that the proposed merge of the departments will not affect programs. He went on to say that there are more opportunities for larger, healthier departments, describing a "healthy department" as one with "12-50 faculty members" instead of the handful that some departments have found themselves with.

May expects that long-term savings will result from these department merges.

"I don't expect that students will see any immediate savings by next September or anything, but in the long period, I think we will see savings," he said. "Mergers are always preferable to elimination of a program."

These merges are now under consideration by the provost, the deans and the departments. May expects the final, formal proposal to be brought before the Faculty Senate sometime in January and confirmed in the spring semester.

University provost and vice-chancellor of academic affairs, Charlena Seymour said that the provost's office is constantly evaluating the University's programs and departments to make sure they do what they are supposed to do. Programs that can be removed without inconveniencing the student body to a great extent are the ones that are cut when the budget is slashed, she said.

The office of the provost, Seymour said, is the academic filtering system of the UMass campus. All curricular programs, from Commonwealth College to the School of Management, answer to

Groups speak out against surveillance

By Nathan Chomsky-Higgins
Collegian Correspondent

The Graduate Employee Organization held a press conference yesterday to announce its plans to oppose a new fee the University of Massachusetts is planning to impose on international students.

More than 80 people attended the event in the basement of the Campus Center. Signs at the conference denounced the new fee, with sayings such as, "Act now to stop war and end racism" and "No racist profiling on campus."

The $65 per semester fee is only applicable for international students, and is in addition to all the other fees international students must pay. Its purpose is to fund a new program called the Student and Exchange Visitor Information System.

SEVIS is a database that links colleges and universities to the recently created Department of Homeland Security. It monitors the activities of all international students, including location, classes taken, hours worked, status of bills, and any other information they deem necessary to obtain. The database is supposed to be updated in real-time by the University.

"Not only are international students, of which I am one, being forced to pay for their own surveillance, but are being discriminated against in the campus community," said Ibrahim Dahlstrom-Hakki, secretary treasurer of the GEO/UAW and doctoral student in psychology. He is also an international student from Jordan.

SEVIS is mandated under the USA Patriot

Rape survivor creates RSO to fight back

By MeiMei Thai
Collegian Correspondent

Rape is a crime the University of Massachusetts knows all too well. One survivor is in the process of doing something about it by making an organization to fight rape and violence against women.

During the 2001 spring semester, Melissa L. Clarady, at that time a freshman, said she was raped in her dorm room on the 11th floor of John Quincy Adams Hall.

According to Clarady, prior to the incident, she had finished spending time with her friends on the eighth floor, and walked up the stairs to her room alone, where she saw two males standing in her hallway. She went into her room to get some bathroom items to wash up, she said, but as she opened the door, she came face-to-face with the men. She tried to close the door, but one of the men placed his foot to block it.

She said the two men who raped her were caught about eight months later. One is currently in jail, for about 15 years, for assault and battery, robbery, and other crimes he committed. The other went through counseling and has volunteered to help battered women at a women's crisis shelter in Hartford, Conn. He also talks to high school students to warn them of the dangers of rape.

Clarady said she went through two years of self-blame and anger.

"It doesn't just destroy your life, but everyone around you — your family and friends," she said. "I lost a couple of good friends because I shut them out."

Now, Clarady said she's been planning to start a new organization regarding violence, and she has several ideas in helping make UMass a safer place. She wants to work on making the UCard like a license where hair color, height and other information would be on it. The information can be put into a computer system allowing police to pull up mug shots. She

Halliburton suspect of over-pricing scheme

By Matt Kelley
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Pentagon auditors found that Vice President Dick Cheney's former company may have overcharged the Army by as much as $61 million for gasoline in Iraq, senior defense officials said Thursday.

Halliburton apparently didn't profit from the possible overcharges, the officials said, speaking on condition of anonymity. The problem, the officials said, was that Halliburton may have paid a subcontractor too much for the gasoline in the first place.

The Pentagon officials said the Halliburton subsidiary involved in Iraq reconstruction work, Kellogg, Brown & Root, also submitted a proposal for cafeteria services that was $67 million too high. The officials said the Pentagon rejected that proposal.

The defense officials said they had no reason to believe the problems were anything other than "stupid mistakes" by Halliburton.

In an e-mail statement, Halliburton spokeswoman Wendy Hall denied the company had overcharged. She said Halliburton was responding to questions from Pentagon auditors and was "confident our responses will satisfy" them.

News of the problems came as President Bush worked to justify his decision to limit Iraq reconstruction contracts to companies from the United States or countries that supported the war. The move angered governments whose firms were cut out of the bidding process, including France, Germany, Russia and Canada.

Many prominent Democrats also have criticized the Halliburton contracts specifically, suggesting they were a political payoff for a company with strong ties to the GOP and whose executives gave generously to the Bush campaign.

Cheney and Pentagon officials deny any political motive for awarding the no-bid contracts to KBR, which has a long-standing relationship with the military as a major Pentagon contractor.

Routine audits by the Defense Contract Audit Agency uncovered the problems.

Pentagon officials said they were concerned about the problems with KBR's contracts, which were awarded without competitive bidding for up to $15.6 billion for rebuilding Iraq's oil infrastructure and assisting U.S. troops there. About $5 billion has been spent or obligated to spend on those contracts so far.

"Contractor improprieties and/or contract mischarging on department contracts will neither be condoned nor allowed to continue," Dov Zakheim, the Pentagon's budget chief, said Thursday.

The defense officials, who are involved in the audit of the contracts, said the Pentagon was negotiating with KBR over how to resolve the fuel-pricing issue. They declined to name the subcontractor that provided the fuel, saying that company may not have been notified of the inquiry's findings.

PRS transmitters found faulty

By Megan Daley
Collegian Correspondent

The majority of a batch of Personal Response System transmitters sold to University of Massachusetts students is faulty and may have caused problems for students and teachers trying to use this system, according to manufacturers.

Dave Seiffert of EduCue, the company that provides the PRS transmitters, said the approximately 1,500 transmitters sold to the University have a flaw in their design. The devices allow professors to poll students, administer quizzes and take attendance in large classes. PRS users must aim their device at a sensor when answering questions and, previously, there have been problems relating to the width of the aiming angle, Seiffert said.

EduCue tried to correct this problem by making the angle narrower.

"Unfortunately," says Seiffert, "it was made too narrow and now you have to aim carefully or risk missing."

Many UMass professors who have large lectures use the PRS system as a quizzing strategy that can be graded or can simply be used to check attendance. They also use it to see if students can answer certain questions to judge the level of understanding of the lecture in class.

Professor Richard Rogers, who deals with the PRS system at UMass, said he used the PRS system all semester long.

"My class seemed to be fine," he said.

Rogers, who has worked with the system for five the provost. "My domain is the largest," said Seymour. All things at the University that fall under the heading of "academics" are the responsibility of the provost office.

The provost evaluates programs at the university to make sure they are as effective as possible, she said. The person in that position also assures that programs use resources effectively, with the least amount of waste, Seymour said. Consequently, when budget cuts come, it is also the provost's responsibility to decide which programs can be cut.

According to Seymour, the biggest obstacle of the budget cuts is "keeping the morale of campus high," because many people whose programs are cut suspect they are no longer valued.

"Our main objective is to protect the welfare of the students," Seymour said. To do so, the programs that are the first to be cut are those considered to have the least impact on students.

"I have to have a vision for how the University can be best in whatever it does," Seymour explained. Consequently, as budgets diminish, she said, the provost must look at each program and ask if it can be trimmed. Seymour said that evaluators must constantly ask "Is the program using its resources in the best possible way?" In the process, she said, some programs are immediately funded, others watched for a longer time before they earn more investment and some are cut entirely.

"The last thing that we want to do is inconvenience anyone," Seymour said. For this reason, the provost may bridge programs that are considered nonessential. If a program is scheduled to be cut for any reason, she explained, the provost first makes sure that the program has no lasting obligations. If it does, the program may be given enough money to fulfill the obligations until it can be phased out.

Rape victim disappointed with UMass Police also would like to see increased lighting on campus (especially around the Campus Pond), emergency buttons in bathrooms, cameras in every dorm and possibly cameras on top of light fixtures throughout campus.

She wants to get the escort service back and get more emergency phones on campus because "most of them don't even work and they are so far apart."

Clarady has many complaints about the way the University of Massachusetts Police Department handled her case.

"All the [UMass] police were men," she said, reflecting back on the incident. "That was the last person I wanted to talk to me."

"The UMass police took my life and every aspect of my life," she continued. "It was like, they were more interested in my life than this one event — asking me about the things I said to my friends, my home life and asking things that happened years ago.

"They even wanted to take my letters I sent to friends, and hauled my friends in for questioning. I didn't understand why my friends had anything to do with what those two guys did to me."

Clarady also said how the UMass police didn't even have a way to look anyone up, which made it more difficult in finding the offenders.

"To this day, I still know what they looked like," she said. "They gave me mug shots of people who got arrested and they would ask me more questions. I looked through the mug shots just in case, but only having mug shots of people who got arrested? Okay, mug shots [are] a start, but there is more to catching people than that."

"They would keep calling and finally my parents told them to never call me again and they stopped calling me for about 2 or 3 months. Then, they contacted me again, asked me to come in at 8 p.m. on a Tuesday night. I thought they had good news, but they just started prying and prying," said Clarady. "They wanted me to close the case because they couldn't solve it and [were] never going to. They basically harassed me."

The UMPD has a specific procedure in handling a rape report. The report is first taken by the responding officer and then the detective on call is notified of the incident, said detective Lisa Kidwell from the UMPD.

The victim always had the opportunity to speak with a female detective, she said.

"I am available to come in for rape cases if the survivor prefers speaking with a woman," Kidwell said. "The case is then investigated by myself or another detective."

When the UMPD deals with the survivor, Kidwell said they encourage him or her to be examined at the University Health Services, and to receive treatment for sexually transmitted infections or unwanted pregnancy.

The survivor is given information about how to contact counselors at the Everywoman's Center, Kidwell said.

"Our goal is to assist the survivor and prosecute the criminal and we attempt to accomplish both tasks," Kidwell said.

Although Clarady did not have a good experience with the UMass police, she did find the Everywoman's Center a very supportive and friendly place.

"The Everywoman's Center were the only people who made me feel comfortable," Clarady said.

"When someone has been sexually assaulted, they often feel a loss of control," said Carol Wallace, director of the center. "Often the first step in the healing process is to tell someone about the assault."

"Our role is to make sure the victim/survivor is safe, to listen, to provide information and support, and to return control to the victim/survivor by supporting her to make her own choices about how to move forward," Wallace said.

The Everywoman's Center is a place where survivors of sexual assault or any other type of violence can go to for help. The Center works closely with the UMPD, Wallace said.

"There are four UMPD officers, two women and two men, who have gone through our 70-hour training and [have] been certified as Educator/Advocates," she said. "They work with us to co-facilitate workshops and trainings on issues of sexual assault, relationship violence and stalking for the UMass campus."

As a junior at the School of Management, Clarady said she is in the process of starting a new Registered Student Organization called Students Against Violence Everywhere.

Once SAVE becomes an official organization on campus, Clarady plans to follow up on her ideas including getting adult security wearing uniforms in dorms.

"A 19-year-old girl doing security — do you actually think she could stop two guys from going into a building?" she asked.

"The system of UMass has a huge problem and they can't just ignore it and put more policemen on campus. They're gonna start losing students because they don't feel safe. They should spend some money."

Act, which was passed in response to the tragedy on Sept. 11. The means to fund this is not mandated, however.

Members of the GEO, along with the Graduate Student Senate, United Auto Workers Local 2322, the UMass chapter of the ACLU, and various faculty members and students voiced their displeasure with the University for passing of this new fee.

"They have no justification for this fee, because it provides no service for international students," said Zixul "George" Liu. "We as international students, though considered alien, pay taxes. Local, state, and federal."

Many are worried that SEVIS would be used as a tool to help the government deport people that it deems undesirable.

One major concern brought up at the conference was the effect this new fee would have on the ability of international students to pay their tuition and other costs and thus be able to stay and finish their education.

One of the stipulations on the visas these students have is that they are not allowed to work more then 20 hours a week, and aren't allowed to have more then one job. Many of the speakers complained that this restriction already makes it hard for them to pay the costs, which are rising faster than most other student's costs.

Other universities have had similar issues about how to fund this new system. The University of Chicago spread the costs among all its students, while SUNY Binghamton students are currently suing their school to have the fees repealed. Students at the University of Wisconsin also successfully stopped a similar fee from being implemented.

The town of Amherst has already voted not to recognize the USA Patriot Act, and has urged that all organizations and departments do the same. Many at the conference believed that UMass has violated the spirit of that decision.

The conference also opposed the SEVIS system. They charged that this new system was just the first in a dangerous new initiative by the government.

"This is a dangerous and frightening move and it is important that we oppose it," said Paula Chakravartty, an international professor in the communications department.

Faulty PRS transmitters may be to blame for classroom problems years, agreed that the transmitters are "not up to their full capabilities" but also said "it's just this semester that I've seen a problem."

Professor Stephen Arons, who has used the PRS system for two semesters, said that they are "still a work in progress."

Arons said, in his experience, PRS transmitters have "lots of technical glitches." This semester some of his students complained that they couldn't find their grades from the PRS online. Arons began to supplement paper quizzes along with the PRS quizzes to be sure that all students would get their correct grades.

"There is a lot of frustration with the PRS," said Arons, "and my TAs and I have asked ourselves sometimes if it is worth the effort compared to the benefit that these transmitters provide."

"Now I think, maybe it's not worth the effort."

Arons said that he was surprised when he received and email that had been forwarded to a dozen or so other professors about the faulty transmitters.

"I thought it was just me having problems," he said.

EduCue is attempting to correct the problems, Arons said, but added that he is not going to use the PRS next semester.

Sophomore Mike O'Malley, a student in Arons' legal studies class said that his classmates were surprised to hear the news about the PRS.

"There was a huge groan and a sense of shock. A lot of students had had issues with [the transmitters] but we didn't think that they were faulty."

"EduCue has been in contact with the [Textbook Annex] ... and is trying to get this problem fixed," Seiffart said.

Students who have purchased a PRS transmitter this semester, especially those who have been having problems with the unit, can return them to the Textbook Annex and receive new ones for "no additional charge," Rogers said.

The Annex has already returned the unsold faulty transmitters to EduCue.

Police: Grayson Hall fire could be connected to Sylvan arsons

A fire broke out in Grayson dormitory at the University of Massachusetts early Thursday morning causing residents of the building to be evacuated.

The fire damaged a five-by-seven-foot corkboard. The wall behind the board was also affected. There was significant smoke, but no smoke damage.

According to Patrick Archbald, UMass Deputy Chief of Police, the UMass Police Department responded to a call at 1:35 a.m. concerning a bulletin board on the fifth floor that was on fire.

The fire was put out by a local residential assistant, who responded after the fire alarm sounded.

"We will be doing an updated public safety alert for the Orchard Hill area," said Archbald. "There are no suspects and the investigation is continuing. We will be working to find any relationship between what has been happening in Sylvan, and now Orchard Hill."

Environmental Health and Safety and the Amherst Fire Department also responded. Later, the state fire marshal was also called to assist with the investigation.

Semester's end: A look back and peek ahead

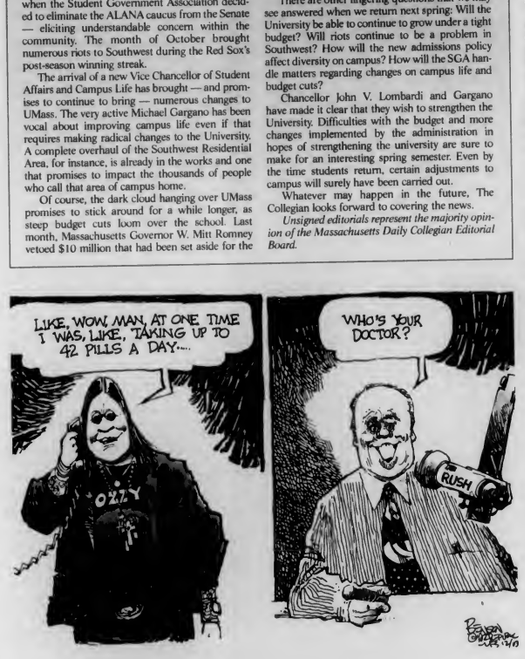
The last day of classes for the fall semester is always an exciting one. After months of attending classes, taking exams and writing papers, students must only get through finals week before the semester is completely over. Students understandably want to complete their last classes and finals to enjoy the holiday season without worrying about academics.

As the semester draws to a close, The Massachusetts Daily Collegian would like to offer a quick recap of some of the bigger events surrounding the University of Massachusetts and look into the future.

The semester got off to an interesting start when the Student Government Association decided to eliminate the ALANA caucus from the Senate — eliciting understandable concern within the community. The month of October brought numerous riots to Southwest during the Red Sox's post-season winning streak.

The arrival of a new Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life has brought — and promises to continue to bring — numerous changes to UMass. The very active Michael Gargano has been vocal about improving campus life even if that requires making radical changes to the University. A complete overhaul of the Southwest Residential Area, for instance, is already in the works and one that promises to impact the thousands of people who call that area of campus home.

Of course, the dark cloud hanging over UMass promises to stick around for a while longer, as steep budget cuts loom over the school. Last month, Massachusetts Governor W. Mitt Romney vetoed $10 million that had been set aside for the UMass system. Senator Stanley C. Rosenberg, D-Amherst, said that he and other legislators will attempt to override the veto in January.



It is important for students to stay abreast of the latest news concerning the University over intermission. Decisions may be made that affect students, such as next year's state budget. Decisions like these will be made while students will be unable to mobilize. However, by keeping informed, everyone will be able to come back ready to take action if necessary. In the meantime, if a story breaks that may have potentially damaging effects to the University, students can write to their local newspapers and politicians expressing concern.

There are other lingering questions that we may see answered when we return next spring: Will the University be able to continue to grow under a tight budget? Will riots continue to be a problem in Southwest? How will the new admissions policy affect diversity on campus? How will the SGA handle matters regarding changes on campus life and budget cuts?

Chancellor John V. Lombardi and Gargano have made it clear that they wish to strengthen the University. Difficulties with the budget and more changes implemented by the administration in hopes of strengthening the university are sure to make for an interesting spring semester. Even by the time students return, certain adjustments to campus will surely have been carried out.

Whatever may happen in the future, The Collegian looks forward to covering the news.

It's not easy being Santa

Erika Lovley

Whoever said the mall was hell at Christmas time?

According to my good friend Jack, it's more like "hell on speed." People dashing, children screaming, and salespeople trying to spray you with smelly lotions.

"It's like bringing together every awful person in the world, giving them a few too many credit cards, a few too many sales, and a major case of caffeine withdrawal," he said.

Jack isn't your common adolescent shopper. Jack isn't one of the annoying salesmen that people avoid making eye contact with at all costs. Jack, a mall employee, plays Santa Claus. He has signed up for the job every year since he's worked at this particular mall. He volunteers for minimum-wage insanity for personal reasons.

"It's like giving back to the community," Jack told me.

"It kinda makes up for all the badly-behaved things I did over the past year, or at least makes me feel a little less guilty about doing them."

I told him that the worst criminal in the world does not deserve to suffer the schedule a mall Santa is required to hold.

Every weekend, beginning Nov. 26 — "Black Friday" — Jack dons his red fuzzy suit and "super-beer gut" body suit, sits in the King Kong-sized chair in the mall center, ready to face the insanity. The job runs from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m., from Black Friday until Dec. 23. Throughout this time, he supplies me with a running tab on his adventures as Santa.

Jack's job uncovers the amazing and sometimes frightening things the human mind — especially the mind of a young child is capable of wishing for. Jack is used to granting the wishes of little girls asking for Hawaiian tan Barbie and little boys asking for the newest X-box game. But the job of granting wishes can be a complicated and uncomfortable one.

Jack had one kindergarten-aged boy ask for a gun. Thinking the boy was asking for a water gun or the like, Jack asked what type of gun the boy wanted and why. He answered "To kill my mom's boss. He makes her work too much and she's never home."

One little girl was reduced to tears when Jack's cell phone rang with an emergency call as she sat on his lap. Jack had to excuse himself to take the very important call, and the child bawled.

Recently, Jack was required to hold a one-year-old baby on his lap for 10 minutes, waiting for the child to smile. When the photo session was finally over, Jack realized that not only had the baby had a dirty diaper, but the entire front of his suit was soaking wet.

"Santa's just like Daddy," she cried. "He talks on his cell phone when I'm trying to talk."

Another tricky part of Jack's job is break time. Santa's breaks are hard to take. It would be a disaster if the children saw Santa changing out of his costume in the mall. At times, Jack has been forced to eat in the mall food court in full Santa attire, due to the children that follow him there during his breaks. He has received many comments about his typical lunch fare.

"I didn't know you ate Subway," commented one boy. "You aren't even as fat as that Subway man."

"Mommy," screamed one child, "Santa DOES drink Coca-Cola, just like the commercial!"

Some of Jack's experiences this season have not been half as cute or comical. Part of the Santa Claus routine includes posing for professional pictures with customers. Recently, Jack was required to hold a one-year-old baby on his lap for 10 minutes, waiting for the child to smile. When the photo session was finally over, Jack realized that not only had the baby had a dirty diaper, but the entire front of his suit was soaking wet.

In another incident, a 300-pound woman demanded a photo with Santa to place on the front of her Christmas cards. She posed herself by sprawling on Jack's lap.

In the past, Jack has been asked to pose with dogs, cats, and even a pet python, hung around his neck.

"I try to be tolerant, but the snake freaked me out. It wouldn't stop slithering. I was waiting for it to choke the life out of me. Santa nearly peed his pants."

The most memorable thing Jack has been asked for so far this season?

"One boy asked me for the use of my sleigh on Christmas Day after I was done delivering presents. I asked him where he wanted to go. He said to the Army base in Iraq where his older brother is stationed."

Jack, who also has a friend stationed in Iraq, fought to keep his composure.

"It's moments like that. They help me remember why I play Santa Claus," he reflected.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

UMASS TRANSIT OPERATOR DEFENDS PATRIOT ACT

This is in response to the article entitled "Community rallies against Patriot Act" in the Dec. 11 issue of the Collegian. In particular, it is in response to comments made by Bill Newman, head of the western Massachusetts chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union, where he states that people's civil rights are infringed upon by the use of small microphones mounted in the front of the transit busses.

I am a transit operator for the University. I have been working there for almost three years and have some comments about the use of the microphones on the bus. These microphones serve two purposes on the busses. The first is to protect the driver in the event of an emergency. If a person were to approach the driver and begin making threats, the microphone tape could be used against them for assault. Anyone can walk onto one of our busses. For that reason, there could be any number of intentions on that person's mind and having the recorded threats can be valuable evidence in convicting a person intending to cause harm to the drive or the passengers of the bus.

The second purpose of the microphone is for accident reconstruction. If there is an accident involving a bus, it could be crucial to find out what the driver said during the events of the accident. The recorded voice can be used to place blame where it is due and help victims of the accident move on.

These microphones are not a secret. There are signs posted on every bus that state that they are in use. If you feel so strongly that you do not want your voice recorded simply don't ride the bus or sit in the middle. The distance that the microphone can pick up is just around the driver compartment. The surveillance system also helps the authorities to make people accountable for vandalism on the bus.

There have been numerous instances where they have proved invaluable. They keep the busses free of graffiti and provide a safer environment for everyone. In addition, the recorded sounds are only listened to when there is need to do so. We don't listen to them for the sake of intruding on people's conversations!

If you want to make accusations, then at least make sure that you have all the facts. I am glad that the microphones are there.

Comedian bares it all

Tracy Morgan delights UMass with explicit brand of comedy

By Reid Davenport
Collegian Staff

Former Saturday Night Live cast member Tracy Morgan entertained a sold-out crowd of approximately 1,972 people this past Wednesday at the Fine Arts Center on the University of Massachusetts campus. Morgan's flight was late, delaying the show by about an hour. Despite jetlag, Morgan managed to entertain the audience, not to mention himself. His routine drew upon, among other things, the times he walked around his house naked much to the chagrin of his wife and kids.

"I'll walk around my house naked if I want to!" exclaimed Morgan. "I'm Muffin*! Raw!"

"Sometimes I wish I was a baby again," said Morgan, quickly changing the subject. "Just so I can have someone else wipe my ass. There is no better feeling in the world."

Morgan continued with sexual antics throughout the show. He explained the difference between male and female masturbation. The graphic comedian made sure nothing was left to the imagination in his awkward rant.

"Men have to get all naked," said Morgan. "They close the blinds, pop in the video, and then they stretch a bit."

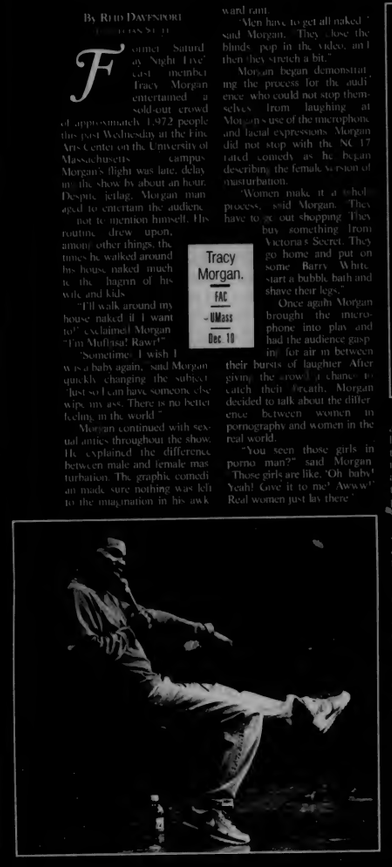
Morgan began demonstrating the process for the audience who could not stop themselves from laughing at Morgan's use of the microphone and facial expressions. Morgan did not stop with the NC-17 rated comedy as he began describing the female version of masturbation.

"Women make it a whole process," said Morgan. "They have to go out shopping. They buy something from Victoria's Secret. They go home and put on some Barry White, start a bubble bath and shave their legs."

Once again Morgan brought the microphone into play and had the audience gasping for air in between their bursts of laughter. After giving the crowd a chance to catch their breath, Morgan decided to talk about the difference between women in pornography and women in the real world.

"You seen those girls in porno man?" said Morgan. "Those girls are like, 'Oh baby! Yeah! Give it to me! Awww!' Real women just lay there."

Tracy Morgan. FAC - UMass Dec. 10



Morgan did not disappoint the audience. He had them in stitches laughing from the get-go. He continued showing the filth in graphic detail and had the audience laughing the whole 90 years. He then decided to pick on a few folks in the front section of the auditorium.

"Don't worry, I don't care," said Morgan as he went after a girl's hand. "You got some big titties though!"

Morgan didn't stop with the first girl. He decided to comment on another underclad breasts and interrupted the conversation with his son. "That's what we do. It's called f---ing. Then the girl went down on the kid and he asked, 'What is the girl doing?' 'She's called a blowjob.' At this point he was staring so I asked him if he liked it and he said 'Hell we... I mean yeah. Then I look back at the porno, but when I look back the kid is gone. So I started smacking him while screaming 'What are you doing with your dick?' Go help your self dick dinner!'

Morgan thanked the audience and promptly left the stage amid a massive amount of boos. Student Government President Dave Carr came out and thanked Tracy Morgan for coming and thanked Secretary of Public Relations Mitra Safinia for calling Morgan a few days ago. Two other comedians opened for Tracy Morgan but due to security at the show and time constraints, they were unable to be reached for comment.

Making the holidays fun

Press Start to Play

Reid Davenport

Final exams week is just around the corner, but that just means Christmas vacation is soon to follow. The stressful week ahead of most students will hopefully fade once we all head home and can play video games to our hearts content, without the knowledge that we are procrastinating on studying. The holiday season also means new fun toys from video game companies for boys and girls of all ages to be asking for.

Here are the top 20 games and accessories that should be on your list for this year.

10. "F-Zero GX" (Gamecube) - This racing game takes some getting used to, more serious racing game than "Mario Kart Double Dash," this is your pick.

9. "Super Mario Advanced 4: Super Mario 3" (GBA) - This is the revamped version of the classic "Super Mario Bros. 3" for the Game Boy Advanced.

8. "Grand Theft Auto Double Pack" (X-box) - There is nothing like running down people on sidewalks while listening to your favorite music. The GTA III and Vice City pack for the X-Box gives you two great games for the price of one.

7. "Rainbow Six 3: Raven Shield" (X-Box, PS2, GC, PC) - The Tom Clancy classic has returned and is just as addicting as the past games. In fact, you may find yourself sneaking around your house, and using caution when opening doors in case there's a terrorist holding a hostage, or your little brother threatening to eat your gingerbread man.

6. Game Boy Advanced (SP) - A must-have for anyone who travels a lot, but doesn't want to lug a laptop around that dies after an hour of use. The GBA-SP has a rechargeable battery that can last up to eight hours of game play, with a two-hour recharge time.

5. "Viewtiful Joe" (GC) - The Capcom game is one of the best side scrollers to be released in recent years. Viewtiful Joe is one man in a red suit that isn't very jolly, but he knows who's naughty and who's nice.

4. X-Box Live - The online system for X-Box is worth the $50 annual subscription. The start-up pack comes with a head set and software you need to get your X-Box running online faster than Frosty would melt in Hawaii. With the dozens of games available to play and the ability to update other games, it makes for a worthwhile present.

3. Gamecube - After seeing a price drop to $99, the system is well worth picking up. With titles like "Mario Kart Double Dash" and "Viewtiful Joe" you can spend hours playing this system. Forget Christmas dinner, it's gaming time.

2. "Mario Kart Double Dash" (GC) - The third installment of the Mario racing series is one of the more entertaining racing games. It also adds the ability to play LAN games with friends over the Internet (requires Gamecube LAN accessory) and has tons of new modes for you and your friends to battle in.

1."Final Fantasy Tactics Advanced" (GBA) - This addition to the "Final Fantasy" franchise is one of the most addicting to date with a unique story line and a vast array of characters to use.

Guster: Keeping it together

Unpredictable band to perform in Northampton

By Meghan Healy
Collegian Staff

Guster returns to the Pioneer Valley this weekend amidst pre-finals hysteria. The three-man operation, who played the University of Massachusetts' Spring Concert in May 2002, will be playing the Calvin Theatre in Northampton Sunday night.

Although the week that lies ahead will be stressful and chaotic, it would be in any anxious student's best interest to catch the show. Notorious for their wildly witty and inventive stage shows, Guster may just help alleviate some tension with their music and their slightly oddball personalities.

There is no saying what Sunday's show may bring, but concerts past have given audiences an incognito Guster opening for themselves as The Peace Soldiers and a neon sign declaring the groups love of yams. The point? Guster shows are unpredictable and the band members are so passionate about what they do that any member of the crowd is drawn into the scene, becoming part of the show.

This weekend's show leads up to a two-night stand in Portland, ME on Dec. 19 and 20 where the trio will film their first live concert to be released on DVD. Although there is no definite release date for the DVD, Guster fans can expect to see it on the shelves in early to mid 2004. The opportunity to have access to a show from the comfort of one's home is appealing to followers of the band, who are known for their comical stage antics and an affinity for tweaking show-standards. No two performances are the same. And while the DVD is exciting it cannot replace the atmosphere and energy of the Live Guster experience.

Guster — Ryan Miller, Adam Gardner, and Brian Rosenworcel — was formed in the early '90s when all three members met at Tufts University, in Medford. Performing under the name Gus, the trio built a name for themselves in the greater Boston area playing their unique blend of pop and rock with African-inspired bongo-style percussion.

Eleven years and three added letters later, Guster is a force to be reckoned with. The release of their latest studio album, "Keep it Together," secured the band a place in the realm of respectable artists with catchy yet substantive tracks like "Ramona," "Careful" and the title track. Many may recall the group's radio hit "Amsterdam," as it flooded the airwaves this summer. The song, a favorite among fans and first-timers alike, worked well in getting the Guster name to households across the country without compromising the integrity of what Miller, Gardner and Rosenworcel have worked to create all these years. Much like they did four years ago when releasing what is arguably their best album, "Lost and Gone Forever," Guster has selected one track that represents the mood and tone of their music for the whole world to hear. In this case it is "Amsterdam," back then it was "Fa Fa."

Guster Calvin Theater Northampton Sunday $25

Sunday's show will also give concertgoers a chance to be charitable, as the show will support the Food Bank of Western Massachusetts. According to www.guster.com, the band's official website, "The first 200 people to bring two or more nonperishable items will receive a free Guster poster. Nonperishable items in the greatest need include cereal, rice, canned tuna or chicken, canned soups, stews or ravioli and non-food items such as diapers. The donations will be collected at the door, and Guster posters can be picked up at the time of donation."

Opening for Guster is acoustic guitarist Stephen Kellogg. A UMass alumnus, Kellogg has played with up-and-coming artists such as Matt Nathanson and Howie Day. UMass students may recall the energetic and humorous singer-songwriter's performance back in the spring, when he played Fill the Hill. A Connecticut Native, Kellogg currently lives in Northampton, making Sunday's show a sort of homecoming for him.

Tickets for this event are $25 and are now on sale at the Calvin Theatre. The show starts at 8 p.m. For more information visit www.iheg.com.

New No Doubt compilation in stores now

By Cameron J. Woods
Collegian Staff

The 17-years-strong ska/rock phenomena known as No Doubt, has unleashed a new compilation disc of their greatest hits spanning from 1992 to 2003. For more than a decade, the band has been assaulted with awards and honors, including Grammy awards. The group has also been given a host of chances to perform and record with musical legends such as Elvis Costello, U2 and Prince. But through it all, the band has maintained and even grown-up with their fan base.

This compilation of No Doubt's finest is exactly what is needed as we enter the dreariest, coldest part of the year. The upbeat ska tracks on this disc will definitely offset the impending gloom of finals and the stress of the holidays. Though these may have been some of our teenage anthems of summertime revelry, they still hold the power to take listeners to that private internal audio party that No Doubt has always had.

The album kicks off with the band's smash, "Just a Girl," which all these years later still packs its sarcastic bite. Stefani's lilting, little baby doll voice tugs at the heartstrings as she denounces the classic female stereotypes in her own fashion. This album, though it does contain a great mix of No Doubt's various hits, draws mainly from the band's stellar 1995 release, "Tragic Kingdom." Such huge radio hits as "Bathwater," "Don't Speak," and "Ex-Girlfriend" are sprinkled amongst some of the band's lesser-known but quite possibly better works, like "New" and "Running."

No Doubt 'The Singles 1992 - 2003' Interscope

A band that has survived the test of fame, time and trials of loss, the members of No Doubt have managed to reinvent themselves without losing their roots. New hits such as "Hey Baby" and "Hella Good" saw Stefani and the guys take on a more alternative sound and yet never completely forsake their ska-background.

No Doubt found their niche as a new wave/ska band, on the strength of vocalist Gwen Stefani's persona — alternately an emb-race of little-girl-lost innocence and riot grrl feminism — exemplified on the band's breakout single, "Just a Girl."

Formed in early 1987 as a ska band inspired by "Madness," the lineup of No Doubt

The best sounds of 2003

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

Verbena - "La Musica Negra" (Capitol Records) — The criminally unacknowledged and unappreciated Verbera return with their third LP and a slightly different line-up and tone. Anne Marie Griffin has left the band in the downtime between the band's last album, 1999's Dave Grohl-produced "Into The Pink" and while her backing harmonies are greatly missed, "Negra" is a full, complete album, and new bassist Nick Daviston compliments singer/guitarist Scott Bondy and drummer Les Nuby perfectly. "Negra" is full of gruff and rough rock with a heavy dose of southern blues. Anyone that checks out the hard-hitting and bouncy "It's Alright, It's Okay (Jesus Told Me So)" or the delicate beauty of "Camellia" will be hooked immediately, and the rest of the album doesn't let up, ending in the sullied but perfect piano ballad "Dirty Goodbyes."

Local H - "The No Fun EP" (Thick Records) — The best two person band around (sorry, White Stripes) put out a small sampler to fill the downtime between 2002's "Here Comes The Zoo" and their impending, early 2004 follow-up. Local H — you remember, they did that "Copasetic" song (please, people, it's called "Bound For The Floor") — might deny it left and right, but they are truly the only real grunge band that is still around and they rock like their alterna-rock torch-bearers.

While the EP is brief and not quite as good as any of the band's four LPs some of the songs, most notably "No Fun" and "Cooler Heads" show singer/guitarist/bassist Scott Lucas at his best — sarcastic, clever, and cool — while instrumentally Lucas fills the album with squeaks and feedback like never before. Behind the drum kit, Brian St. Clair continues to bang out beats that show why he is one of the best, and underappreciated, drummers hitting the skins today. "The No Fun EP" should whet any H fan's appetite for the next LP and is full enough that it could convert a great many new fans.

Radiohead – "Hail to the Thief" (Capitol Records) — There really isn't too much that can be said about an album like "Hail to the Thief." For one, it seems that by now everyone has already heard Radiohead and for those that haven't they are truly impossible to describe.

This album as a whole is impossible to describe as the band shifts from downtempo keyboard heavy to bouncing-off-the-walls, jumping-up-and-down freaked out electronic-rock all in the first song ("2+2=5"). The thing about "Hail To The Thief" that makes it arguably the band's best album is the way that different sounds combine with styles from all the previous albums and continue to add to their sound in creative and surprising ways. Just check out the atmospheric "Sit Down, Stand Up" or the fuzzed-out bass of "Myxamatosis" in which frontman Thom Yorke sounds like he is sort of rapping and sort of having a nervous breakdown.

Year Of The Rabbit – "Year Of The Rabbit" (Elektra Records) — Year Of The Rabbit is kind of an underground indie-rock supergroup, most notable for their leader, ex-Failure frontman Ken Andrews. Andrews and the rest of the band take an alternate, but similar, path than Failure, opting more for pop melody ("Last Defense"), alterna-rock power ("Rabbit Hole"), and the mood of a not-quite-as-gloomy Cure ("River"), while still including some of the space-rock that made Failure a cult favorite ("Absent Stars"). Make no mistakes though — Year Of The Rabbit is a very original band who has made a stand-out, unforgettable album that has already established them as a force to be reckoned with.

Tomahawk – "Mit Gas" (Ipecac Records) — Mike Patton, ex-singer of Faith No More, and current member of countless other bands and projects, has a supergroup of his own. Tomahawk includes members of hard rock gods such as Helmet and The Jesus Lizard, and of course Patton himself, who is regarded with great reverence for his oddball and out-there work. But this time around Patton and his bandmates fill the album with hooks and soaring melodies, in fact in songs like "Mayday" and "Capt. Midnight" Incubus fans will be able to note why Brandon Boyd cites Patton as a major influence. Longtime Patton fans shouldn't fear as the album is plenty dark and pretty weird. Patton uses his deep growl, his throat-scraping yell, and his slightly unsettling spot-on falsetto often all in the same song. Perhaps the only way to summarize the peculiarness and the almost-pop of "Mit Gas" is to note that Tomahawk is probably the only band that can make a song called "Rape This Day" one of the best anthems of the year.

Johnny Marr and The Healers – "Boomslang" (Artist Direct) — The Ex-Smiths guitarist finally steps out on his own and, while many Smith's purists may argue until they are blue in the face, "Boomslang" puts Morrissey to shame. Marr has long been regarded as one of the premier guitarists of the best 20 plus years and he certainly continues to prove himself as a great musician. Just listening to the first minute or so of the opener, "Last Ride," and it becomes clear that this is one of the best records of the year. Marr fills the album with his dream-like vocals, textural guitars, and even drum loops making "Boomslang" the sound of the future from one of the great figures of the past. Oh, and Marr doesn't stew in his sorrows throughout the album as Morrissey does, Marr adds pop pep and seems to almost be challenging the listener not to sing along to catchy songs such as "Something

'Strictly the Best 31' sure is

Compilation discs have never been well received by the purchasing public, particularly since the emergence of the Internet music revolution. Who would want to pay $15 when, with a burner attached to your computer, you can make your own mix CD at home for nothing?

Various Artists 'Strictly the Best 31' VP

But when it comes to dancehall reggae compilations, VP records have made more than a few dollars with their highly successful "Reggae Gold" and "Strictly the Best" franchises. For those who are not aware of these series, they can be compared to the "Now! That's What I Call Music" series which highlights the pop music chart toppers of the year.

Earlier this month the monopolistic reggae recording company, VP, released its 31st installment of "Strictly the Best" and like the majority of its predecessors, the disc gives listeners another non-stop party of chart-topping reggae jams.

And it is literally non-stop, as the "Strictly the Best" series and its sister "Reggae Gold" are produced to have no pauses between songs on the CD format. No need for a DJ when you can play 20 songs in a row equaling one-hour and 15 minutes without a stop.

Like all of the "Strictly the Best" records, Vol. 31 features the most popular VP artists. And lucky – or more so strategically – for VP, the most popular artists on the label, such as Sean Paul, Beenie Man and Shaggy, are also the most popular dancehall reggae artists in the world right now. As well as the familiar names, Vol. 31 provides a wide range of artists on the label such as Elephant Man, Tanto Metro & Devonte and roots band Morgan Heritage.

Other than providing dancehall fans with yet another fantastic mix of the best of the year, the new "Strictly the Best" shows the growing fusion occurring between mainstream hip-hop and dancehall reggae. The artists are working together and the result is that the music is becoming strikingly similar. Sean Paul's "Clap Your Hands (Get Busy Remix)" featuring hip-hop DJ Fat Man Scoop and Wayne Wonder's "Enemies Remix" featuring legendary rap lyricist Mobb Deep are prime examples.

"Strictly the Best 31" is a sure shot for any fan of dancehall and with hip-hop crossover selections; the door is open for newcomers.

Cold Duck Complex's debut takes off running

By Russ Juskalian
Collegian Staff

One part jazz, one part hip-hop and four parts college education is the recipe for Cold Duck Complex, the musical talent to bloom from the Pioneer Valley. The group is poised to introduce themselves to a broader audience by performing outside the local area.

"Figureheads," the latest release from the group, will be available tomorrow at Cold Duck Complex's record release show at the Iron Horse Music Hall. It's an album of strange origin: four college students — Joe Cardozo on bass, Jeff D'Antona on keyboard, Makaya McCraven on drums, and the vocalist Casey Hammond (Platypus) — all well versed in music theory, all with a vision to conjoin hip-hop and jazz in a way that brings fun, intellect and wit together.

Cold Duck Complex 'Figure-heads' Cold Duck Complex

"Son of a Snapper," the first track, starts off with a sample that sounds like it's from an Ed Wood movie. "Out of the slime and darkness it comes," the vocals ring, sharing the spotlight with a dark keyboard melody. Light percussion and a tension any Cold Duck fan knows can only mean one thing: Platypus is about to rhyme. And when Platypus does let go, he covers an array of topics: from sex, to reaching rock bottom, to the fate of hip-hop.

Musically and lyrically everything shines in the first track though at times the lyrics are difficult to distinguish and the sound is tinny. It's not a problem that poses a sizeable threat to the effectiveness of the album, but a greater depth in the sound would have bridged the small gap to perfection.

"Wake Up," a song about Sept. 11, is one of the album's strongest tracks. Again, D'Antona's eerie, and, in this case, sad melody sets a serious and regretful tone from the first licks. John Stifler, of the Daily Hampshire Gazette, perfectly described their musical and lyrical intelligence, "... they cannot conceal their education," and it's true.

With lyrics like, "For anything to change then everybody's got to choose to take responsibility for history, and recognize that privilege stems directly from complicity," and McCraven marching a quick snare-drum out to battle, their Sept. 11 anthem reflects thoughtful preparation for a song about one of America's sorest wounds.

New artists release first album

Among the better tracks is "Lucky Me," which starts with the sound of a small child's music box and segues into a beat that Eminem might have considered for one of his softer, more emotional and self-pitying songs.

Platypus deals with the social angst of the middle class male struggling to make sense of the "hand I was dealt," and reconcile social privilege with a desire to change the world from a personal and societal position.

Although much attention falls on Platypus for his smart lyrics and verbal rhyming schemes, the musical talent of the band cannot be overlooked. Tracks like "91 Norch," are instant classics — true jazz experiments. There's a sense of maturity in this music that rivals some of the better-known musicians putting out jazz today. Cardozo lets the bass travel, while McCraven's frantic percussion allows D'Antona to infect the music with a very urban jazz-sound from decades past.

What is really commendable on "Figureheads" is the overall coherence of the album, and the band. It feels like every aspect of the sound rests dependently on every other aspect — like a stone archway where the removal of any stone will cause a tumble. They are that tight — except it doesn't seem possible for a single one of the stones to be removed. Each instrument, including Platypus's voice, ranges from serious to goofy, from fast to slow, always accommodating every other instrument.

Somehow, Cold Duck Complex was able to fit together heavy content, high intellect, low humor and even at times sad references and still come out with an uplifting and empowering creation, or "method," as they like to call it. They run the gamut and do it successfully. The only music in this fusion of jazz and hip-hop that sounds better than Figureheads is a live Cold Duck Complex concert. As these guys mature, and if they can bottle more energy from their live concerts into their next album, the hip-hop world had better take notice, because the rest of the industry surely will.

No Doubt's best on one disc

initially included John Spence, Gwen Stefani and her brother Eric. While playing the party-band circuit around Anaheim, the trio picked up bassist Tony Kanal, born in India but raised in Great Britain and the U.S. Hardened by the suicide of Spence in December 1987, No Doubt nevertheless continued — Stefani became the lone vocalist and the group added guitarist Tom Dumont and drummer Adrian Young.

No Doubt battled on thanks to mostly Stefani's determination. Under her leadership the band has blossomed from just another ska band riding the trend wave to a musical presence that has left an indelible mark upon our generation.

Be it by the shear dominating charisma of Stefani's presence as one of rocks only respectable queens, or the bands ever evolving sound, or some melding of the two, it is safe to say that if nearly 17 unrelenting years have not done away with No Doubt nothing conceivable will.

Though for avid fans whom have faithfully purchased every No Doubt CD or have plucked them from the internet into a personal playlist this new album may not be categorized as a must have, For the rest of us who have fallen in love with the ska-vixen and her merry troop of talented minstrels, however, this disc may be just the thing to satisfy the No Doubt itch.

To Shout About" and "Need It."

Stereophonics – "You Gotta Go there To Come Back" (V2 Records) — Brit-rockers Stereophonics returned this year with their best album yet. The follow-up to 2001's more stripped-down, atmosphere heavy "Just Enough Education To Perform" finds the band knee-deep in their classic rock influences. The opening, epic "Help Me (She's Out Of Her Mind)" find blues stomp and stadium-rock meshing together. However, the album's best moments come when the band is truly experimenting. "I'm Alright (You Gotta Go There To Come Back)" is unlike anything the Phonics have done before, and it finds singer/guitarist Kelly Jones pretty much alone with a drum machine and a guitar, singing in his trademark scratchy croon about self-destruction, denial, and despair. "You Gotta Go ..." finds the band digging deeper through more, and more eclectic, influences while still maintaining a very original sound of their own.

A Perfect Circle – "Thirteenth Step" (Virgin Records) — Art-rock supergroup A Perfect Circle brought a sophomore album that, in a very rare case, not only matches their debut effort but also surpasses it. The slightly altered lineup, which now includes Jeordie White and James Iha have created some of the best dark rock in memory. Be it Keenan's forceful and distinct singing on "Blue" and "The Outsider" or the complex and subtly stunning arrangements that are weaved throughout the album the group proves hey are even greater than the sum of their parts. While there is not a single weak song on the album the standout moment comes on "The Nurse Who Loved Me" a Failure cover — at least lyrically- that at first seems out of place but, on multiple listens, fits in perfectly with the album. The run away single from this album, "Weak and Powerless" is a pleasingly and seemingly perfect APC track filled with enough stirring imagry without lossing Keenan's trademark abiguity. The quietness of the entirely string-driven song is, while a cover song, a summary of everything the group has come to represent to the world of modern rock — the subtle, beautiful, and haunting quiet band mixed in a sea of loud obnoxious ones.

Deftones – "Deftones" (Maverick Records) — Longtime fans of the Deftones know they are a band that is constantly evolving and challenging their audience. Unfortunately to a lot of the mainstream, who has really only peripherally heard of the band, Deftones are just another hard rock band. On the self-titled affair, the band's fourth album, the Deftones find themselves rocking the hardest they have since their first album, 1995's "Adrenaline." However, Deftones make it clear they aren't a brainless, backwards-baseball cap nu-metal band. While a lot of the Deftones lyrics reek of bitterness and hostility they do so in a sort of angsty but intelligent way, as opposed to the mindless verbal violence of bands like Limp Bizkit or the whiny, childish manner of emo bands like Thursday or Brand New. "When Girls Telephone Boys" is a vocal chord scrapper that, after a few listens, shows its vulnerable core. The band also continues to experiment in the vein of their last album 2000's "White Pony." "Lucky You" and "Anniversary Of An Uninteresting Event" are trip-hopish experiments in electronica that are completely successful, as is the rest of the album.

Officer May – "Smoking In A Minor" (Ace Fu Records) — These Boston boys know that they have talent and they know that they have a secret weapon. So it's no surprise that the band opens the album with a few measures of noisy garagey/alternative rock before unleashing singer/guitarist Chris Warren on the unsuspecting listener. Just to get it out there: Warren sounds almost exactly like Kurt Cobain at his roughest and smoke-charred-lungs best. It is impossible to listen to Officer May without making the Nirvana association and the band knows this. They use Warren's voice as a weapon but have a strong arsenal to back it up. Musically, the band is a bit reminiscent of "Bleach"-era Nirvana but seems to have more in common with noisier, slightly rougher bands. The arrangements are often untraditional but, as a lot of Nirvana songs were, there is a slight pop glimmer beneath the rough edges of the music. Warren's lyrics are cynical, biting, and honest and his scratchy voiced delivery adds new levels to them. All this and the album certainly takes the crown for "Album Title of the Year."

Eels – "Shootenanny" (Dreamworks Records) — The latest album from the eclectic Eels opens with a Muddy Waters-esque blues stomp, "All In A Day's Work" and immediately makes its mark. Frontman E (real name Mark Oliver Everett) continues to make music that is a mixed bag in every sense. "Saturday Morning" is a bouncy playful song about being a kid on an early Saturday, young, energetic, and without someone to play with. Later on the album E goes through well-treaded (especially by himself) emotions on the song "Agony", which is about, well, agony, but E's intelligence and skills make the song a stand-out. The album closes with one of its best tunes, "Somebody Loves You" and after an album rife with mixed emotions and a schizophrenic musical pattern; E makes one of the most uplifting and enjoyable songs in his long and prolific career. This album has the high energy and powerful lyrics that are above and beyond a band of the Eels standing.

Campfire Girls – "Tell Them Hi" (Interscope Records) — "Tell Them Hi" is, without a doubt, the surprise record of the year. While Campfire Girls – who are all boys, by the way - have a small handful of releases under their belt but due to struggles with drugs they have never had the chance to fully come into their own. Well, the chance has arrived with "Tell Them Hi" which is a powerful, moving, and rocking album with elements of Failure-esque art-rock and Stone Temple Pilots slightly poppy alterna-rock. It is the band's mix of pop melody and artistic integrity that makes "Tell Them Hi" so good. Listeners will be moved by the songs but, at the same time, want to sing along.

except in his only loss to Kansas State, which should hurt his chances a little. He led the nation in passing efficiency with 3,744 yards, 40 TDs and only eight picks, far superior to Manning.

SCOOP: The heavy favorite, but the loss to K-State could cost him the award.

Eli Manning — Quarterback, Mississippi, 6-foot-5-inches, 218 pounds, Sr.

It's pays to play in the most political sport in college athletics. If this guy's last name weren't Manning, Leinhart would no doubt be the fourth candidate for the Heisman.

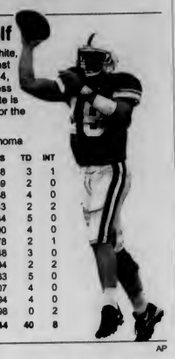
Manning did post some impressive numbers with 3,341 passing yards, 27 TDs and only nine INTs, and completed 61 percent of his passes. Archie's boy threw two interceptions in a game only twice, but both contests were losses.

In all fairness, Manning is the best quarterback prospect in nation and won the Johnny Unitas Golden Arm Award for the top senior QB. He has shown the pedigree, mentality and mechanics that make NFL scouts drool. Also, he posted some great stats on a team with far less talent than White's.

SCOOP: Best quarterback in the land and likely Top 10 draft pick will receive the majority of the SEC writers' votes, giving him a good chance.

Larry Fitzgerald — Wide Receiver, Pittsburgh, 6-foot-3-inches, 210 pounds, So.

There is no better NFL offensive prospect this season than the next coming of Randy Moss. Fitzgerald scored a touchdown in all 12 games this season — tying Moss' single-season record — and set a record for catching a score in 18 consecutive games.



Fitzgerald finished an amazing sophomore campaign with 87 catches for 1,595 receiving yards and 22 TDs. The most impressive stat is the fact this kid averaged 18.3 yards per catch, which is almost unheard of. He had three touchdowns in two games, found the end zone twice in six games, and had over 200 receiving yards twice. His performance was so consistent, there is no way to determine his best game.

A rare combination of size, speed, athleticism, hands and god-given talent make him an ideal No. 1 target. The only game he didn't perform well in was against Miami for the Big East Championship, catching only three passes for 27 yards. Of course, he still hit pay-dirt.

SCOOP: The most talented and exciting candidate of the bunch, but will not receive enough votes with the Big East and Midwest to contend for the award.

In a class by himself

Oklahoma quarterback Jason White, who will lead the Sooners against LSU in the Sugar Bowl on Jan. 4, was named The Associated Press College Player of the Year. White is one of the leading contenders for the 2003 Heisman Trophy.

Chris Perry- Running Back, Michigan, 6-foot-1-inch 228 pounds, Sr.

This is the least heralded hopeful of the four. Perry gave himself a big-time boost in his final regular season performance against the top Big Ten defense of Ohio State. He finished with 204 yards and a pair of scores to secure the Wolverines a trip to the Rose Bowl.

Perry showed his versatility in the comeback win over Minnesota, which saved the Wolverines' season. He caught 11 passes for 122 yards and a TD while adding 85 rushing yards as well as a rushing touchdown.

Perry finished the season with 1,589 rushing yards and also caught 42 passes and scored 19 TDs.

However, his 26-yard performance against Oregon and lackluster showing in a 30-27 loss to Iowa could cost him the award.

Perry is a big, powerful speedster who could be compared to a running back like Green Bay's Ahmad Green. Perry will be a big-time NFL running back someday, no doubt.

SCOOP: Big-time NFL prospect, but will not win the Heisman.

Winner: The vote will come down to White and Manning. Manning will be a better NFL signal caller, but White's college accomplishments can't be overlooked. That's why White is my pick to win this year's Heisman.

Men's indoor makes its return

4x100-meter relay squad, and finished ninth in the high jump with a jump of 6 feet 1 and 3/4 inches. He also posted the second-best 400-meter dash time of the year with a clocking of 50.99 at the A-10 Indoor Champion-ships.

Senior David Falvey will be leading off most of the 4 x 100 relays this season. As a sophomore in '02, Falvey led off the 4 x 100 team that finished fourth in the A-10 Outdoor, placed eighth in the 400-meter dash at the A-10 Indoor with a season-best 51.08, and was a member of the Minutemen's fastest 4 x 100 and 4 x 400 relay teams.

"[Falvey]'s the person who kind of sets the table for that middle distance relay group that we have," O'Brien said.

The dynamic duo of junior Matt Clark and junior Dave McMenamy provide further depth to the middle distance core, especially in the 800 and 1500-meter race.

As freshmen, Clark placed fifth in the 1000-meter at the New England Indoor Championships with a time of 2:30.64 and ran the third leg of a 4x800 relay team that won bronze at the A-10 Outdoor, while McMenamy turned some heads by placing third or better in every single meet of the season. McMenamy, too, was part of that bronze- winning 4x800 squad.

"They were thrown into the fire quickly, and they responded very well," O'Brien said.

Junior Jon Korhonen will be one of the Minutemen leading the way in the distance events. Deemed "a 5,000-meter specialist" by O'Brien, his fifth-place finish in 15:06.45 as a freshman in the 5,000-meter was the best record by a Minuteman for that season.

The Minutemen kick off the season Jan. 24 at the University of New Hampshire, where they will compete against the likes of UNH, Boston College, and Holy Cross.

UM, Cats skate to tie

The shot popped in the air off of Ayers, and the steady netminder, falling to his backside, reached up and slapped the puck out of midair with his paddle, saving a near-certain goal.

"We didn't expect [Ayers] to be anything but very good," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. Winer said his game stepped up because of the man in the opposite net as well.

"Mike Ayers is a great goalie, and any time you get the chance to prove yourself against him, it's a great opportunity," Winer said.

UNH opened up the scoring after a slew of penalties in the first period. With UMass' Stephen Jacobs and Wildcat Patrick Foley serving matching minor penalties for roughing, Matt Fetzer joined Jacobs in the box for holding the stick at 12:07. However, just as Fetzer got comfortable, Brian Yandle took a feed from Justin Aikins at the point, and blasted it over Winer's shoulder, careening in off the crossbar to make it 1-0 UNH.

UMass gave the visitors a scare of their own, when Stephen Werner found Kevin Jarman emerging from the left wing, and fed him just outside the UNH zone. Jarman took off alone on Ayers, but the senior from Hingham made a stellar glove save to keep the hosts off the board.

The Minutemen will travel to Cambridge Saturday to play Harvard at the Bright Center. UMass will then enjoy a long two-week break before returning to action on Dec. 27, in the first round of the Howard Bank Classic in Burlington, Vt. against Dartmouth. On Dec. 28, they'll play either Minnesota State-Mankato or the host Vermont Catamounts, depending on the result of both opening round games.

The Minutemen will then usher in the new year with a home-and-home series against UMass Lowell, beginning on Jan. 3 at Tsongas Arena, with the third game of the Alumni Cup race — which UMass Amherst leads, 1-0 — taking place the following night at the Mullins Center.

After the Lowell series, the Minutemen will need their passports, as they'll travel to Quebec Trois-Rivieres for an exhibition on Jan. 10. Then, it'll be back to work, as the Maine Black Bears will entertain UMass for two games on Jan. 16 and 17. The Minutemen will get one more break after that weekend, before welcoming students back to campus with games against Northeastern (Jan. 29) and Merrimack (Jan. 31) at the Mullins Center.

Time to bounce

Women's hoop heads to NU

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

The word rebound has a double meaning in basketball.

In order for the Massachusetts women's basketball team to have a positive trip to Northeastern this weekend, they'll need to both rebound on the court, and rebound from their early season woes.

The Minutewomen will travel to Matthews Arena in Boston to face off against the Huskies Sunday at 2 p.m.

"I think we're ready. We've been on the road enough this year to know," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "Going to Arizona, a first class tournament like that, was a great opportunity for our kids to really know what it's like to be in the top 25."

Before last night's game against Harvard, Northeastern was coming off a 62-48 loss to Providence and has had its share of troubles early in the year.

Leading the way for the Huskies has been guard Maralene Zwarich, who leads the team in points (12.8) and rebounds (7.3) per game.

Dacko has seen that Northeastern likes to play up-tempo basketball and isn't afraid to run the court. With a week off since its last game UMass has had time to prepare for what the Huskies bring to the table.

"They want to run, so we have to be aware in our transition defense," Dacko said. "They've got some real good players inside, they do a lot of things that we'll be prepared for. They are a team that has been up and down, they've been inconsistent as well so it should be a good matchup."

The Minutewomen have started to settle into their offense after a rocky start and have been looking toward senior Judit Zsedenyi, who leads the team in 3-pointers with 11. Zsedenyi is averaging eight points per game, including 14 and 17 in victories against Utah State and Vermont, respectively.

"We knew Judit last year, her strength is her shot and I think it was her gaining confidence and being able to step up and take the shot," Dacko said.

Brooke Campbell has also been pacing the Minutewomen, leading the team on both ends of the court. Campbell has compiled a team-high 11.5 points per game. She also leads the team in rebounds, averaging 8.5 boards.

After Northeastern, UMass has eight games during Winter session. The Minutewomen will play Hartford Dec. 21, UNC-Greensboro on Dec. 30, LaSalle on Jan. 3, Saint Joseph's on Jan. 6, Temple on Jan. 9, Dayton on Jan. 11, URI on Jan. 6, and St. Bonaventure on Jan. 18. After playing Xavier at the Mullins Center on Jan. 25, they'll hit the road to play Temple in Philadelphia on Jan. 29, before returning to Amherst Feb. 1 against Fordham.

MLB set for winter meetings

three-year contract with outfielder Randy Winn and a two-year deal with right-hander Ryan Franklin.

On Wednesday, Detroit agreed to a $6 million, two-year contract with second baseman Fernando Vina, Colorado agreed to a $2.1 million, one-year deal with third baseman Vinny Castilla, and Texas replaced Rafael Palmeiro by agreeing to $1 million, one-year contract with Brad Fullmer.

Pittsburgh settled on minor league contracts with outfielder Daryle Ward and right-hander Juan Acevedo.

The New York Mets finalized their $20.1 million, three-year contract with shortstop Kazuo Matsui, and San Diego completed a two-year contract with reliever Akinori Otsuka, a deal worth just under $2 million.

In Texas, general manager John Hart sounded doubtful the Rangers would pull off the big-money trade that would send AL MVP Alex Rodriguez to Boston for Manny Ramirez. Hart said he and Texas manager Buck Showalter had said "many, many times" that they envision Rodriguez staying with the Rangers.

"We've been saying all along this thing has taken on a life of its own and has been a runaway fire," Hart said.

Around the major leagues, teams prepared for the start of the winter meetings Friday in New Orleans.

"I think the first thing we're going to do is we're going to find out where the Yankees and Red Sox are staying and go hang around their rooms and see if somebody drops their wallet," said Doug Melvin, general manager of the low-budget Milwaukee Brewers. "I think they're going to dominate the meetings, the Yankees and Red Sox, the A-Rod thing."

Giants general manager Brian Sabean believes the winter meetings could be quiet for most teams.

"You know how business is done: You can't predict it," he said. "I'm not going to speculate. We always have irons in the fire. Just because the winter meetings are about to commence doesn't mean you'll do business or be forced to do business."

Pettitte, 31, was signed by the Yankees in 1991 and went 149-78, including 21-8 with a 4.02 ERA last season. If he had stayed in New York, he would have had the chance to surpass Whitey Ford's 236 victories and become the winningest pitcher in team history.

With the Astros, he joins a team trying to rebuild and win at the same time. Houston dealt closer Billy Wagner to Philadelphia last month in a cost-cutting move. Pettitte will combine with Wade Miller and Roy Oswalt to form a powerful front three in the rotation.

Brown, who turns 39 in March, signed baseball's first $100 million contract with the Dodgers, a deal that has two seasons remaining at $15 million annually.

He was 14-9 with a 2.39 ERA last year for Los Angeles, but has pushed for a trade to a team closer to his home in Macon, Ga.

Injuries limited him to 19 starts in 2001 and 10 in 2002, but he rebounded to make 32 starts last season, when he had the second-lowest ERA in the NL behind Jason Schmidt.

Weaver, 27, has struggled since the Yankees acquired him from Detroit in July 2002, failing to keep his spot in the rotation. He was 7-9 with a 5.99 ERA last season, and allowed the 12th-inning homer to Florida's Alex Gonzalez that won the pivotal fourth game of the World Series.

Another free agent the Yankees are dealing with, outfielder Gary Sheffield, is confident he will sign with New York despite differences that have jeopardized the deal.

"We'll get it done," Sheffield told The Associated Press on Wednesday night as he watched the Maryland-Florida basketball game from the stands.

Sheffield, who became a free agent after playing for Atlanta the last two seasons, agreed with New York owner George Steinbrenner on the parameters of a deal that would be worth $39 million over three seasons, the baseball official said. But the sides have argued over deferred money and a no-trade clause.

AP Sports Writers Jaime Aron in Texas, Jamie McCauley in San Francisco, Eddie Pells in Gainesville, Fla., and Arnie Stapleton in Milwaukee contributed to this report.

Not quite enough

Callander is UMass killer again in draw

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

Preston Callander's name must be becoming pretty unpopular around the Massachusetts hockey team's locker room.

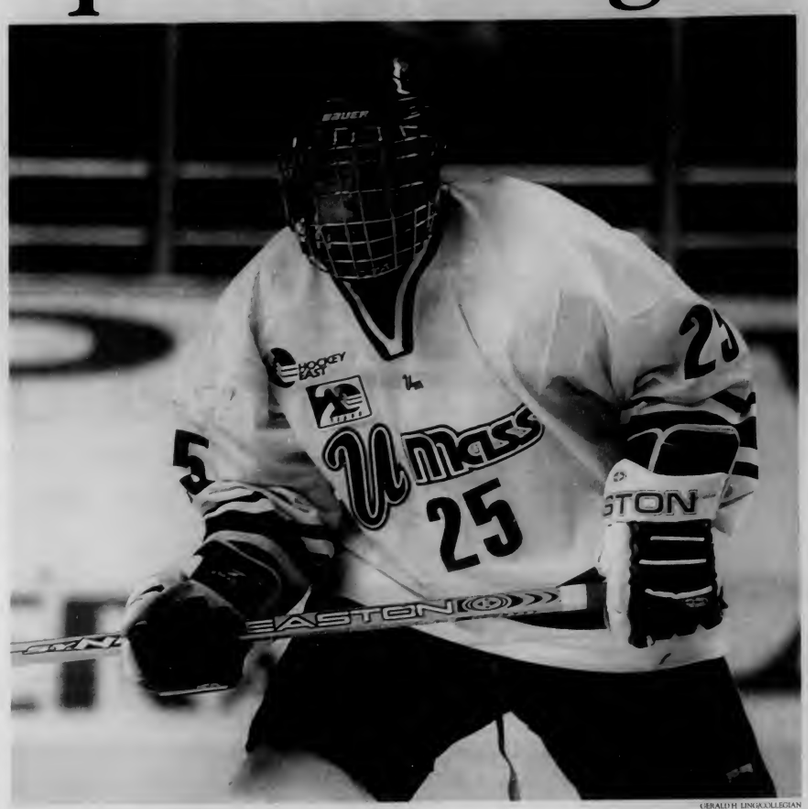
The man who ended the Minutemen's playoff run with a flick of the wrist last March, and who scored a critical penalty-shot goal against UMass in their second regular season matchup of 2002-03, struck once again, although the result was slightly less decisive.

With less than two minutes to go in last night's game, the New Hampshire Wildcats' junior forward skated deep into the UMass zone, and fired a centering pass towards goaltender Gabe Winer's crease. The puck deflected off of Winer's skate and in, sending the game into a 2-2 tie, where it stood for the final 6:18 of play (including overtime), giving both teams their third Hockey East tie of the season.

Callander's fluky goal nullified the work of Marvin Degon, who gave the Minutemen a 2-1 advantage late in the second period. Degon found a chink in UNH goaltender Mike Ayers' armor 49 seconds into the third period. He fired a wrist shot from the right wing face-off dot, and it deflected off of Ayers' arm and in.

"It's especially frustrating, because we had them with one minute to go," Degon said.

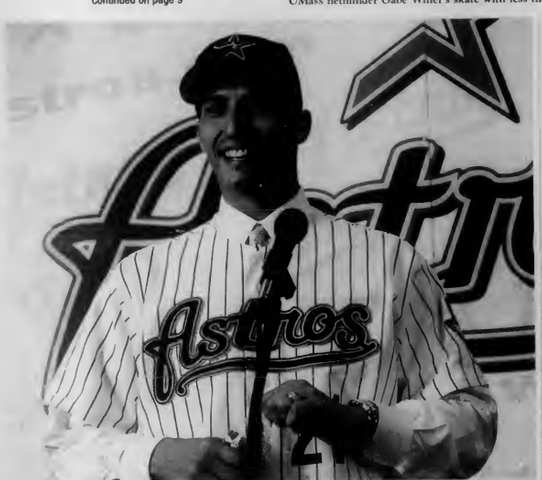
Despite the four combined goals allowed, the game's netminders were the showcase. Gabe Winer stopped 23 shots, but many of the saves came on quality scoring chances. UNH's ever-steady Mike Ayers turned away 31 shots, including a couple of highlight-worthy stops.



"It's always fun when it's a goaltenders' game. It's just one of those games you enjoy playing, not like [Boston University], which is always a bloodbath."

UNH won't face the Terriers, who Ayers shut out on Nov. 7 in a 4-0 victory, until March 4 and 6, the last weekend of the season.

After a first period full of chances but no capitalization, the Minutemen finally put things together late in the second period. Thomas Pöck took a feed from James Solon with Wildcat Justin Aikins in the box on a roughing call, and ripped a wrist shot past Ayers on the glove side to knot the score at one with 1:43 to go in the middle frame.



Prior to Pöck's tally, there wasn't any scoring in the second period, but there was plenty of action. The chippy play that began in the first period continued, and a total of 14 penalties had been called by the end of the second. Ayers became the center of the action when Kevin Jarman tried to convert on a Chris Capraro pass.

Marvin Degon scored for the Minutemen at 4:08 of the third, giving UMass a 2-1 lead. However, UNH's Preston Callander countered with a goal off UMass netminder Gabe Winer's skate with less than two minutes to go in regulation, and the teams skated to a 2-2 tie at the Mullins Center.

Former New York Yankees pitcher Andy Pettitte smiles during a news conference with the Houston Astros yesterday in Houston. The Astros announced yesterday that the club has signed the free-agent left-handed pitcher to a three-year contract.

Pettitte is an Astro

By Ronald Blum

NEW YORK (AP) — Andy Pettitte chose home over history, agreeing Thursday to sign with the Houston Astros and leave the New York Yankees.

New York wasted little time in trying to land a replacement, closing in on a trade with Los Angeles that would send Kevin Brown to the Yankees for Jeff Weaver in a swap of starters, a baseball official said on the condition of anonymity.

Pettitte accepted Houston's heavily backloaded $31.5 million, three-year deal after weighing a new offer from the Yankees on Wednesday night, another baseball source said, also on the condition of anonymity.

He took $7.5 million less to sign with the Astros, both sources said. The Astros play near Pettitte's hometown of Deer Park, an important factor for the pitcher's family.

"They really wanted me here," Pettitte said. "My heart started pulling me and tugging me to come back down here and play in front of the Astros and the Houston fans."

Pettitte will get $5.5 million next season, $8.5 million in 2005 and $17.5 million in 2006, according to contract details obtained by The Associated Press.

In other baseball news Thursday, catcher Benito Santiago completed his $4.3 million, two-year contract with Kansas City. Among players eligible for arbitration, left-hander Mark Buehrle and the Chicago White Sox agreed to an $18 million, three-year deal. Seattle settled on an $11 million,

Men's Indoor track returns

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

After a one-year hiatus, the Massachusetts men's indoor track squad will be back in action this winter, picking up where it left off after being eliminated from the athletic program in 2002.

"I know that the team members are extremely excited, they were very thrilled when they heard about it ... the good news traveled fast," coach Jim O'Brien said. "I'm ecstatic about it also ... I want to see the kids who come to the University have a complete track program. It means a lot in the their preparation; they work throughout the whole year to have a full season, not just a half-season."

The Minutemen return several bright young stars from two seasons ago, which have all matured into promising athletes looking to gather some wins this winter.

They will benefit from a good balance in the middle distance and distance events, showcased by multi-event senior John O'Neil. In 2002, O'Neil made a name for himself by capturing the Atlantic 10 Outdoor Championship decathlon title with 5,796 points. O'Neil then outdid himself at the New England Championships by placing third with a personal-best 5,941. Also as a sophomore last year, O'Neil was UMass's third-leading scorer with 36.75 points, and posted the school's fourth-fastest time in the 500-meter dash with a time of 1:04.41.

Up-and-coming sophomore James Godinho figures to add some firepower to the sprints and long jump events this winter season.

"James is one of our team's outstanding long jumpers, and he runs a tremendous 400-meter run," O'Brien said.

Junior James McCormack is a triple threat at long jump, triple jump and high jump, and provides some depth at 400 meters as well. As a freshman in 2002, McCormack placed a team-best seventh in the A-10 Outdoor Championship with a blazing time of 22.1, ran the second leg of the

Forecasting Heisman

Todd Foster

The time has come. The regular season has ended and your school's bowl game is circled on the calendar. Highlights of upsets and amazing plays are being featured on Sportscenter after the exciting, unexpected happenings during this fall.

There is one thing left for an armchair quarterback to wait for: the Heisman Trophy winner.

Unfortunately, USC got screwed in this race, too. Everyone knows that the college football brass stripped the Trojans of their championship dream with a BCS equation only Raymond Babbitt could solve. Now, USC quarterback Matt Leinhart will not have a seat at the Yale Club in NYC Saturday.

Many fans, East Coast sportswriters and voters have not paid enough attention to the 6-foot-5-inch, 220-pound sophomore gunslinger. In fact, three of Leinhart's final stats — 63.0 completion percentage, 35 touchdowns and a 12-1 record — are better than Heisman hopeful Eli Manning's 61.7 completion percentage, 27 touchdowns and 9-3 record. Leinhart also threw for 3,252 with only nine interceptions.

Though Leinhart is unfairly left off the list, the four Heisman candidates are worthy of their nomination. The two quarterbacks — Oklahoma's Jason White and Ole Miss' Manning — were the heavy favorites in the early season, with one being the top quarterback prospect (Manning) and the quarterback of the No. 1 team (White). Pittsburgh wide receiver Larry Fitzgerald is only a sophomore, but has been hyped to be the best thing since Randy Moss. The final candidate was one of the most underrated players in the nation last season as a junior, but Michigan senior running back Chris Perry is now earning the respect he deserved a year ago.

Jason White — Quarterback, Oklahoma, 6-foot-3-inches, 221 pounds, Sr.

White deserves a seat at the Yale Club more than anyone this year. Not because he has the best season statistics — though he does — or because he was the leader of what was considered "the best team of all-time" by some writers — he was that, too. The reason is he returned after back-to-back season-ending knee injuries in 2001 and 2002, to be the most dynamic passer in college football next to Texas Tech's BJ Symons.

The Tuttle, Okla. native has enjoyed one of the best seasons by a college quarterback. White could always be counted on for at least two scores every game,

UMass presidential search nearing final stages

By FERRON SALNIKER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The search for a next president of the University of Massachusetts entered a new phase in December, narrowing down the candidate field to 12 semifinalists and inching a few steps closer to naming a new president.

The 24-member committee, which first met in September, announced the semifinalists at the committee's third meeting on Dec. 10. The names of the semifinalists were not made public, due to state law prohibiting the violation of privacy of the candidates.

Candidates applied and were also nominated for the post.

"Many people were nominated, which produced a large amount of candidates," said Robert P. Connolly, a spokesman for the UMass President's Office.

Connolly said that by the end of the third week of January, each of the semifinalists had been interviewed.

"There is a likelihood that these were initial interviews," said Connolly. "It may be expected that there will be second interviews with some of the candidates."

The interviews, which last one and a half hours each, will be assessed during late January and into mid-February.

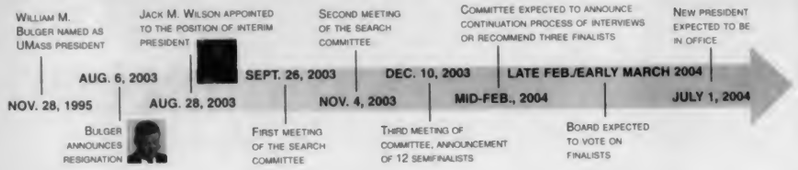
"After that time the committee is expected to meet by mid-February, they will meet and make a decision, concerning whether they are ready to designate the finalists to recommend to the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees or conduct further interviews," said Connolly.

The committee is expected to recommend three candidates to the board of trustees for consideration. After the recommendation the board is expected to schedule a meeting in late February or early March, to vote on the finalists. Connolly said that the anticipation is to name a president by the first quarter of the year, and to have the new president in office by July 1.

"The aim is to have to the new president in office by then so he or she can get acquainted with the UMass system and fully up to speed, basically so he or she can be ready."

The committee is searching to replace William M. Bulger, the former president who stepped down Sept. 1, 2003 because of pressure from state officials. Bulger, who served as president of the live-campus system for seven and one half years, retired amid questions of his fugitive brother James "Whitey" Bulger, who is wanted by the FBI in connection with several murders in the Boston area.

Dr. Jack M. Wilson, previously the vice president for academic affairs of UMass, has served as interim president for the past semester. Dr. Wilson is the founding chief executive officer of UMassOnline; the University's Web-based learning initiative.



Wilson came to UMass after 11 years at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute (RPI), where he was the J. Erik Jonsson '22 distinguished professor of physics, engineering science, information technology, and management. He was the founding director of the Anderson Center for Innovation in Undergraduate Education and co-director of the Severino Center for Technological Entrepreneurship at RPI. In addition, he served as a dean and interim provost at RPI.

Wilson was also the co-founder and chairman of LearnLinc Corporation, now part of Mentergy Corp., a supplier of software systems for corporate training for Fortune 1000 companies.

Wilson's term is not necessarily coming to an end, as he was nominated to take the permanent position.

"His position is not finished until the new president is chosen," said

New fee to pinpoint international students

By ERIKA LOVLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Beginning this semester, a new fee called the New International Student fee will target international students and faculty on the University of Massachusetts campus.

The International Programs Office imposed the $65 fee in order to pay for the costs of the Student and Exchange Visitor Information System. The system requires all international students to register personal information into the SEVIS database, which is directly connected to the Department of Homeland Security. This allows the government to monitor the activities of any international student in the nation.

SEVIS requires students to report information ranging from change in major, transfers, change of local address, new employment and student status.

The fee also goes toward the processing costs incurred by the IPO, including data entry, issuance of visa documents, and continual monitoring of student status and updating the SEVIS system.

"We have to be as accurate and up to date as possible. If the information is not accurate, that could disadvantage the student," said Frank Hugus, the director of IPO.

Failing to comply with the SEVIS terms or refusing to pay the fee could result in suspension from the university or deportation. This fee is in addition to the $100 fee imposed on international students for other SEVIS related activities.

"Homeland Security [could note] that the student is out of status and deportation may result," said Hugus. "That's why we have to guarantee that all information entered into the SEVIS system is accurate."

The ordinance applies to every international student that attends a university, college or secondary school that accepts international students.

ACTION ON CAMPUS

The Graduate Employee Organization at UMass is organizing a movement against the fee, claiming it is discriminatory. According to GEO's online statement denouncing the fee, the IPO is used by domestic and international students alike, making the new fee discriminatory to foreign students.

"We are mobilizing a pretty significant campaign," said Chris Vials, president of GEO. "GEO is fighting the fact that international students are being asked to pay for their own surveillance."

GEO is also filing a grievance against the University, claiming that the fee violates their contract. International students have also had to contend with rising rates of rent, tuition and curriculum fees. By law, international students cannot take out loans and can only be granted tuition waivers if the need and money exists.

"There will probably be a demonstration [this] semester," Vials said. "We are still deciding on what forms of protest to use. Talk is out that some students will refuse to pay the fee."

A UMass student is still recovering from severe injuries after a 32-foot fall

A long way to go

By DAN LAMOTHE AND ERIKA LOVLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

HE'S endured two broken elbows, two broken wrists, a broken kneecap, a jaw wired shut, a liquid diet and multiple surgeries to repair his injuries.

He's weathered more than two weeks at UMass Medical Center in Worcester, dozens of miles away from his friends at the University of Massachusetts and hundreds of miles from his home in Fairfax, Va.

His mother says he sleeps until 3 or 4 p.m. some days, and his brother says he is lucky to be alive.

Kunal Malhotra, an 18-year-old UMass freshman, survived a 32-foot drop from a window ledge at MacKimmie Hall shortly after midnight on Dec. 6. He's been healing from his injuries ever since.

As the recovery process continues, however, Malhotra says he has never lost site of the upbeat outlook he has always had on life.

"I'm a little more relaxed," he said via a telephone interview with The Massachusetts Daily Collegian from his home in Fairfax. "I try to take things more day by day and be a little more careful."

Witnesses say Malhotra stood on a radiator in the third floor men's bathroom before stepping out onto the ledge, according to Patrick Archbald, deputy chief of UMass Police. With the encouragement of friends, he stepped back in briefly, but chose to go back out onto the ledge.

Archbald said it appears Malhotra then inched along the ledge in an attempt to communicate through a window with people in a nearby room.

Then he fell.

A DIFFICULT SEQUENCE OF EVENTS

Many of the details from that evening remain unclear — even, Malhotra says, for himself.

"As far as the particulars of the accident, I really don't remember," he said. "I don't remember anything."

Archbald said police found him on the UMass finds metal sculpture students a new home

By DAN LAMOTHE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Metal sculpture students at the University of Massachusetts will have something this semester that has been missing since a fire destroyed the New Massachusetts Foundry Building on April 22, 2003: a home.

"We're basically outfitting a brand new studio," said Linda Bruntse, an art department instructor for welding.

The art department was able to secure space in room 122 of the Agricultural Building, a large brick structure near the Art Barn and Textbook Annex. The new home means metal working students will not have to use temporary facilities spread out all over campus — facilities which include an outdoor welding arrangement that was set up on Tillson Farm with a metal storage trailer.

SCOTT LEDRIDGE/COLLEGIAN

Bruntse checks oxyacetylene torches and equipment in the new lab last week.

"This is a major plus for our three-dimensional studies program," said Ron Michaud, art department chair. "We'll be able to offer a full range of welding courses, with as many as 12 to 14 students. That's quite a few, given the nature of the work."

According to Michaud, the department obtained the space with the help of UMass Facilities and Campus Planning. He said he submitted a proposal to the groups last semester stating that if the University could find a useable space for the art department, they would be in a position to offer a welding class for the spring. Michaud expressed gratitude to both groups, saying they played an integral role in obtaining the space, which is under the jurisdiction of the plant and soil science department.

"It was the Facilities and Campus Planning people who actually approached the department to see if they could work something out," Michaud said.

Bruntse and a few students have spent the last few weeks setting up the studio, outfitting it with a combination of tools and parts that survived the Foundry blaze and newer items, including tables and storage racks they built out of a 2000-pound shipment of steel.

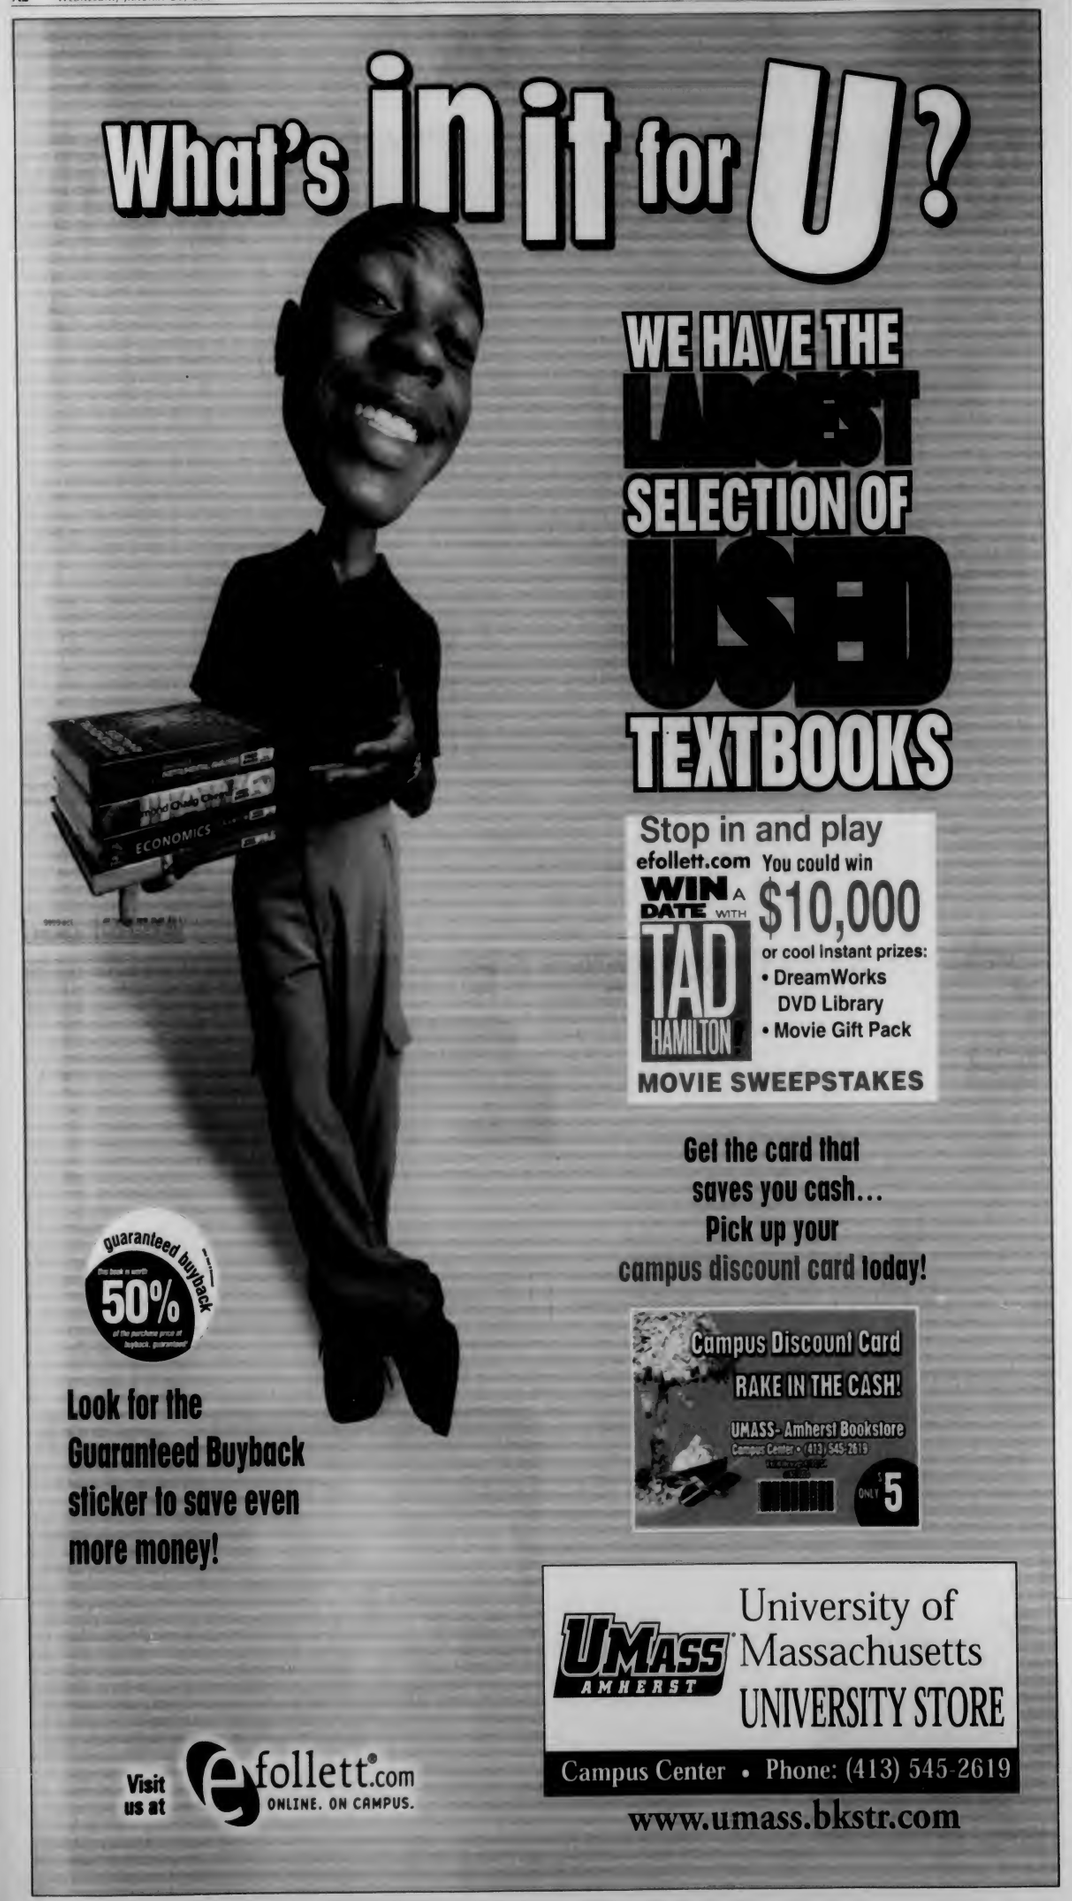
The studio itself has brick walls, a high ceiling and a cement floor, and a garage door that can be opened for extra ventilation. Bruntse said all bode well for the fire safety of the building.

"It's certainly a more industrial space," she said.

Bruntse said several students have played instrumental roles in getting the new space ready in time for the first day of classes.

"They've been really great because they of course want the space," she said. "I couldn't clean up without them and I certainly couldn't set up this shop."

SCOTT LEDRIDGE/COLLEGIAN



Line Bruntse, metal fabrications instructor, works in the new welding lab in the Agriculture Building last week. After a fire leveled the New Massachusetts Foundry Building last spring, the art department had been looking for a new space.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian found two students, senior Justin Clark and junior Nathan Peterson, working last week with Bruntse. They were making trips to the new studio from some of the temporary spots Foundry equipment has been stored in since the fire, including Marshall Annex, the New Africa House and the Foundry Annex.

"I'm really psyched," Clark said. "There's a lot of potential here."

Despite the department finding a new home,

UMass searches for provost and senior vice chancellor

By Ferron Salniker
Collegian Staff

Last month the University of Massachusetts launched a nationwide search for provost and senior vice chancellor.

Charlena Seymour, former graduate school dean, has served as interim provost and senior vice chancellor since May 2001, holding a position that has chief management authority over the campus's nine Schools and Colleges, in addition to the Graduate School and Commonwealth College.

The Provost and Senior Vice Chancellor is the chief academic officer and reports directly to the chancellor.

The 22-member search committee, headed by Cleave Willis, dean of the College of Natural Resources and the Environment, includes representatives from all nine colleges and schools as well the Office of Information Technologies.

"It's a large committee of a group of wonderfully intellectual people that spans the spectrum of campus," said Willis. "It's 22 people strong from all different areas of campus."

The committee met with Chancellor John V. Lombardi for the first time in early December.

"I have met with the committee and indicated that this process is one of recruiting the best possible person to take on this responsibility," said Lombardi in an e-mail.

"We want someone with strong academic credentials, strong record of experience in academic administration in major universities of our type, and excellent abilities to work with faculty, students and staff in improving our academic programs."

UMass has posted an advertisement for the position on a Web site, as well as in the Chronicle of Higher Education. The advertisement briefly describes the UMass campus and surrounding area, in addition to listing important qualifications and attributes candidates should have.

The Web site says important attributes for the position include "demonstrated academ-

Student Activities Center to renew student spirit

By Ferron Salniker
Collegian Staff

In an effort to improve service to the student body, the office previously known as the Campus Activities Office is undergoing significant internal and external changes, beginning with the first step of renaming the office.

"We are renaming the office, and it is now called the Student Activities Center," said Michael Gargano, the vice chancellor of student affairs. "I thinks the change is significant because it really emphasizes who the office is serving — which is students."

Judy Gagnon, interim director of advising at the center, expressed her enthusiasm over the new name.

"I'm really excited that the word student is back in our name," she said. "I'm excited that it is called center — that way it can be a place where students can go to have fun, we don't really have a hang out place like other universities, this gives the sense that there is a place to go and there are things to do."

The name change is only the first and most visible change within a larger agenda, headed by Gargano and the Student Activities Center. The center's main goals are to increase events for students on campus and become more responsive to student needs.

"The new focus of the Student Activities Center is really going to be to develop and implement major events that students would like to see on campus," said Gargano. "So there will be four to five major events on campus throughout the year, similar to what we had during the first week of school."

For now the sign on the front of the center is the only physical change, in an effort to be financially conscious current letterheads and business cards will be used up before the office creates a new design.

Another important aspect of the new initiative is to streamline policies and procedures.

"There's a lot of bureaucracy on campus, we've always tried to streamline procedures" said Gagnon. "We've always tried to get it across that our needs are more important. Sometimes the state restricts us, but we try and see if there is an easier way of doing things."

So far the office has begun its mission, closing out last semester with several programs aimed to guide the student body through the stress of final exams.

"This past fall we had pop-up programs, during finals we had a stress relief program in the Campus Center Concourse, we handed out stress balls we had massages, in the craft center we had button making," said Gagnon. "It was just a good way to break up the stress of finals and the holidays."

Picking up where they left off, the center has several activities planned for the start of spring semester.

"Welcoming week is the first week that we are back. As a welcome back, we will have a number of events," said Gagnon. "We'll have a carnival as students stand in line at the Bursar's office, we'll be handing out toys and schedules of events." Gagnon also mentioned a contest centered on Groundhog Day. The winner will receive two free airline tickets courtesy of Continental Airlines.

The center is also planning for a Black History Month program, an International Women's Month program and is creating a Martin Luther King Jr. Award, which will be awarded to a student with qualities and philosophies that are similar to those of Dr. King. The award will be awarded April 4, which is the anniversary of Dr. King's death.

"Another example of something I'd like to do, I would love to see us in April when the weather breaks, on a Friday, have a huge outdoor concert, with student performers here at the University," said Gargano. "I think students will like it."

Another event expected to be held in the spring is the first ever Festival of the Arts.

"We've been working with Dean Lee Edwards, and collaborating on a new program that is called Festival of the Arts," said Gargano. "It is going to showcase the special talents of our student body in a whole variety of different categories, art and music and dance, sculpture and poetry. We have very talented students here and I just want to give students the chance to display their uniqueness and show the world how special we are."

Staff in the Student Activities Center hold up a banner displaying their new name. The Center was previously known as the Campus Activities Office.

Snow cleared off Northampton Bike Trail

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

In a one-year effort to help increase student safety during the winter months, the Northampton Department of Public Works will plow snow from the Northampton Bike Trail for the first time in its 10-year history.

The plowing of the trail is related to the closing of the sidewalk on Bridge Road, the normal pedestrian walkway for students heading to and from John F. Kennedy Middle School. The sidewalk is closed for construction purposes.

According to George Andrikidis, director of the Northampton Department of Public Works, all 2.5 miles of bike path will be plowed in the event of a snow or ice storm. The plowing effort, Andrikidis said, is a commitment for this winter alone.

"We never had the resources [to plow it in the past] and we don't have the resources now. However, we do plow it [this year] to provide safety for children," Andrikidis said.

The decision to plow the trail comes at a time of financial hardship for the DPW. In response to budget cuts, the department has lost nine manual labor staff members, all of which worked with plows. Only five of these positions have been filled.

"For the last three years, the DPW budget has steadily decreased. Our personnel are working much longer hours than what I would consider to be safe, especially during large snowstorms," Andrikidis said.

In an effort to save money, the department has also decided to plow the parking lots of the Northampton Public Schools — a job formerly done by private contractors.

"However, money does not plow a sidewalk. People and machinery do. We are stretched to the limit. Once the sidewalk is completed on bridge road we will stop plowing the bikeway unless someone gives us the resources to do it," said Andrikidis.

Several local businesses and Northampton residents want to see the bike trail plowed in the winters to come. Residents rely on the bike path for transportation, as well as recreation.

Craig Della Penna, owner of Sugar Maple Trailside Inn, relies on the bike trail as a tourist attraction for his customers.

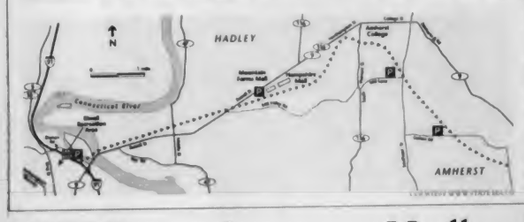
"About 15 percent of our traffic is directly related to the trail. Seventy percent of the people who stay here use the trail for either a walk after breakfast or a bike ride. There's still about 75,000 people using this trail every year," Della Penna said.

It would be beneficial to keep the trail open year-round due to the high amounts of pedestrian activity, Della Penna said.

Della Penna is developing a Web site with a 24-hour camera that records all movements on the bike trail. The site, which will be available at www.trailweb.org, will also feature a counter that will show the number of people that pass by the camera.

"It's not uncommon to see a couple hundred people per day, even in the winter," Della Penna said. "People can go to the site and see exactly what sort of various characters are out there. We will be able to quantify how many people are actually out using the trail."

Several groups in the community are working toward funding next year's bike trail plowing. The Northampton Pedestrian-Bike Alliance is a grassroots organization that does fundraising for trail betterments and extensions. According to Della Penna, the group was instrumental in approving the installation of a pedestrian traffic light, which will be placed by the Northampton Stop and Shop this spring.



Community members and small businesses along the trail have also raised funds.

"About $30,000 has been raised in the last few years, largely coming from people who live along this trail who want to see it extended and made better," Della Penna said.

The bike trail was built in 1984 and connects to the University of Massachusetts campus near Southwest Residential Area by the Norwottock Trail. The Norwottock Rail Trail is an 8.5-mile asphalt path, which connects Northampton, Hadley and Amherst. It will eventually connect to the Franklin County bikeway, and pass through Greenfield.

WFCR to relocate to Hadley

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

88.5 FM/WFCR, an affiliate of National Public Radio, has chosen a site for its new broadcasting facility. The new site is located on Rocky Hill Road in Hadley, on property owned by the University of Massachusetts.

Friends of WFCR are currently working on a campaign to raise $5.5 million dollars to pay for the new facility.

Currently, the WFCR station is operating under less than pleasant conditions on the third floor of Hampshire House, a building located near Southwest. Leaking ceilings due to rainfall and snow melting has ruined electronic equipment needed for broadcasting. Old wiring systems have prevented the station from installing new technology needed to keep up with the other radio stations.

Soundproofing is inadequate, causing noise disruptions during interviews and recording processes. Lack of space is also an issue, making it impossible to host live performances and events. A rain catch has been installed in one of the rooms to drain the dripping water.

Hampshire House was originally a dorm built in the late 1940s to house war veterans and their families while they continued their education.

The new building has 11,000 square feet of space and will include a studio for performances, community activities, and volunteer work. An interviewing studio, student media training facilities, and technology for digital and multimedia broadcasts will also be included. This will allow WFCR to participate in web broadcasting.

WFCR is in its fourth decade, and reaches more than 153,000 listeners in Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Hampshire and Vermont. The station covers news, and broadcasts 12 hours of classical, jazz and folk music programming every day. Two talk shows, "Morning Edition" and "All Things Considered," are also broadcasted. The station also sponsors cultural trips as well as local arts and music events.

Local professor lands work with Mars mission

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

A local professor is gathering data that will help scientists analyze the mineral compositions of rock samples retrieved from NASA's Mars Exploration Rover Mission.

Darby Dyar, a professor of astronomy at Mount Holyoke College, specializes in Mössbauer data, which includes identifying minerals and "fingerprinting" their iron content.

National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Mars Fundamental Research Program awarded Dyar a $150,000 grant to fund her work in 2003.

"The biggest point of this mission is to follow the water," said Dyar. "We know that there is no water on the surface of Mars now, but if we look back in geological time we can tell if there was."

Dyar's research focuses on understanding how hydrogen and oxygen are distributed on Mars. If she finds minerals with hydrogen in their structures, it could indicate that there was once water on the planet's surface.

"The whole point is to find out what minerals were on the surface and if any of them were hydrous," Dyar said.

According to Dyar, geological evidence points very strongly that there was some form of liquid on Mars' surface at some point in time.

"Ninety percent of scientists believe it was water and 10 percent believe it was liquid carbon dioxide," she said.

Dyar works in the Mount Holyoke Mössbauer laboratory, where she tests more than 60 different minerals that could possibly be found in the Mars samples. The samples are placed inside a tube and chilled in a refrigerator, while cold liquid helium circulates on the outside. This simulates conditions similar to those found on Mars. According to Dyar, these conditions are somewhere around four degrees Kelvin, or up to negative 260 degrees Fahrenheit.

During the mission, a rover chooses a rock and extends a tool from its arm known as a rock abrasion tool, or a RAT. The RAT grinds a hole in the rock to take pictures with a tiny camera on the end of its arm. At this time, the chemical composition of the rock is measured with a tool known as a mouse, or Mössbauer spectrometer, which will tell scientists what type of iron is in the sample. The process takes at least 12 hours.

"I think the most likely mineral we'll find on Mars will be hematite, which is a hydrous mineral," Dyar said.

However, this data will not be helpful to NASA without Dyar's help. Scientists only know how to read the data results taken from temperatures found on Earth, not the extreme cold temperatures found on Mars. In the Mount Clapp Laboratory at Mount Holyoke College, Dyar is able to simulate the type of readings that NASA needs.

The scientists who comprise the NASA science team in Pasadena get to examine the Mars data first. They are not required to release the data or results for six months.

"I am the only person who has the right database," said Dyar. "I am waiting to talk to them."

Dyar has also studied Martian meteorites from Antarctica and moon rocks for the last 24 years. She says meteorites that fell on Earth as early as the 1990s still hold important data about the red planet.

The rocks have been identified as Martian samples due to bits of the planet's atmosphere that is trapped in tiny bubbles on the rocks' surfaces. The gas gets trapped when the rocks are knocked off the planet and become slightly melted from the intense heat of traveling through the atmosphere. These samples have allowed Dyar to learn more about the composition of gases on Mars.

International students face fee

2322 have also expressed their dissent toward the fee.

A motion passed by the GSS on Dec. 10, 2003 reads, "In penalizing students simply for their national origins, this fee constitutes a form of discrimination which violates the fundamental principles of liberty and democracy."

The SEVIS program has been enacted as part of the USA Patriot Act, which passed in legislation after the events of Sept. 11, 2001, and was designed to protect the security of U.S. citizens. This was partially due to the fact that some of the hijackers had entered the country and learned to fly airplanes by acquiring student visas.

"I think the Patriot Act goes way too far, which is a sentiment shared with most everyone on the GEO staff," said Vials.

Rene Gonzalez, a graduate student from the office of ALANA Affairs, also feels that the Patriot Act could eventually threaten the civil liberties of U.S. citizens.

"That's one of the dangers of the administration," Gonzalez said. "This harkens back to the 1940s and 1950s. It's very McCarthy."

Historically, some wartime security measures have altered or suspended the Constitutional rights of citizens in order to prevent security breeches. Examples include the anti-Communism Red Scare and the relocation of Japanese Americans during World War II.

"In the U.S., these kinds of security measures have [had] ways of stifling internal dissent and are very regressive," Vials said. "I don't think it's a positive development."

UMass continues to recognize SEVIS, even though the town of Amherst voted not to recognize the Patriot Act.

"If we don't abide by the federal law, we risk having our authority taken away from us and we would have to send all our foreign students away," said Hugus.

Hugus feels that some of the dissent from the UMass community is due to the requirement to release private information.

"Citizens don't like thinking the government has information about them," he said. "But the government already has a ton of information on [citizens] through income taxes and social security."

Hugus explained that the IPO has always required international students with a J-1 or F-1 visa to provide the same information in the past. The only difference with SEVIS is that the proceedings are done by electronics rather than paperwork.

"People have to pay for these services," said Hugus. "The fee is more like a user fee."

"That's just like saying all women need to pay a fee for Everywoman's Center. ALANA students need to pay for ALANA recruitment and handicapped need to pay for ramps. It just opens up a whole can of worms," Vials said.

According to Hugus, the fees are partially the result of budget cuts that IPO has experienced over the past year.

"We had to find a way to make up the difference between this fee and several other fees," he said.

In an e-mail to students from IPO, it was stated that the fee was necessary to fund different services and activities required of international students.

Possible Solutions

Gonzalez feels UMass has been unclear around issues concerning the New International Student fee.

"Rather than warning or aiding the students, the University has been almost secretly billing them," he said. "The fee is basically paying the University to survey the students. I don't know the details, but the fees could possibly pay for the salaries of one or two FBI officials on campus."

Other universities around the United States have dealt with similar fees in different ways. For example, at the University of Chicago, the international student fees have been spread evenly to every student's bill. Therefore, no single group of students bears the brunt of the cost.

According to Vials, this is an exception that the University should consider.

"If you do the math, the cost per student averages out to a little more than five dollars a semester. That's less than a lunch at the Blue Wall," he said. "IPO isn't happy but they need the money. They'd rather take it from somewhere else."

"Some departments may be willing to cover the fees for their students. I can't reveal any more information, but I have heard inclinations that some departments feel they should step in," said Hugus.

New building provides space

though, the Foundry is still missed. Brunt-se, who went through the program as a student before becoming an instructor, said she still remembers the night of the fire.

"I just threw down my bags right there and sat down in the hallway [when she found out while in studios she uses in Florence]. By the time I got there, the fire was almost out."

Clark said the art department did a great job of maintaining the Foundry on a shoestring budget.

"It had a great atmosphere," he said. "It really made you want to work."

Peterson said his first concern when the fire happened was finding out if anyone got hurt. Once he found out no one was hurt, he was relieved, but then reality set in.

"After a while we started realizing what it meant to the program," he said.

Clark said he and several of the other students were skeptical when they heard there was the possibility of getting a new site, and cited red tape as the reason why.

"Now we're here and it seems like it could work," he said.

The New Massachusetts Foundry Building was destroyed in a fire on April 22, 2003.

Building still in the works

As the new welding studio comes in to use, the art department and University continue to plan for a new $13.8 million building that is a part of the UMass capital plan.

According to Michaud, he and other administrators have started to take a look at architectural proposals from firms who are bidding for the rights to the building's contract.

"The pool of applicants is very, very strong," he said. "There's a fairly substantial number of applicants and the number of firms have a lot of experience with this kind of facility."

James Cahill, director of Facilities Planning, told The Collegian last spring the new art building will house programs that are currently housed in numerous buildings on campus, including Marshall Annex, the Art Barn, Milkers Bungalo, Fine Arts Center and the welding program that has just been moved. The tentative location for it is across N. Pleasant Street from the Fine Arts Center, in what is now a parking lot.

Connolly. "Jack has made it clear that he was nominated and he is going to seek the position."

Trustee Diane Bissonnette Moes, co-chair of the committee, recommended the interim president to the board back in September. Moes, who is an alumnus of UMass is joined by co-chair, Dennis G. Austin, also an alumni and UMass trustee. Moes is an attorney at Donoghue Barrett & Singal, a leading, full-service law firm, and Austin is the director of state government relations at Raytheon Company.

Search committee criticized

The search committee includes nine trustees, eight alumni or UMass supporters, three professors, three administrators and one graduate student. The process was aided under the guidance of William Funk, a preeminent higher education consultant from Korn/Ferry International, an executive search firm.

From UMass Amherst, Brian O'Connor, a biology professor, serves on the panel. O'Connor is the Faculty Senate delegate to UMass Amherst's Board of Trustees.

Although Sean Reed, a UMass Medical School graduate student serves as the committee's only student representation, Connolly said he believes that the student presence is far from missing.

"In the discussion there is much sensibility regarding the students, as there should be. What the president can do to enhance student life is a big issue," said Connolly. "It would be wrong to say that there isn't a strong student dimension on the committee."

Others on the UMass Amherst campus remain skeptical. Recently, the SGA passed a motion, authored by Senators Tristian Brown and Monique Quiles, expressing dissatisfaction with the lack of representation of undergraduates on the committee.

"Whereas there is no undergraduate representation on the Presidential Search Committee and the SGA recognizes that in order to aptly address the concerns of the undergraduate population representation is required," the motion stated.

Mina Safain, secretary of public policy and relations also worked on the motion and expressed his distress with the committee to The Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

"It's just weird to me that out of almost 100,000 undergraduate students there is no undergraduate student sitting on the panel," said Safain, exaggerating the number to emphasize his point. "The motion is designed to express our sentiment, and to have it sent to the desk of the board of trustees. We are really disappointed. It's very upsetting."

Safain explained that the position was offered to student trustees, but initially was turned down by Hannah Fatemi, UMass Amherst's student trustee. Fatemi later attempted to repeal her decline, but the board denied her of the position.

Reed replaced Rosalyn Lankowski, a student trustee at UMass Lowell after she stepped down as student trustee and from the position on the committee, due to academic demands. Reed was appointed by Grace Fey, who is chairman of the board of trustees, who directed all the appointments to the committee.

Safain also was not happy with the low student turn out at the open forum held on the UMass Amherst campus.

During the days of Sept. 30, Oct. 1 and Oct. 2 committee members visited each UMass campus to meet the chancellor at each location, and held open forums to discuss the search and receive input from members of the University community.

"There was a very low student turnout, I estimate that 45 to 50 people came and about five to seven were students," said Safain.

A complete timeline for the search, as well as the national advertisement, which appeared in The Chronicle of Higher Education, Wall Street Journal, Black Issues in Higher Education and Hispanic Outlook is posted online at www.search.massachusetts.edu. The site also offers statements from the committee co-chairs, the presidential candidate list of qualifications and attributes, as well as information on committee members.

ic leadership ability, a commitment to the highest standards of excellence, and proven success in representing the priorities of the campus to diverse audiences."

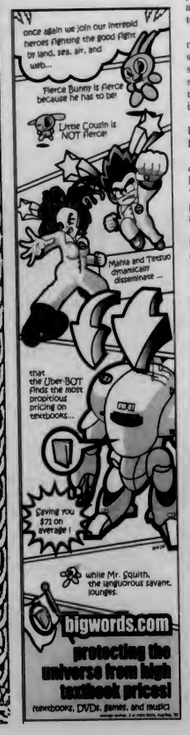
"The provost's position is very important for this university and we expect to find candidates of excellent ability and experience interested in exploring this opportunity with us," said Lombardi.

Willis said the committee hopes to find candidates with strong academic administration experience, including program developing, budget planning, evaluating of faculty and academic leadership.

"Ideally I'd like finding somebody who served as a dean at a high-level university and is ready for a step up and take on new challenges or someone with experience at a university that is larger, more complex and with a higher national ranking than our own," said Willis.

Willis also mentioned the ideal experience could be that of an ex-provost at university more comparable to UMass.

Experience also ranks high on David Carr's list of criteria. The Student Government Association president is the only undergraduate representative on the committee.



"I think what we look for the most is the candidate's relationship with students in the past," said Carr. "I've been on countless search committees and the attitude toward students is always what's important."

The committee expects to begin screening candidates in February.

"We haven't looked at any files or folders, none of the applications have been looked at," said Willis. "We'll wait to do that until we are pretty sure we have most people's applications."

Willis said the committee hopes to have interviewed all candidates before the semester comes to a close.

"We are on a schedule to have a set list of candidates and set up interviews on campus and have interviewed each candidate before the semester is out," said Willis. "It's not a good idea to do it when campus is quiet. The candidates don't get to see the vitality of the campus. We get to do the interviews on campus and pick the best candidate, and we also get to impress them by bringing them here."

Malhotra: 'I try to take things more day by day and be a little more careful' ground with labored breathing, obvious injuries to his head and limbs, and apparent broken bones. Malhotra was taken by Amherst Fire Department ambulance to Baystate Medical Center in Springfield, then shortly thereafter to UMass Medical Center.

Inside MacKimmie, friends gathered in the room that Malhotra was trying to communicate with took things hard.

"With his absence in such a sudden manner, kids were really quiet," said Chris Erickson, a UMass student who lived down the hall from Malhotra on the 22nd floor of John Adams Tower.

Erickson says he received a call from Malhotra sometime before the accident inviting him to come over, but that he had to decline because he had a paper to write.

"I got a call about 25 minutes later saying he got taken away in an ambulance," he said.

According to Erickson, Mental Health Services played a key role that night in helping out students who witnessed the fall. He says he made his way to MacKimmie after he received the phone call and took part in a counseling session at 2:30 a.m. in the dormitory's lounge.

"[They] were really helpful," he said.

Over the next few days, word traveled, and many of Malhotra's friends found out what happened through word of mouth.

Seamus Brennan, another friend from John Adams Tower, says he too received an invite from Malhotra before the incident, but he fell asleep and they didn't meet up. In the morning, he says he heard someone fell at breakfast, but didn't know who it was and made fun of it. After breakfast, as he was making his way up the four floors to visit Malhotra, he ran into Erickson, who gave him the news.

"I was in shock and disbelief that it could be my friend that fell out the window," Brennan said.

Over the next few days, Erickson says the University showed itself to be unusually sympathetic to Malhotra's friends on campus. He says administrators pushed back deadlines for papers and dates for final exams — something that impressed and surprised students affected by Malhotra's injury.

"Those were rough days," Brennan said. "I didn't really eat or sleep too well. I didn't feel like doing anything. I thought maybe I could have stopped it from happening [if I had been there]."

Malhotra, meanwhile, spent 18 days at UMass Medical Center — a stay that included 10 days unconscious and at least three or four roommates, he says.

Despite odd roommates, a liquid diet and the surgeries, Malhotra says he was never afraid, partly because his family was so supportive.

"I was never really emotionally down," he said. "I still had my same upbeat look on life, so I tried to joke around and stay pretty joyful.

" ... I had a lot of people around me. I have some family in the state itself in Worcester and outside of Boston, so it wasn't too, too bad."

Living a nightmare

Malhotra's brother tells a different story, however.

On Dec. 5, Kunal Malhotra's older brother, Kush, had one thing on his mind — graduation. The Virginia Tech senior had less than two weeks before he finished his requirements and could move home to Fairfax for the holidays.

The early morning of Dec. 6 changed all that. While his brother lay in critical condition in a hospital more than 400 miles away, Kush waited helplessly at school, learning by phone that Kunal had slipped into a coma.

"It was tough to think about," Kush said. "But I was lucky in a way. I avoided seeing the worst of the injuries. My parents saw it all."

Kush was unable to see his little brother until Dec. 21, 15 days after the accident. "When I saw him, he seemed to be himself again, aside from the braces and injuries; he was talking and responding."

According to Kush, the Malhotra parents were together with their son for the first few critical days.

"It was very difficult for all of us. It was very severe for the first couple of days," he said. "Kunal was in a coma for 48 hours, and he was still in critical condition for three to four days after the accident."

Eventually, Mr. Malhotra returned home to run the family business and keep house, Kush says. Mrs. Malhotra, however, remained by her son's side for the entire hospital stay, staying with family members in Worcester rather than living out of a hotel. Both parents were unavailable for comment, and Kush said he has acted as the family's spokesperson.

Kush has been looking forward to his little brother making a full recovery.

"I'd like to get out of the house, go to a restaurant, and just forget all about what has happened and not have to look at braces," he said. " ... Considering his injuries and [the] fall's severity, he's lucky to be alive."

A slow comeback

Since Kunal's arrival in Fairfax, the recovery process has remained slow. However, Kush says Kunal has shown few signs of frustration with his condition.

"He does get down sometimes, but you have to get frustrated sometimes," Kush said. "He's a very motivated, focused individual."

Kunal says that an outpouring of support from friends and family has made his recovery easier.

"It was nice to know that that many people cared," he said. "Even in and around the hospital, people were coming in and out then. All my friends [were] coming in and out from UMass."

> "When something of this magnitude happens, you really recognize the simple things in life. It's those things that mean the most."
> -Kush Malhotra, Kunal's older brother

To Kunal's friends at UMass, that would come as no surprise. Erickson and Brennan both described him as funny, friendly and personable person willing to be there for his friends.

"He's a very engaging person," Erickson said. "He's very well liked."

Visitors' first reactions to Kunal's condition were also uplifting.

"I think people were surprised at how much better I looked [than they thought]," Kunal said. "I think people were expecting to see a lot worse. People were most happy to see I was OK."

Although Kunal lives outside of Washington D.C. the family holidays were kept low-key.

"I was more or less sleeping," laughed Kunal about his New Year's Eve. "It was a little more of a relaxed holiday, nothing major. I was just trying to get back into good health."

It remains uncertain, but Kunal hopes to return to UMass next year.

"There are still a lot of things to be worked out, but I'd definitely love to come back," he said.

Kunal still faces operations, mostly to remove hardware and pins that are holding broken bones together. It will be two or three months before he can even consider returning to one of his favorite hobbies: sports.

"I can walk pretty easily now," Kunal said. "Sports are going to be a number of months with rehab; that's going to take some time. So in the meantime I'm just biding my time — reading, watching TV, movies, stuff like that. I have visitors and family in the house too."

Kunal says he loved his life at UMass, mentioning his participation on an intramural football team, walking around the middle of campus on nice days in between classes, of nice days between classes, and going downtown to Amherst for food as things he enjoyed. He also credits UMass for turning him onto a campus-wide tradition: rooting for the Boston Red Sox.

"I am hoping to go see a Boston Red Sox game in the spring. At UMass, I definitely grew accustomed to them, and soon I was rooting for them. I hate the Yankees. The riots showed me the die-hard passion of the Red Sox fans."

As life slowly returns to normal in the Malhotra household, Kush has had time to reflect on the lessons of the past month.

"When something of this magnitude happens, you really recognize the simple things in life," he said. "It's those things that mean the most. For Kunal, I hope he can gain something out of this and look back on it as a positive experience. When you have a traumatic experience like this, it changes everybody's life."

Students recover after cold night on Vermont mountain

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Two University of Massachusetts freshmen have returned home and are recovering after spending a frigid night outdoors on Killington Mountain, Vt. earlier this month.

Trevor Orlowski, 18, a Turfgrass Management major of East Freetown, was admitted Jan. 14 early in the morning to Rutland Regional Hospital in Vermont for treatment of frostbite to his feet. He was released Jan. 15 in the afternoon.

Brent Romagnolo, 19, a School of Management major of Assonet, was treated and released from the hospital Jan. 14.

Both of the students received frostbite. The cold temperatures affected Orlowski more on his feet and Romagnolo more on his hands, according to hospital spokesman Michael Dowdy. He added that the wind chill overnight on Jan. 13 when the teens were on the mountain was as low as minus 50 degrees.

The two went skiing on Jan. 13, said Ed Orlowski, Trevor's father. When they didn't return home by early evening, their parents notified officials at the Killington Resort.

"When the police were reluctant to search the mountain at first, I told them to check Trevor's car," Ed Orlowski said.

"Brent was supposed to meet us for dinner around 7 p.m.," Janice Romagnolo said. "My husband and I just had a bad feeling when he didn't show up."

"They saw Trevor's car without the skis on top, and they notified police right away," Orlowski said.

"Their empty bags and cell phones were still inside, so we knew they were still on that mountain somewhere," Janice Romagnolo said.

The two got lost about 2 p.m. Tuesday after skiing on a trail in a wooded area and spent all afternoon and part of the night walking to find help, according to accounts given in separate interviews by Ed Orlowski and Janice Romagnolo, Brent's mother.

"Brent said he'd die if he stopped walking and Trevor was so cold and said he couldn't walk any further," Janice Romagnolo said.

Romagnolo then left Orlowski and promised to get help, according to Janice Romagnolo.

"They kept screaming to each other as long as they could," she said.

Romagnolo found a home on the mountain about 4:30 a.m. Jan. 14. The Vermont National Guard was notified and began a search for Orlowski.

Romagnolo gave police nearly accurate directions to where he had left Orlowsky, who was found at around 8:30 a.m. by searchers in a helicopter.

"Trevor was asleep and heard the aircraft overhead and managed to wake up and wave them down," Janice Romagnolo said.

"[Trevor] is now home and resting," Ed Orlowsky said. "We are all very tired and now we are just following the doctor's prescription [for treating the injury to his toes and heels]."

"Trevor's condition seems to be improving," he continued. "He has gotten his coloring back."

"My husband and I just knew ... that Brent wasn't going to give up; he wasn't going to be denied," said Brent's mother. "We stopped [en route to Killington] at the Divine Mercy Chapel and prayed that the boys be found with no mental, emotional or cognitive damage ... It was truly a miracle."

She said that Brent had a body temperature of 93 degrees when he was taken to the hospital, and that Trevor's was down to 91 degrees when he was found.

"The doctors said that once your body temperature gets to 94 degrees, then you lose mental ability," Janice Romagnolo said. "They were all amazed how lucid the boys were."

"They saved each other's lives," she said. "Whether they were laughing, screaming or crying, they were there for each other."

Ed Orlowski was grateful and thankful to everyone at Rutland Regional Hospital and to the search team that helped find the boys.

Under Vermont law, skiers can be billed for the cost of their rescue.

As of print time, both students are expected to make a full recovery before the start of classes.

UMass student involved in fatal prank

A University of Massachusetts student, charged with involuntary manslaughter, plead not guilty on Dec. 31, as he and three others stand trial after confessing their involvement in a fatal prank.

Easton police said on Dec. 22 that UMass student Shaun Connolly, of 16 Erick Rd., Mansfield, and four friends thought they were playing a practical prank on drivers when they pulled tires in the middle of a road in Easton as a nuisance to drivers. The joke, however, turned fatal.

Edwin Keach, a 21-year-old Northeastern University student, was killed returning from a party when he hit the tires, swerved and hit a tree.

The teens turned themselves into authorities two days after the accident and confessed to the crime, according to authorities.

"[The youths] pretty much said they were stupid in what they did," Easton Police Chief Thomas J. Kominsky told The Enterprise. "They said they tried to put the tires near a streetlight so drivers would see them and then have to get out of the car to move them. It was supposed to be a joke ... They are all deeply remorseful."

Police also told The Enterprise that the teens possess no prior record, although they all admit to pulling similar pranks in the past.

Connolly appeared in court with his lawyer Frank O'Boy, where he, according to the Easton Journal, stood in silence.

"My client is not one of the three who put the tires in the road," O'Boy said as he stood before Judge John Julian. "He was a distance away."

The District Attorney said a grand jury would probably hear the evidence by the end of January.

Police said they received at least five calls about tires in the road since October.

Connolly's specific involvement in the crime is unclear, and as of now, he is enrolled at UMass for the spring semester, according to UMass spokesperson Patrick Callahan.

WMUA acquires new radio transmitter

WMUA, 91.1 FM, a student-run radio station from the University of Massachusetts campus, has acquired and activated a new radio transmitter as of Jan. 1.

Service areas should not change, according to WMUA technicians, but some people outside the 20 to 30 mile broadcasting radius may lose their signal, whereas others who did not get the station before will receive it.

The new transmitter is located on the WesTower monopole near the Observatory on Observatory Way. It is 96 feet higher than the original transmitter, which broadcasted at 1000 watts of power. The station will now broadcast at 450 watts so as not to interfere with area radio stations.

Although it is 30 years past its life expectancy, the old transmitter is still usable and will remain in its original location as a back-up transmitter in case of service disruption. Disruptions can result from aircraft, electrical storms, or mechanical failure.

Next UMass president must focus on the past

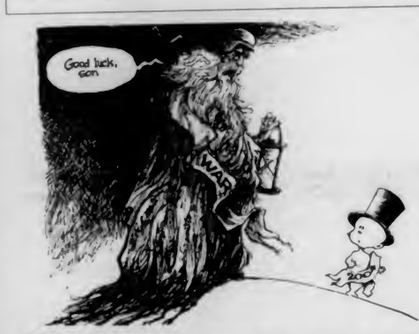
The 24-member presidential search committee in charge of selecting the next president of the University of Massachusetts has narrowed its field down to 12 candidates. One of these 12 will be the successor of William M. Bulger, who stepped down as president on Sept. 1 after serving at the position for seven and a half years.

It is clear that whomever replaces Bulger will have very large shoes to fill. While the dramatic allegations regarding his brother may have tainted Bulger's legacy at UMass, anyone who bothers to look closely enough will see that the 24th president of the University did many wondrous things during his time here. The difficult part for the presidential search committee now is not to find someone who will restore UMass to prominence and respectability following Bulger's departure. It is to find someone who can work around Bulger's "mishaps" and build directly off everything he did right.

One of the most gleaming qualities Bulger possessed was his ability to raise funds. Through his knowledge of state government, Bulger gave UMass resources for funding and research that greatly developed the University, despite immense budget shortcomings. Certainly his successor will have to work hard in this area as well.

The next UMass president will also have to avoid getting any significant heat from the political sphere. Republican Dan Burton of Indiana, as well as Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney and Attorney General Tom Reilly just to name a few all launched allegations against Bulger that contributed to the president's resignation. It would be wise for the future president to stay on the good side of as many high-ranking political officials as possible.

According to the presidential search committee Web site, the next UMass president must be "a person who is resilient in the face of adversity, who understands and accepts the plain fact that moving a university to a world-class status is a long arduous task that cannot be accomplished without conflicts and setbacks along the way." Certainly no president can be expected to have to deal with as much "adversity" as Bulger did, and while the next president may not have a brother on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted List they will not be able to escape the fact that they will be inheriting a university in turmoil.



While the search committee's Web site says the next president must be able to deal with setbacks "along the way," what they are really saying is that a president must be able to deal with the setbacks "of the past." This will be the real challenge to the next UMass president: moving out of William M. Bulger's shadow.

At the time of Bulger's resignation, Student Government Association President Dave Carr said, "(Bulger) set up the building blocks for us to take our next step. I don't think we can sit and ponder what we're losing, but instead we should really focus on the future."

It is true that looking toward the future is the best way to ensure progress and growth, but to simply ignore it is foolhardy. The surest way to ensure the future success of UMass is to make sure the next president is aware of what happened to Bulger, and conscious of the possibility of the same thing happening all over again.

After all, we all know why history repeats itself.

While you were on vacation

Matt Brochu

Welcome back, kids. Hope everyone had a stress-free, textbook-free, disease-free winter break. It's always refreshing to go back home and celebrate the holiday season for five-entirely-too-long weeks doing the same things with the same friends in the same furnished basements of the same houses we've always hung out in. It's a wonder we even bothered to come to school in the first place. Well, contrary to popular belief, current events have actually continued to occur during this winter break. Here's a brief rundown of what you may have missed.

Saddam Hussein was captured, or should I say rescued, from a hole smaller than the ones I used to dig at the beach when i was 11. Was it just me, or did anyone else feel the tiniest bit of sympathy for this guy while watching CNN that day?

Think about the "before and after" aspect of it all.

Before: President Hussein had 37 wives, two caring sons and 12 adoring look-a-likes. After: He has his beard checked for lice on national TV by a doctor who looks like he'd rather be using his left hand to artificially inseminate a cow.

Before: Saddam carried the prestigious title of "Human Being Most Likely to Go To Hell." After: He is now "The Most Eligible Booty in Baghdad County Correctional Facility." In the eyes of an inmate, taking Saddam's prison-virginity is almost as priceless as being the first to bag Iraq's version of the Olsen twins.

Before: Saddam's life was worth billions of dollars in ransom money. After: His life is worth three cartons of cigarettes and a nudie magazine (which in Iraq means pictures of women in jeans and T-shirts).

In sports news, the Sox didn't make the trade for A-Rod. The only silver lining I could find from this lack of a transaction was seeing the looks of disappointment on the faces of all the girls who wanted him because "he's cute." Well, in that case, we do need a fifth starting pitcher, so we might as well sign Jonathan Taylor Thomas to a deal and call it a day. For the time being, it looks like Nomar and Mia will be raising their extremely large-nosed child in Massachusetts, which definitely isn't a worst-case scenario.

Then there's the debate about Pete Rose's possible reinstatement to baseball. When it comes to this issue, if you're not a sports fan, then you don't care. If you're not interested in gambling, then you don't care. And if you're Pete Rose, you especially don't care. I mean, throughout the last few weeks he's been harder to like than Veronica from the "Real World/Road Rules Challenge." For both of them, it always has been and always will be about the money, and if it takes showering with the entire "Road Rules" team to get it, then so be it.

Speaking of the "Real World/Road Rules Challenge"... sitting down on your couch and flipping to MTV to learn that a marathon is on is like starting to read a really good Maxim article while you're taking care of business in the bathroom. You know that you have much better things to do than sit around there all day, but there's absolutely no way you're getting up until you've reached it's conclusion. it's almost as difficult to leave that couch as it is to say "Real World/Road Rules" three times fast. This isn't something i'm proud of.

Also, anyone who isn't a fan of Sarah on that show is absolutely heartless. At the start of each mission, she transforms into a helpless, handicapped fish named Nemo, but when her teammates throw her into the gauntlet she becomes Magnus ver Magnusson. There's no doubt in my mind that if my high school had a jumbotron, her face would be put up there during the girl's soccer pre-game warm-ups, with either "Eye of the Tiger" or "Girls Just Wanna Have Fun" playing in the background. She's really that inspirational.

Insert paragraph full of obvious, over-used "Britney Spears' wedding" and "Michael Jackson's molestation" jokes here. For example: "Billy Jean is not my lover, but little Billy Gene Quimby looks pretty damn good in his Osh Kosh B'gosh overalls today." I am above these kinds of comments. Moving on.

Surprise, surprise. The University is still in search of a new president. This is odd, considering that Mitt Romney has pretty much turned UMass into that strict, uptight couple who no one wants to baby-sit for because they expect you to supervise their two year old's ancient Japanese lessons while paying you in nothing but Friendly's sundae coupons. Not only that, but their children spend more time dodging pepper spray balls than they do studying. I do have some advice for the search committee. Under the job postings link on the UMass presidential Web site, it reads: "No jobs are available at this time." For some reason, it seems like you're just not trying hard enough.

In other news, the United States landed something on Mars. A flu epidemic swept the nation. My car spun out of control on Rt. 91, rolled twice into a ditch, and I almost died. Bush is doing something down in Mexico. And Yinka Dare died. But most importantly, and make sure you sit down when you read this ... we can finally buy alcohol on Sundays. Three-day weekends, snow days, and those awkward moments during communion when the entire church gets to witness your attempts to prevent the host from sticking to the roof of your mouth, will never be the same again.

Now, for real news written by real journalists, continue reading. (And if you actually said "Real World/Road Rules" three times fast, out loud, a few minutes ago, I feel really bad for you).

Living down a mistake

Dan Lamothe

It's something that could have happened to anyone you know and love.

Maybe it was you. Maybe it was your brother. Or maybe it was that girl with the high-pitched laugh in the back of your horrible gen-ed history lecture freshman year.

But make no bones about it — Shaun P. Connolly is in the middle of a living hell right now.

Connolly, a 19-year-old UMass student from Mansfield, got together with some buddies late one December night. Assumedly, they were bored and just trying to look for some mischievous fun.

It didn't work out so well.

Connolly and his pals — an assortment of teenagers all under the age of 18, according to The Easton Journal — are now being held responsible for something that no doubt is one of the scariest things any of them has ever dealt with: the death of another human being.

The five teenagers did something that many of us have done. Maybe it's when you drew the chalk outline on your driveway at seven years old to try and scare your lame aunt who you knew would be visiting. Maybe it's when you tripped your annoying little brother down the stairs in junior high. Or maybe it's when you tested out your new car to see how easily it could crack 100 miles per hour. Just about all of us are guilty of the same things that are now haunting Connolly and his underage friends every day: bad judgment and the yearning for a cheap thrill.

The difference, of course, is the rest of us got lucky.

Sometime during the evening of Dec. 21, Connolly and his friends decided it would be fun to block traffic by dragging a few old truck tires out from a farmer's field and into the road, something which, according to The Boston Globe, they had done seven times before with no accidents or incidents. However, this time things went horribly wrong. Little did they know that just hours later it would lead to the death of someone not much older than they were.

As an SUV hit one of the tires in the road, careening into a tree and exploding into flames, a whole series of lives were changed forever.

Edwin Keach, a 21-year-old Northeastern University student driving the SUV, died on the scene. Not long after, the five involved turned themselves in, horrified after reading a story about the accident on the Internet.

Just about all of us are guilty of the same things that are now haunting Connolly and his underage friends every day: bad judgment and the yearning for a cheap thrill.

Now four of the five face charges of involuntarily manslaughter — as well as the shame and guilt that has to be associated with being involved with something that had such dire consequences.

What the five did was stupid and reckless, and it directly led to the death of a bright and talented young man. Friends described Keach, an economics major, as being curious, the center of attention and the one who could always put things in perspective, according to The Brockton Enterprise. Anytime someone like that is lost, it's a tragedy.

Connolly and his friends, however, face the possibility of another tragedy now — jail time following a stupid, mischievous mistake. Involuntary manslaughter, if convicted, carries a sentence of anywhere from probation to 20 years in prison, according to WCVB-TV Channel 5 in Boston.

Despite their loss, their grief, and the way their lives have been changed forever, the Keach family has remained remarkably stoic and honorable. Edwin's father John told The Mansfield Daily News that the family has no desire for vengeance, and said it is unfortunate the decision to charge or punish them is in the hands of others — especially after "they at least showed a conscience" by coming forward.

"They are going to have to carry this burden for the rest of their lives as we are, of course," he said.

That, more than any sentence any judge or jury could hand down, is punishment enough. It carries a far greater weight than any punishment a prosecution could ever argue for.

UMass spokesman Daniel Fitzgibbons said it is not yet known whether or not Connolly will withdraw for the semester, but one thing is for certain: He shouldn't have to. People will say Connolly does not deserve our sympathy, or deserve our respect, and that's no fairer than Edwin Keach being ripped away from life at 21.

Regardless of what people think of Connolly's blunder, one thing the UMass community does still owe him is its acceptance. Shaun P. Connolly could have been anyone of us, and right now he's living with a bigger weight on his shoulders than any one of us would want to endure.

Edwin Keach cannot be brought back from the dead, and with that there will forever be tied a weight of sadness. But Shaun P. Connolly deserves another chance to live. If nothing else, we all owe him that right.

Catching the bouquet

Thomas Naughton

For those who hold much weight in the sanctity of marriage as a "sacrament" between a man and a woman, I have two words: Britney Spears. Well, actually, I have two more words: 55 hours.

If picturing the image that pops into my head when considering how seriously I think people take marriage in the United State, there she is: Britney Spears. Fifty-five hours in Las Vegas and a quick annulment later, this pop tart went back to trying to salvage her fame by kissing a girl on stage.

I bet my good friend Bruce would have gladly been married to his long-time boyfriend Andy, even for 55 hours. At least for two days and 420 minutes, they would have been able to have their relationship recognizable by law.

Perhaps that's exactly what the U.S. government needs to do to test their tootsies in the waters of equality. Perhaps they can grant us second-class homos a "trial marriage," as long as Spears' was. If in that 55-hour period the said second-class homo couple does not show signs of "furthering the evil gay agenda," they may continue as a wedded couple. (They would still be second-class though; don't worry Republicans. You can come to the weddings and shout obscenities and all that. Feel free to grab a piece of cake on your way out.)

I am very happy that George W. Bush has diverted our attention from war (now that the "Evil Doers" have been captured) to the ever-important space mission to Mars. People are starving. Jobs are being vaporized as though shot by a ray gun (or Reagan!). Martha Stewart, queen of our homes, will soon be decorating a jail cell. But the mission to Mars, I must say, in Massachusetts-ian speak, is WICKED important.

If the American Family Association, the aforementioned president and the Massachusetts Family Institute have anything to do with the Bay State legislature's decision concerning an amendment banning same sex marriages (Feb. 11, 2004), the gay men and lesbians of Massachusetts — of the United States entirely — may have to look for a new home to find equality. Perhaps if there are Martians hiding in some un-touched hovel on the crimson sphere near by, they will embrace our gay brethren.

I sat next to a kid in high school that shouted during a discussion about tolerance that gays and lesbians "should move to an island all by themselves, or maybe to another planet." I think that kid is in jail now, which is funny, but can you imagine the cat fights on that island/planet? Prada-Fags fighting over the last pastel Louis Vitton, Angry Lesbos rolling dice for new hiking boots, Muscle Hunks sucking the Creatine from under each other's fingernails, Power Dykes having a "Best Screen Saver/Wallpaper on Your iMac" contest. It would not be pretty.

All joking aside, i can remember a story about people who wanted equality, who were repressed, who traveled across the ocean to find freedom from a religion and a King who would not give them the freedom that God (or whoever) gave them at birth. They started this country and grappled for equality in our state a couple hundred years ago.

Much has changed, but the arena remains the same. The Colorado based right-wing fringe group Focus on Family said it best, "the eyes of the nation and world will be fixed on the Bay State." Our state government is fighting over an amendment to our state constitution that will ban same sex marriages. On Jan. 7, about 200 angry people with "real family values" rallied to push such an amendment forward in the midst of the Feb. 11 constitutional convention. Three days after Christmas, Pope John Paul II urged Catholics in St. Peter's square in the Vatican to oppose same-sex marriages. He believes that a "misunderstood sense of rights" led us to this impasse. Merry Christmas, to you too.

So what is the big deal? Conservatives seem to be talking out of both sides of their mouths. They balk at the idea of gay civil rights, for they believe that no group should get "special rights," yet they would create an entire institution outside of the "sanctity" of marriage, just for "filthy" homos? Don't we grant a special designation for gay people when we create the civil union? Aren't "special designations" and "special programs" the alleged downfall in the eyes of the conservative nation? What exactly would happen if a legal union between one man and another man, or one woman and another woman was called "marriage?" Would the world explode? Would that sad music when Mario dies in "Super Mario Bros." suddenly boom throughout the cities and towns of America? Would the sight of a man and another man having their wedding kiss cause hordes of children to throw back their Lincoln Logs and declare, "Mommy, Daddy, Me fink I'm a wittle homo?" I doubt it.

Conservatives talk about gay men and their "perpetual adolescence," wherein gay men go out every single night to bars, sleep around constantly and consume a barrage of drugs and alcohol. Much of this "perpetual adolescence" holds true for some gay men. Why do they act that way? What separates them from heterosexual men? Mainstream approval and validation.

Straight people are not told that they will be damned to hell for their heterosexual lifestyle. If you were being damned to an afterlife of suffering, wouldn't you want to make your life worth it? If you're going to hell, where the murderers and bad people are for just living and breathing, what is a little sleeping around or snorting coke going to hurt? If everyone was saying you were an irresponsible, drugging whore, how herd would you work to prove them wrong and would they even acknowledge it? These are the messages repeatedly sent to gays and lesbians by the continual impression of our right to have our relationships validated in the eyes of the law.

People of the church who are against gay marriage say it was set down in the Bible that marriage is sacred, between a man and a woman only. According to those same people, we gays and lesbians have already been damned to hell. Most gays I have talked to concerning marriage designate that "this isn't about God, this is about the law."

I am inclined to agree. Yes, the ceremonies of people getting married are often held in churches, but how many of those brides and grooms are "darkening the door" of the church weekly? We're not looking for a church's approval or for a nod from a deity; we are looking for acceptance by our government that our relationships are valid and important in society.

The bottom line is that this issue of marriage is representative of a larger victory that needs to occur for gay people. If the U.S. government accepts our relationships, there is no question, no debate: We exist.

We are the same as everyone else. We are "not separate but equal." We are not a group of confused people or biological errors. We are just human beings who love other human beings, and what is unbeautiful about such a prospect?

What does the future hold for Saddam?

More changes needed in Iraq

Yousef Munayyer

When I first heard the news about Saddam Hussein's capture, I reacted, "Quick! Check his pockets for weapons of mass destruction!" However, after the past several weeks, many more questions have risen.

The president of Iraq is now in the hands of the United States. So what is to be done with him? Some say he should be turned over to the Iraqi people. Some say he should be tried by an international war crimes tribunal. Some say the United States should deal with him. Some have even suggested torture.

I was watching Fox News a few days after his capture (which I watch for the same reason I watch Comedy Central; no offense to Comedy Central but Fox News is just funnier). During one program two pundits openly said that though the U.S. government has policies against torture, they should make an exception for Saddam since he is a big catch. Sounds like a paradox to me. Since Hussein is such a big catch, isn't it even more important that he is treated humanely? We should not sacrifice set values on anyone — no matter how big the catch is.

Then again, why would we torture a man like Saddam? Is there anything he can still tell us? The United States is occupying Iraq. Hussein is history. He will likely answer questions about weapons of mass destruction the same as before the war, since all evidence has shown he was likely telling the truth. In fact, it may be in the U.S. government's favor if he doesn't answer any questions at all. Surely a man like Saddam knows many secrets the United States doesn't need to have exposed. (For example: where, when, and how often he was supplied with those lovely weapons.)

Recently, Saddam was declared a prisoner of war. This is a term with a legal connotation. There are rules regarding how POWs are supposed to be treated, and when and how they are supposed to be returned. Yet a term like this belongs in an arena of international law and just war theory: ideas that have been disregarded from the beginning of this conflict.

The United Nations has been reduced to nothing more than its acronym. There exist no institutions with jurisdiction over Iraq with a legal right to try Saddam Hussein for anything. The idea of rights and law has never been a part of this war. The war has all along been carried out by a coalition of those "willing to break the rules." This is why trying to restore international law now will become so difficult. The only jurisdiction that exists in Iraq, the only law with any power of execution, is the law of the gun. This, in short, has been the essence of the Bush Doctrine. We got the guns, and we will use them. Get out of the way or get shot.

So what should happen to Saddam? He has rights like any other human being, regardless to what crimes he may have committed. The U.S. government cannot infringe upon those rights unless it wishes to go against what the United States supposedly stands for. If Saddam is to be tried, he should be tried in Iraq by Iraqis, once a legal system is established there. He should have the right to defend himself and the right to a fair trial. Chances are he will never get a fair trial in Iraq. Still, there are no other people that have the right to try him.

It is unlikely that any of this will become clear soon. Before Saddam can be tried in Iraq, there has to be an independent Iraqi legal system. This cannot exist under U.S. occupation, and that doesn't seem to be ending any time soon. It's quite possible, considering his age, that Saddam may never see trial. This may actually be something the hawks in Washington are hoping for. Putting Saddam on the stand in front of international media has the potential to become the most embarrassing moment in U.S. history.

The focus now should shift away from Saddam Hussein. His capture has not made a difference in the level of resistance facing the United States. Many Iraqis have died, Americans die daily, and people here in the United States never wanted this war. This venture, which former Secretary of the Treasury Paul O'Neil has indicated was planned from before 9-11, has destroyed our ties with our allies, disrupted international order and law, had nothing to do with terrorism, and has yet to find those pesky weapons of mass destruction.

After all of this destruction only one thing is certain: Now that Saddam has left Iraq, the United States must follow immediately.

Yousef Munayyer is a Collegian columnist.

Sentencing the 'Beast of Baghdad'

Jeff Napolitano

Saddam Hussein, the infamous "Beast of Baghdad," has been caught.

Now we are faced with the matter of what to do with him. A trial will likely follow, since his guilt is undeniable, so why not simply put him in jail and throw away the key? Furthermore, given the atrocities he has committed, why not immediately execute him? To thoroughly answer these questions, we must pose another: Do we want to pretend that Hussein carried out all of his crimes single-handedly, or do we want real accountability? Do we want to ignore Hussein's accomplices and enablers, or do we want to bring to justice every single person or group which aided 25 years of murder and torture?

if we desire the latter — prosecuting Hussein's accomplices in his crimes — we would have a bit of a problem. The problem would be the gaps to be filled for the positions of U.S. vice president, secretary of state and secretary of defense (and quite likely a few more), because Dick Cheney, Donald Rumsfeld, and Colin Powell would be sitting in a jail cell somewhere in Iraq, along with former presidents: Bill Clinton, George Bush and Ronald Reagan. Quite a few CEOs, and possibly the board members of their companies, would also be thrown in the clink. All have strongly supported, to varying degrees, Hussein's atrocities within his own country) for possession of the very same weapons they gave him. if Rumsfeld had any sense of shame, he would fall upon his knees and beg the Kurds and Shi'ites of Iraq for forgiveness, not to mention the people of Iran.

Regardless of who is put on trial, the people of Iran, Kuwait and especially Iraq deserve a reckoning for the brutality of the last 25 years. But a trial is not likely to take place in the World Court, the appropriate place to try war criminals, because the U.S. government has so flagrantly rejected international law, specifically the World Court ruling against its illegal war against Nicaragua in the 1980s. And were Hussein given up to the World Court to be prosecuted, away from U.S. influence, it is likely that details of U.S. complicity in Hussein's crimes would further be exposed.

What seems to be more likely is a guilty verdict in an Iraqi court, one either closed to the public, followed by Hussein's execution, or an open court that sentences him to life in prison. Because his guilt is stupendously obvious, Hussein will surely be found guilty. The only question is whether he will be prevented from humiliating his U.S. accomplices by a closed court, or whether the current U.S. administration will commute a death sentence in exchange for his silence.

In his defense, Hussein could frankly offer, "I may have killed a few hundred thousand Iraqis, but sanctions against Iraq have killed up to 1.5 million. If I am a mass murderer, what does that make the Western countries which supported sanctions against the Iraqi people?"

Any fair trial will certainly result in Hussein's execution or lifelong imprisonment. But if the people of Iraq are to get proper reconciliation for the savaging of their society for the past 25 years, if any sort of redress is to be made for the death and suffering of decades, a trial not will have to be cast for more than just one old man

EDITORS' NOTE

Dear Readers,

The demand for online news coverage has boomed over the past several years, and media organizations across the nation have developed their Web sites to follow suit.

In the late 1990s, The Massachusetts Daily Collegian pushed to sport an online version of its coverage. The original site was launched as part of the UMass.edu hosting system, back when The Collegian was still a Registered Student Organization. With its shift to a University of Massachusetts Agency soon after, The Collegian sought to obtain its own site name and host. By May 2001, it had done both, securing the name www.dailycollegian.com and Web hosting with the college media network Digital Partners. Still, the site lacked some of the basic fineries expected of online media and often showcased poorly organized, visually unattractive material. Clearly, something needed to be done.

On Jan. 25, The Collegian launched its overhauled version of www.dailycollegian.com with help from Web engineers at the local Refresh Labs/Unborn Media. Story categories have been reshaped to maximize efficiency, while new art aesthetics should aid in conveying the same quality of packaging in the best of The Collegian's printed issues.

We hope you will check out our latest venture and find it useful in offering our continued service.

Who's afraid of the big bad flu?

Adrienne Bossi

Ah-choo! Oh, excuse me. It must be the flu! Oh my God! I better run to the hospital and become one of the many faces in the sea of blue masks dotting emergency rooms throughout New England.

Ah-choo! Oh no! Another sneeze! That's it! An eight-hour wait is nothing in comparison to the imminent doom I will face if I don't do as the news anchors say and go to the ER at the "first sign of sickness." I, like many others, will bear the wait for the doctor to ease my concerns and say tell me to home and rest, for it's only a common cold, the sniffles, a bug.

Many people fell ill this winter, although not all of them had the flu. News programs have gotten people scared by directing a lot of focus on the handful of flu cases this winter that have resulted in death. These cases are certainly in the minority. Yet, fear is enough to motivate a stampede of people to flood into ERs all across the region.

This winter has been a roller coaster of temperature changes. December kicked off with a nor'easter that dumped two feet of snow on Boston. That was followed by a 50 degree Christmas.

Then came the record-breaking arctic blast. it is no wonder so many people have fallen ill!

However, what really egged on this year's epidemic was the mutation the virus has undergone. The flu keeps getting stronger because too many people are misusing antibiotics.

This year's strain is somewhat resistant to prescription medication. The people who think they are healthy before finishing their antibiotic prescription are the ones to blame. The left over pills in the bottle are essential. Exposing the flu to a partial dose of antibiotics does not fully rid the virus of our systems. This allows its resistance to medication to strengthen. The virus then mutates into the "Super Flu" that's plaguing waiting rooms of many hospitals this winter.

Over this winter break I returned to my summer position in registration at Caritas Good Samaritan Medical Center in Brockton. My job requires me to enter ER patients' demographic and medical information into the computer system. Among the information i must retrieve is the reason for each patients' visit. Many people were coming in with fevers, chills, body aches, headaches, congestion and vomiting. These symptoms were eventually referred to by the abbreviation SOD: soup of the day.

News programs have gotten people scared by directing a lot of focus on the handful of flu cases this winter that have resulted in death ... This fear is enough to motivate a stampede of people to flood into emergency rooms all across the region.

To my knowledge, this is the first time Good Samaritan ever put up flu alert signs and designated certain areas of the waiting room for flu and non-flu patients. There are hand sanitizer bottles everywhere, and we have gone through box after box of blue surgical masks.

Most of the time, the staff and patients cooperated.

"Most of the patients didn't get mad," said ER triage nurse Maureen McGann. "They understood what was going on and patiently waited six to eight hours for their turn."

The staff worked extra hard during this period, which was hectic, to say the least.

"It was gross," said Diane Rosselli, patient registration manager. "It was awful. The staff worked so hard. [There was] one patient after another after another. I don't know how they did it."

There were times when every seat in the waiting room was taken. Patients would be aimlessly standing in the hallways and around the offices. Extra beds would be delivered to the waiting room for the extremely ill patients to use while they waited for a spot in the ER. All the rooms in the ER would be taken for hours. Curtains were set up in the department's halls to create mock "rooms." Nothing could stop the flu. In fact, Christmas and all the other winter holidays were just as busy as any other day.

There is no cure for the flu. So, like we've always heard, the best medicine is lots of rest and fluids. (Note: UMass students should not twist my words to believe it is best to drink away the flu, and all their other troubles, with fluids such as Budweiser long necks or White Russians.) The best prescription is a few movie rentals along with some of grandma's famous homemade chicken soup.

A 'positive' step for Catholics?

Elizabeth Carter

Sad but true, as of Jan. 9: Newly instated Archbishop Sean O'Malley of the Boston Archdiocese sent out a letter to local Roman Catholics announcing that by March 8, up to 80 local parishes will be shut down. Amid the plethora of reasons for these closings, the Archbishops cited declining numbers at mass, shortages of priests, the poor state of many buildings, and the one we've all been waiting for: "financial difficulties faced by many parishes: exacerbated no doubt by the sexual abuse scandal," so said the archbishop.

Although not devoutly religious, i do feel genuinely sorry for those who are, those whom the cutting back of the churches will really affect. While trying to gently break the news to his parishioners that up to 80 churches will be closed, Archbishop O'Malley tried to offer some hope by giving what he calls the "reconfiguration" of the church a positive slant. He gently urged that it is a positive process for the church that can bring the Catholic community together. While I'm sure the archbishop's meaning and sincerity ring true, the recent sex scandals within the church seem to have torn apart the already disintegrating fibers which formerly composed the tight-knit religious community.

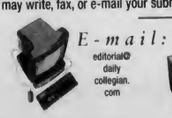
In light of such egregious betrayals, the real question that should abound in the mind of every Catholic is, "Do we really want to be part of this community any longer?" in my mind, there truly can be no forgiveness toward the church superiors who knowingly protected so many pedophile priests.

The question on the table now for Catholics is just how far is your forgiveness willing to go, for it seems Catholics have been forced to do an awful lot of forgiving toward their church over the years. Although the Catholic Church may piously claim to be the sole conduit through which God's love and mercy flow, I somehow doubt that my God-fearing Baptist relatives are going to hell.

So then maybe the greater message being sent by these church closings is that it's time to move on up (and I don't mean to the east side) and move on out to another church altogether. For when you can no longer trust those who are supposed to deliver God's word, maybe it's time to contemplate looking for another place to receive it.

To quote the archbishop: "The future of our church's ministry in the Archdiocese depends on God's grace and our willingness to make sacrifices necessary for reconfiguration." Taking the archbishop's words into careful consideration and looking at the state of the Catholic Church as a whole one could interpret the message as implying: Upon the horizon of this new year and new millennia, God's eternal grace for the Catholic Church seems to have taken a turn toward the finite. To be quite honest, I don't understand why the church believes it has the right to call upon anymore of its members to make sacrifices. Haven't the sacrifices of so many children's innocence already been enough?

From a church that keeps on taking awards, those who belong to the Catholic faith should re-analyze their beliefs and ask themselves the most important question of all: "Do I really need the Catholic church to love God?" Depending on individuals, the answers will undoubtedly vary. Yet I'm not suggesting anyone entirely give up religion. Rather, I'm simply suggesting that those who are beginning to feel the slight sting of betrayal on behalf of their church should possibly reevaluate the necessity of adhering to such a large hierarchy.



For while the good archbishop can pretend the reconfiguration process is a positive change, we all can see through the hope-filled blinders that have been put in place. In reality, the Catholic Church especially in the Boston area, is in a steady decline largely because the sins of so many of its clergy have finally been repaid unto mother church. They're measuring in somewhere in the ballpark of $45 million.

While it's sad that the innocent clergy must suffer, rather than focus on pity, possibly we could look at the reconfiguration in a light which indicates a slowly coming end for an establishment that has on many levels lost its principles and succumb to its own lust for power.

Physical Plant 'blitzes' classroom renovations

By JULIE O'DONNELL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

While students enjoyed their breaks or crammed in a few classes over winter session, the University of Massachusetts Physical Plant worked tirelessly behind the scenes to refurbish classrooms in a project dubbed the Classroom Blitz.

"Classrooms get plastered, painted, new lamps, shades, floor tiles, ceilings and projection screens," said Kevin J. Ryan of Physical Plant. "All of the work is cosmetic. We can't get into structure because of building codes and funding."

Ryan, a contract administrator estimator of the plant, has been working nights, weekends and even holidays to ensure that the Classroom Blitz project gets finished.

In total, a team of hired contractors has worked on 25 classrooms, four auditoriums and over 6,000 square feet of common space in campus buildings.

Contract administrator foreman Steven F. Barrett, who oversaw the project, said his team began work the day after students left for break. He said last week he hoped to finish the work by Jan. 26, five weeks after starting the project.

"It's a very limited time frame ... there is no room for error," Barrett said. "Knocking on wood, everything has gone as planned this year."

Ryan and Barrett visit the renovation sites daily to check on the progress and development of the academic areas.

"The most extensive work was done in Morrill and Goessman," Barrett said. "Goessman is one of the oldest buildings here, and parts of it have never been worked on."

The blitz has been organized around a limited budget, awarded yearly by Chancellor John V. Lombardi. This year's budget totals $450,000.

"We squeeze every dollar to go further — more bang for your buck," Barrett said.

Barrette and Ryan both agreed that a lot more classrooms need updating, but there is not enough money to take on any more than what they have.

While working with Lombardi, the Physical Plant's Classroom Blitz committee hopes to one day utilize funding from alumni so that more classrooms can benefit from the project each year.

Both Barrett and Ryan credit the contractors and custodial workers for the speed and success of the blitz.

"The custodial staff is working their usual maintenance plus overtime at the construction sites," Barrett said. "And the contractors are working day and night for us to get the job done."

"We cover 1,450 acres of campus, that includes 351 buildings, so we keep very busy," Barrett said. "We're thankful to everyone working so hard."

Last year, there was a great response to the Classroom Blitz. In 2003, the most extensive work was done to the School of Management, the engineering lab and French Hall.

"It's nice because 90 percent of what the Physical Plant does is not visible," Barrett said. "It's nice we can gain some high visibility. We do the best we can with limited resources."

According to Ryan and Barrett, the renovated classrooms are always popular among professors requesting specific classrooms for their lectures.

"Professors put in requests for certain classrooms, and they always request the classrooms that are being blitzed," Ryan said.

In the 2003 blitz, a truck with some last-minute supplies and furniture was held up because of a snowstorm and arrived just a few hours before deadline.

"The truck came in at 5 p.m., and we worked right through the night to have everything finished by the next morning," Ryan said.

"All you pray for is that it comes out right and on time," Ryan said. "Depending on the trucks," he joked.

Resident assistants organize union contracts

By JULIE O'DONNELL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

University of Massachusetts resident assistants return to campus as part of a new union, which has organized as the first ever in the country.

United Auto Workers, Local 2322 director, James Shaw, has been assisting RAs in forming a union for nearly three years.

In February 2001, RAs came to Shaw to begin a bargaining table with the University to reach new agreements and be able to form a union. Shaw also represents UMass graduate research assistants and graduate teaching assistants through the Graduate Employee Organization.

The contract, which was ratified last December, had been compromised with the University after it was heavily disputed.

"In the spring of 2001, the University fiercely opposed the idea of forming a union," Shaw said. "By the summer of 2002, the University agreed to come to the bargaining table."

Shaw mentioned that when the University was in opposition, it would use various threats against RAs if they were to keep fighting for the contract.

"This is a historic ending to a campaign that was truly historic," Shaw said.

The contract includes major issues such as grievance and arbitration rules, parking privileges and pay increases.

"We feel that we didn't get the strongest protection [for grievance and arbitration]. It will be our priority to address that in the next two to three rounds of bargaining."

Under the new contract, RAs now have the right to be represented by a union representative. If the RA union and University disagree about an outcome, the RA union has a right to arbitration or as Shaw likes to call it, "union court." In union court, an impartial representative will review the case with the help of witnesses and testimony to verify that the university is following all rules under the contract.

"The University is not allowed to do what they want," Shaw said. "They are bound under contract."

An example of the grievance procedure would be if the University decided to assign a roommate to an RA, who is under contract not to have a roommate. In this case the University would be found to have violated its part of the contract. If the University still decided not to comply, then the matter would be taken to arbitration.

RAs also have negotiated concerning parking privileges. In the past, parking permits were issued as a first come first serve, now all RAs are put to the top of a list, which will not only ensure a permit, but also give RAs better parking.

As an example, an RA in Southwest Residential Area, will most likely be issued a parking permit for the Purple Lot, rather than the Yellow Lot.

Finally, the last major issue that was at stake and bargained with concerned pay increased for RAs.

Before the contract, RAs were paid $50.29 per week, now they will receive $61.76 per week.

The University had initially argued that due to the budget cuts, a raise could not be funded. However, according to Shaw, housing is not funded by the state, but by student fees.

"If you have $5,000 from each student for fees, and then multiply that number by 11,000, that's a lot of money," Shaw said. "A very small portion of that was given to RAs."

Shaw's committee worked closely with RAs to understand what was most important. As for the legal issues and contract language, that was Shaw's job.

"We all did extensive research on funding," he said. "I think it was an honest compromise."

The contract will extend through spring semester 2005, and then the committee and RAs will have to bargain again. As for now, the committee and the RAs will be putting together a meeting to discuss contract issues and possibly even designate leadership roles.

"They [RAs] need to know what changes they need to make," Shaw said. "There are 23 clusters at the University. Maybe they will designate a representative from each cluster."

Shaw is very pleased about the forming of the union; he and his committee represent 16 other local organizations including various fund raising committees, teachers, childcare facilitators and various residential organizations.

"There are various stereotypes associated with unions," Shaw mentioned. "Most people think of them as car mechanics and plumbers, this puts a new face on unions — they are way more dynamic."

Shaw said that only one RA voted against the forming of a union. He was unclear whether it was an issue that he didn't know about, or simply a vote in opposition.

The next goal for Shaw and his committee is to reach out to undergraduate workers to form a union. Currently, he is working with graduate student tutors to include them in a union.

"Unions can work with anyone," he said. "They are a mechanism to make positive change, and a successful message to all white collar workers."

Massachusetts abandons Sunday liquor law; Amherst reacts

By ANDREA DICKEY
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

As students moved back to the Pioneer Valley on Sunday, they may have noticed that area liquor stores were open for business. The Blue Law that prohibited liquor sales on Sundays has been overturned by the state legislature, allowing stores to open for Sunday business.

Students will no longer have to make the trip to Montague or other towns within the 10-mile radius of the Vermont border to buy liquor on Sundays. Liquor stores in Amherst, Hadley and Northampton are now at liberty to open from noon until 11 p.m.

The Blue Law was abandoned after business owners argued that it was unfair to restrict liquor stores when other retailers were allowed to operate on Sundays.

In 1990, the Massachusetts Legislature relaxed alcohol rules to allow Sunday sales between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day and in cities and towns within 10 miles of New Hampshire and Vermont. The two states permit Sunday sales, and can legally reduce alcohol to a sale price, which targets Massachusetts consumers.

"I think it's positive, as a business owner," said Andrew Morrison, the owner of the Liquors 44 chain, locally in the Campus Plaza in Hadley. "On a personal note, I don't like it. It was my only day off."

Morrison thinks it will be good to be open on Sundays, especially around holidays and graduation. He also recognizes the benefit of being located next to Stop and Shop, where Sundays are the second busiest shopping day of the week.

"We had a very good Sunday," Morrison said. "Our Northampton store did double the business [compared to last Sunday]." He also said that he didn't lose any business on the previous Saturday or the following Monday this past week.

Not all owners share Morrison's view.

"This past Sunday was the first one we were open. It would have been just as well to stay closed," said Bill Russell, owner of Russell's Package Store of 18 Main St., Amherst. He said that patrons came in "dribbles and drabs."

He also mentioned that there will be pressure to be open to compete with other liquor stores, even if sales aren't high.

"It's going to have to be conditioned over time. Sunday business is going to take a little business away from Friday and Saturday," said Russell. "Everybody's only got so much money."

Russell right now is concerned with minimizing the loss. Stores have to pay time and a half to their Sunday employees, as well as consider the overhead expenses of being open for business. "It's like starting a business all over," he said.

Russell doesn't anticipate much extra business because in his experience, most people don't buy alcohol on Sundays.

"Sunday isn't really a party day," he said. "Students have to get their studying done at some time."

Alcohol and underage drinking continue to be controversial issues on the UMass campus with the escalating Southwest riots, "Hobart Hoedown" and "Spring Week." This past year, per recommendation of the Chancellor's Task Force on the Prevention of Alcohol Abuse, Greek residences are no longer campus-approved housing for freshmen.

Diane Fedorchak, a health educator at University Health Services is concerned that alcohol related incidents might now increase on Sundays.

"When you increase access, you're going to increase the use," she said.

Although it's too early to know, Fedorchak said it will be intriguing to see how Sunday alcohol sales play out.

"It will also be interesting to see if there is a lack of productivity on Mondays," she said.

The administration doesn't seem to be concerned with the increase in liquor availability, however.

"I really don't think it will have a negative impact on student life. If anything, it might have a positive impact," said Michael Gargano, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs. "Now, when [students] know it's available, [students] are less likely to have an urgency to need it."

Senior Cara Parchesco agreed.

"I don't think it will make any difference at all. If people are going to drink, they will find a way," she said. "Now they just don't have to buy as much on Saturday."

"If liquor stores are closed for some religious reason, I don't think that is right," Parchesco said.

The Blue Laws are, in fact, are based in religion. They date back to colonial times and were enacted to prohibit activity, mainly drinking, traveling and working on the holy Sabbath day, which was Sunday. Massachusetts overturned most of the Blue Laws 30 years ago.

Barenaked Ladies, Toby Keith and Neil Young slated to play Mullins in 2004

By MEGHAN HEALY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After several disappointing turn outs, the Mullins Center is hoping to draw larger crowds this semester by hosting some high-profile artists. Event planners at the University of Massachusetts are looking to current country music king Toby Keith, Canadian pop-rockers Barenaked Ladies and the legendary Neil Young & Crazy Horse to help pull Mullins out of its current concert slump.

"In the last three or four years, some of the shows we've had haven't been as successful as we had hoped," said Nancy Beauchamps, executive director of the Mullins Center.

Although performers like John Mayer, who appeared at the Mullins Center in Nov. 2002 and Dave Matthews, who appeared in May, have managed high-ticket sales, many other acts have failed to bring in the revenue Mullins staffers had hoped for. Still, Beauchamps remains confident that the Mullins Center is the ideal location for events.

Abstract art finds an abode at Gallery A³

Taiga Ermansons and Peter Gregorio share the walls of Gallery A³ this month, as two of Pioneer Valley's own artists put their artwork on display. Although these artists share very little stylistically, the juxtaposition of Gregorio's oil paintings and Ermansons' 'line' art balances the atmosphere a bit, bringing a certain harmony to the gallery.

"As an artist, I am continuing the quest of the perception of nature and communicating the understanding through art," said Gregorio. "Art is a catalyst that creates more than what is just seen through the senses. It expresses an intangible space that the viewer can experience internally."

The unframed pieces reach from ceiling to floor. The painting, done on cloth and with mostly muted colors, depict the human figures — haunting black forms that remain with the viewer long after he or she looks away. The pieces find a sense of strength in their ability to convey depth. The images, though they lack concrete, realistic detail, have soft colors that are reminiscent of little streets that you could just step into and walk into some world of shadow people.

The mellow colors are offset not only by the black forms but also a vibrant shade hidden within, perhaps hinting at a prize hidden within the banal.

The fantasy novel fit for a King

Author of horror adds fifth installment of epic series

'Wolves of the Calla'
By Stephen King
Donald M. Grant Publisher, inc.

By Cameron J. Woods
Collegian Staff

For over two decades we have known Stephen King as the master of horror, both in print and on the big screen. What many King fans have failed to take note of is the wealth of fantasy novels King has produced. The culmination of King's fantasy literature has taken form in his "The Dark Tower" series.

This series of seven novels began in the foundling stages of King's career as a writer and since then has gained a cult following. In every piece of his work, King manipulates the known world to affect the reader. In the "The Dark Tower" series however, he creates worlds in which the reader must abide by his rules.

In Nov. 2003 the fifth addition to this series was released — a hulking novel entitled "The Wolves of the Calla." This novel, in hardcover form, is an ominous looking book, but for those who have read the first four installments, the girth of this read is barely enough to satisfy the need for the world that King has crafted. For those who have not read any of the previous chapters of this ongoing tale reading, "Wolves of the Calla" may be somewhat enjoyable, but will not yield half as much enlightenment as it will for those who have read all the subsequent installments.

This novel picks up the tale of a man named Roland Deschain and his friends who are the last of a profession known as gunslingers — imagine John Wayne mixed with King Arthur and a splash of McGyver thrown in. In Roland's world everything is winding down and he is on a quest to reach The Dark Tower, which is the nexus of every realm, every when, or point in time, and more, before it collapses.

Roland is the only member of his group from the world the story takes place in; the others come from different points in the twentieth century of our world and they are all from New York. There is Eddie Dean, a heroin addict with a good heart from the late eighties who would have died if Roland had not pulled him out of our world. Then there is Susannah Dean, a black woman from the sixties who is missing her legs from the knees down as the result of being pushed in front of a train. She suffered from multiple personalities which manifested as Odetta Holmes and Detta Walker the latter being as vicious and spitefully evil as the former was naive and sweet. The merging of these two formed the character of Susannah who is the best of the both, or the worst if you are on the wrong end of her gun.

Finally there is Jake Chambers, a boy who came from the mid-nineties, who by dying a couple of times and through some dimensional finagling has managed to visit Roland's world twice. He is the surrogate son of Roland, who through the trials he faces in this installment, proves to be as skilled and as deadly a gunslinger as the rest of the party.

Along with all of the physical properties of his world decaying the temporal ones are beginning to slip as well. The gunslingers are aware of this dying of time as they notice that some days end before they should have been half over and others stretch on for what should have been several days.

In the beginning of this book Roland and his friends find themselves on the other side of a mountain range after having passed through a "thinny" — a spot where two or more realities are rubbing together creating a thin point where one could easily step from one world into another. In this case the wanderers left Roland's world for a time and found themselves in the aftermath world of one of King's most renowned books, "The Stand."

After a brief, but important encounter with the wizard Flagg, who is a villain in many of King's novels under an array of aliases, the travelers return to the Gunslinger's world.

Though it is, as the characters say, passed on Roland's world still contains some functioning pieces of technology, some of which are comparable to our own like the remnants of skyscrapers and computers and others far surpass what we are currently capable of, as in an artificially intelligent and insane samurai or an android that has enough cunning to harbor hidden agendas.

While following the path of "The Beam" — one of the mystical strands that runs to the Dark Tower — the travelers encounter a group

Women from all walks of life share their day

'This Day' offers a collection of diary entries from 35 women

By Becky Horowitz
Collegian Staff

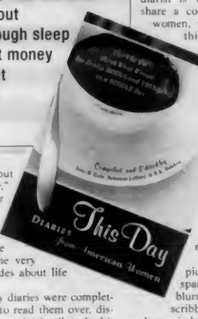
Regardless of how bad we think our day is or how many times we feel like the world should just stop because we need it to, every day there are millions of women out there not only surviving, but also overcoming.

"This Day: Diaries from American Women," compiled and edited by Joni B. Cole, Rebecca Joffrey and B.K. Rakhra, brilliantly illustrates the unbelievable strength and perseverance of women. In reading this book you can't help but wonder how some of these women make it through to tomorrow. Seemingly uninteresting, average days become an inspiration because regardless of age, ethnic background and economic status everyone can in some way relate to and learn from each diary.

'This Day: Diaries from American Women'
By Joni B. Cole, Rebecca Joffrey, & B. K. Rakhra
Beyond Words

After hundreds of phone calls and lots of begging and networking Cole, Joffrey and Rakhra enlisted the help of 529 women across the country, including a former Miss America, a WNBA player, and an inmate. Each woman was asked to keep a day diary on Oct. 15, 2002.

According to Joffrey, the only consideration taken when choosing the day the women would keep their diaries on was that "it had to be an ordinary day. We didn't want it near a holiday and we didn't want it to be a Monday or Friday because those days are affected by weekends, so we figured Tuesday was the most ordinary day of the week.



"Its very different from a journal," Joffrey said of keeping a day diary. "In a journal you lose the small things sometimes because you stop at the end of the day and look back on it and say something profound.

"In a day diary you're not consciously thinking about what happened," she said. "You just write as you go and it's not until you go back and read it that you see the small things that you otherwise would have forgotten. As we speed through life doing 20,000 things in a day you lose the small things and you lose the thought and that's what's captured [in a day diary]."

As compilers of the book, Cole, Joffrey and Rakhra decided to keep day diaries of their own. They too kept track of what they did, what they were thinking and how they felt through out their day.

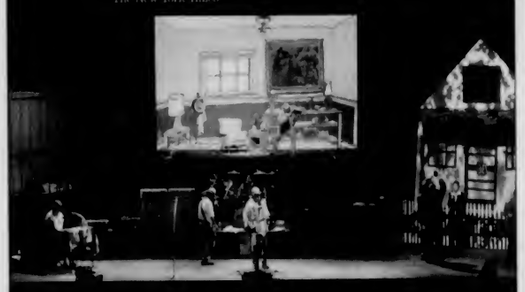
"I think I'm very conscious of my thought process during the day now because I think that's what everyone put down on paper," Joffrey said. "For me, when I kept my own day diary, how I manage my time became very clear, my attitudes about life and my job."

COLLECTIVE GLIMPSES
- 70% of day diarists had caffeine
- 64% felt stressed out
- 57% didn't get enough sleep
- 47% worried about money
- 25% were on a diet
- 26% drank alcohol
- 22% cried
- 7% smoked

Once the day diaries were completed it was time to read them over, discuss each of them in detail and ultimately assemble a book. The criteria used when deciding whether or not to include a day diary in the book was simple. First, it had to work together as a whole day diary and be written in the moment, rather than as a journal in which it sounded as if they were looking back on something that had already happened. The second thing the compilers looked for was a mix, they wanted to make sure as many different viewpoints, and occupations and life circumstances were represented as possible.

"I think reading other peoples perspective gave me perspective on my own life as well and that's really what I see as the value of this book," Joffrey said. "I think by understanding someone's life you come to understand your own.

"American woman represent so many different life styles and career choices and insights to the mental perspectives of how they handle their day, that's what I wanted to tap into, just exposing all that shows who we are. I'm interested in how people choose their life paths and how they end up in the circumstances they're in."



The strength of women really shines through in each of the day diaries, particularly in those of the women who are faced with great adversity. Although each day diarist is very different, they all share a common bond. They are women, working towards something or for something. They are surviving but, more than that, they are living, and sometimes as women trying to survive rather than live, we lose sight of what's really important. "This Day" is a nod as to why women work so hard and why it is so important not to waste a moment.

Each woman paints a picture, some are sparkling, some are a little blurry and some seem like scribbles across a canvas, but each one is honest. The reader gets a chance to see what it is like to take care of a sick husband, or spend your days in a cell, or find pleasure in the little things that we so many times let slip away.

Each day diarist has her own way of showing or expressing who she is and how she lives but many of the women used similar tools and ideas to do that. It seems that no matter how different

HAS HOLLYWOOD

Both Cold Mountain and The Last Samurai are Oscar-quality movies. I don't mean that as a compliment. Both are impressively staged epics — you know, those long, sweeping, three-hour buttkillers that are almost always impossible to sit through — that seem to be built (or maybe just jerry-rigged) from the chapters of the Academy Award handbook. They are both, strangely, too remote and prestigious to be truly loved. They are the kind of austere, honey-glazed Academy catnip that could be examples from "How To Win an Oscar For Dummies."

"Cold Mountain" is the more prestigious of the two. It has all the elements of a sure-fire "Best Picture" contender: Miramax backing, an acclaimed literary source and a pedigreed cast and crew that includes Nicole Kidman, who's fast becoming the fine-boned queen of Prestige Oscar Wannabes (see also "The Hours").

It's not a bad movie, per se. It's just not a great one. It's a sweeping Civil War romance about a Southern man (Jude Law, finally getting the star turn he deserves) who deserts the war to travel back to his sweetheart in North Carolina. That sweetheart is Kidman, playing a blandly de-edged Scarlett O'Hara who must learn to live off the land with the assistance of a mountain woman (Renee Zellweger, a shot of moonshine in this honey-glazed seriousness). Director Anthony Minghella keeps the stars coming — Phillip Seymour Hoffman, Natalie Portman, Donald Sutherland, even Jack White of the White Stripes shows up — and he has the eye to craft a truly powerful battle scene if he wants to. But, as "good" as "Cold Mountain" is, I couldn't help but feel as though the movie belonged in an antique store, gathering dust.

In "The Last Samurai," Tom Cruise, clad in a scruffy facial beard and a stylish shag haircut, goes native with the ancient Japanese. He's a dissolute Civil War veteran hired to train Japanese soldiers in modern combat, but is seduced by the code of the samurai. The movie is really just an exceptionally gorgeous vanity project for an actor who wants to look both pretty and despondent at the same time. Edward Zwick directs action scenes with unfussy finesse, but the movie is too long, too reverent and too historical. It's like watching a textbook come to life. The one thing that keeps it together is Ken Watanabe's fiery performance as the samurai leader who slowly befriends his "enemy." It's the one burning ember in Zwick and Cruise's cooled ash. "Mountain": B "Samurai": B-

Stuck On You finds the Farrelly brothers growing soft. Matt Damon and Greg Kinnear are Bob and Walt Tenor, brothers who are joined at the hip by a thick flab of flesh. When Walt, the more outgoing of the two, decides to be an actor they head out to Hollywood. Walt becomes the unlikely star of a TV legal drama called "Honey and the Beaze" which stars none other than Cher (her face Botoxed into a porcelain mask.) The Farrelly brother's usual mix of sentimentality and ribaldry seems awfully off-balance here; the movie often gets mired in sticky goo before half-heartedly trying to gross us out. There are a couple of decent laughs, but I don't need to see the Farrelly brothers being defanged with each movie. C

It says right in the credits that Love Don't Cost A Thing is based on a screenplay. That's the first sign. The second is that the screenplay happens to be for "Can't Buy Me Love" a 1987 teen farce that seemed like very moldy bread even back then. Here's its given a 'hip' 'urban' update, which means the soundtrack is plastered with the year's most forgettable hip-hop tunes instead of the years most forgettable new wave tunes. Nick Cannon, the charming star of "Drumline," coasts as a nerd who bribes a popular girl (third-tier pop starlet Christina Milian, as charming as she needs to be) into pretending to be his girlfriend. Never mind that is just a PG-13 advertisement for junior level prostitution. Just concentrate on the fact that this twice-warmed over teen flop contains not one laugh whatsoever. D

ment, and expand my imagination so that I am able to perceive and express nature's nuances more vividly," Gregorio said. "It is this training of my perception that I am committed to. This is the continual process in my development as a human being."

Ermansons' artwork is not as easily open for reading by the viewer. By using strings of different colors suspended from the ceiling and drawn lines on canvas she expresses her message in a rather distinctive way.

"An underpinning of my work is my awe of line," said Ermansons. "I find inspiration in the slender line of a spider's thread, the mad cursive strokes of Chinese calligraphy, scratches made by a low-lying willow branch in the snow, and String Theory's images of invisible vibrating strands."

Though it may appear to be ultra-simplistic at first glance, a more critical look at her artwork stirs the imagination and it is impossible not to ponder the significance of the line. Ultimately some of the weighty meaning of these pieces starts to come through.

"It is no surprise to me that ancient Chinese myth tells of how the founder of Chinese civilization drew a trigram of three solid lines and a trigram of three broken lines to convey and plumb the mysteries of the world," she said.

This collection of artwork will be on display at Gallery A[1] through the end of January. There will be a public forum tomorrow at 7:30 p.m.

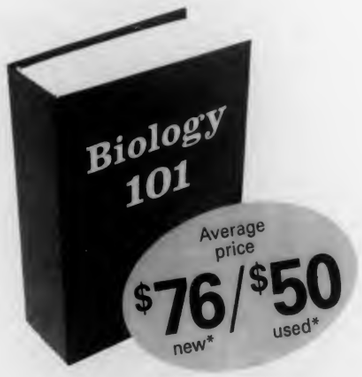
FROZEN OVER?



what I hope that Ben Affleck, John Woo, Aaron Eckhart and Uma Thurman got for making this utterly generic slice of futuristic sci-fi hokum (I hope it was a big one too.) Affleck has his memory erased and must use 19 little items to uncover his identity, all while being chased by armed and faceless goons. What action movie does that not sound like? This is supposedly adapted from a Phillip K. Dick novel. Woo directs as if he wants to be Hitchcock (there's an obvious reference to "North by Northwest") but he too often lets himself slip into self-parody. "Paycheck" lacks the giddy fun of Affleck pal Matt Damon's "The Bourne Identity." After watching this, I felt as though my memory was erased. C+

Steve Martin and Bonnie Hunt raise a brood of 12 children in Cheaper by the Dozen but they don't exist in any approximation of the real world. They live in the Land of Sitcom — a prepackaged, fresh-scrubbed place where kids rebel in parent-approved "mischievious" fashion and comedians as smart and wily as Martin are reduced to taking pratfalls amidst a clutch of generically cute child actors. Familial crises are tidied up before the end credits roll; there may be problems of a sort, but there's no doubt that there'll also be a big, shiny Happy Ending (emphasis on the happy), no matter how disingenuous it may be. Among the more recognizable kid faces are Piper Perabo (as the eldest daughter, trying to make it on her own, but inexorably pulled by gravity to the orbit of her family), "Smallville" hunk Tom Welling and that new princess of lip gloss, Hillary Duff. Duff chirps and squeaks and preens as the fashion-obsessed, Lizzie McGuire-like daughter. Her presence is just one indication of the pale, easy, cinematic shorthand that this corporate product of a family film relies on. The only person who seems to be having fun is Ashton Kutcher, sending himself up as a vain, narcissistic actor-boyfriend to Perabo's bland older daughter. Kutcher seems amused with himself, so one can't help but wonder why he isn't punking the makers of this candy-coated triffle. C-

The best compliment you can possibly pay to P.J. Hogan's fanciful new take on J.M. Barrie's classic children's novel Peter Pan is that it makes you feel as if you are living in a storybook wonderland. There are clouds so pink and soft that they look like large dollops of cotton candy, a trip through a psychedelic solar system the color of Skittles and shadows shot in the lush, velvety purple and blue hues of midnight. Jeremy Sumpter makes a bland, blonde surfer boy of a Pan and Ludivine Sagnier, the naked nymphet from "Swimming Pool" mugs with no shame as Tink. But Hogan taps into the darker adult themes running under Barrie's work, most notably the awkward transition from adolescence to adulthood. It helps that Hogan has actors as gifted as the young Rachel Hurd Wood, playing Wendy with delicate feeling, and Jason Isaacs, as both the fusty Darling father and an imperious, devilish Captain Hook. B

In The Human Stain, Anthony Hopkins, playing a light-skinned black man posing as a Jew, is accused of making a racist remark and begins a troubled relationship with a slatternly janitor half his age (she's played by Nicole Kidman). It's a grandiose act of miscasting to cast both these famous actors in their respective roles, especially seeing how Hopkins looks nothing like Wentworth Miller, the actor playing his younger self. C+

21 Grams has a fractured non-linear timeline, but reassembled, its litany of tragedies adds up to the pulpiest of soap opera thrillers. Both these films have the same thing in common. They mistake despair for depth, pain for profundity and cheap tragedy for heartwrench. They're both marvelously acted; "21 Grams" in particular boasts great, gritty work from Sean Penn (as a college professor with a new heart beating inside him), Benicio Del Toro (as a born again ex-con) and Naomi Watts (as a widow who begins an affair with Penn.) Neither of these films I want to sit through again. Why? Because they are hollow exercises in depression as substance. C

MUSIC

By Meghan Healy and Matthew Reid
Collegian Staff

It wasn't really a surprise when Dave Matthews released a solo album; his career has been gearing toward such a move for a few years now. And it wasn't really a surprise when that album did well either; the material on "Some Devil" managed to maintain all the magic of his work with Dave Matthews Band while declaring Matthews as an artist in his own right.

What was surprising, however, was the realization of "Some Devil" as live music. From its earliest inception, fans wondered how a Dave Matthews solo album could be translated into the artist's strongest medium — the stage. Matthews is notorious for his highly dedicated fan following and ability to sell out venues at the blink of the eye. There was talk of a tour as early as mid-September, as Matthews prepped for "Some Devil" to hit stores and DMB took over Central Park for a benefit concert.

Fans were accustomed to seeing Dave without the band — he has toured multiple times with long-time friend Tim Reynolds — but even then the material was familiar DMB favorites and there were many songs to choose from. "Some Devil" produced only 13 tracks, hardly enough to fill the requisite two-hour sets that Matthews fans have come to expect. The announcement of "An Acoustic and Electric Evening with Dave Matthews and Friends" tour with special guests Trey Anastasio on guitar, Brady Blade on drums and Tony Hall on bass, who all appeared on "Some Devil," as well as the addition of Ray Paczkowski on keyboards, only served to further intrigue Matthews fans.

The 12-stop tour, which kicked off on Dec. 12 and wound down Jan. 16, rose above and beyond fan's expectations. Matthews' fans have come to expect surprises from their musical idol and "Dave and Friends" did not disappoint. Fans religiously follow each performance and meticulously track every song played but the band always manages to sneak in a few surprises every now and then. Therefore, with the ensemble of musical talent assembled by Matthews, it was expected that each performance would bring something new to the table.

The Northeast was blessed with four of the 12 shows within reasonable driving distance. The Dunkin Donuts Center in Providence, was the second stop of the tour (Dec. 13) and showed a collection of musicians primed to create musical greatness. A stop in Boston to play the FleetCenter three days later followed by shows at New York's Madison Square Garden and Connecticut's Hartford Civic Center finished up the Northeastern run.

At the start of each "Dave and Friends" show, Matthews and Reynolds played a small set composed of their near-legendary acoustic arrangements of DMB favorites such as "Dancing Nancies," "Lie in Our Graves" and "Bartender." The five to six song mini-sets seemed to satiate any appetite the crowd had for old DMB standards, making the premier of Matthews' solo material rather well received.

Fans who attended the Providence installment of "Dave and Friends" witnessed a musical collaboration, only one day old, at its finest. The ensemble was tight and the energy was fierce. It was clear to the audience that Matthews and Anastasio were having the time of their lives and that feeling traveled out to the crowd.

Covers of Peter Gabriel's punchy "Solsbury Hill" and Paul Simon's ethereal "American Tune" punctuated the set and really allowed some of Matthews musical tastes that previously remained unseen to come through.

Anastasio took the mic over and sang lead vocals on "Spanish Moon," a Little Feat cover, and a take on The Band's "Up On Cripple Creek." Despite a long fought feud between DMB and Phish fans over which band is better, there was no sign of anything but pure admiration and respect between the two frontmen.

The energy from the crowd was so strong that fans wouldn't allow Matthews and his cohorts to leave the stage for long. The band returned quickly and busted out a powerful rendition of Stevie Wonder's "Tell Me Something Good" and the Anastasio-Matthews track off of "Some Devil," "Too High." After the guys left the stage for a second time, fans refused to dissipate and kept cheering. An extremely rare occurrence for any musician, Matthews, Anastasio and company took the stage yet again, for a second encore.

The fans that packed the FleetCenter in Boston on Dec. 16 got to see firsthand just why Dave Matthews and his usual band are constantly being listed among some of today's most prominent jam bands.

When "Dave and Friends" took the stage, they opened with "Dodo," also the opening track off of "Some Devil." In typical Matthews' fashion, the group jammed the song for over 11 minutes. Not only did this mark the first jam of the concert but also the first extended jam of the tour. It was clear to everyone in attendance that this handful of eclectic and powerful musicians was, with a few shows under their collective belts, truly comfortable playing live together.

While the majority of the set saw previous nights' material revisited, energy and inventiveness were in full force. Throughout the set, Matthews noted the crowd's reaction to the virtuoso guitar playing of Reynolds and Anastasio, and in a display of true musicianship, would simply stand back and admire what was going on. Many times during the show and throughout the tour, Matthews even began dancing along with the clapping coming from the audience. Such spontaneous antics made the experience far more laidback and ultimately more intimate for everyone in the building, including those on the stage.

A big surprise of the evening, and a high point of the tour, was when opening act Emmylou Harris joined the collection of musicians on stage. Called up by Matthews, it was the first time Harris had been asked to play a song during the main set. Matthews and Harris had collaborated several times in the past, and it was heavily rumored that they would eventually play one of their usual songs together. Harris, however, surprised everyone by singing a cover of Bob Dylan's "Oh Sister."

The Boston show also marked the premiere of the Phish classic "Waste" into the "Dave and Friends" lineup, a song that even

For Brighton-based pianist Gonzalez, notoriety is just around the corner

By Meghan Healy
Collegian Staff

Rob Gonzalez isn't asking for much, just the chance to play his music and put food on the table. And, if he should happen to find fame and fortune along the way, well that'd be ok with him too.

"I guess I wouldn't mind being thought of as the new 'piano man,'" said Gonzalez.

"One of the things that I'm most proud of is that I've been able to make a living playing music since I was 19 years old," said the Brighton-based pianist, who's latest self-produced album, "The Rush From Your Touch" is winning acclaim across the Commonwealth and beyond.

His fourth album, "The Rush From Your Touch" is the sort of musical masterpiece that comes along when least expected. A mix of jazz, pop, blues, and about every other genre imaginable, the album has a sort of timeless quality. The soft piano ballads and laconic jazz tunes hold a universal appeal. "A lot of people have been saying I sound like a mix of Van Morrison, Jackson Browne and Lyle Lovett, with a little Harry Connick Jr. thrown in. I love all those guys so the comparison works for me," he said.

Gonzalez, 34, grew up in Milwaukee, WIS. As a child he was encouraged to express himself musically.

"I started playing piano when I was just a little kid. My parents tell me I used to sit the piano as a five-year-old and make up little songs," said Gonzalez. Proper piano lesson soon followed and by age 14 Gonzalez had found his calling. "[When I was 14] I told my mom I wanted to be a songwriter when I grew up," he said.

Following a two-year stint at Berklee College of Music, Gonzalez enrolled at Easton's Stonehill College. He graduated with a degree in Philosophy and a minor in English, but the college experience only reaffirmed the pianist's desire to create music.

With his focus on music, Gonzalez began to fine-tune his sound. Drawing from a wide span of influences — he counts the Beatles, Jackson Browne, Van Morrison, Leonard Cohen, Paul Simon and James Taylor among his muses. Even he isn't sure what to really call his sound.

"Philosophically speaking, that's a tough thing to do because everyone gets different ideas that come to mind when labels are tossed around," he said. "I try to describe it as 'acoustic rock/pop with influences of blues, jazz, folk, and country.'"

Of his song writing process, he says, "usually I come up with the title line first, then the melody. The words get filled in last. It can take 45 minutes or it can take weeks."

Watching Gonzalez perform, and listening to his cds, it is clear that he understands the importance of being a true musician. "Johnny Cash died the day we finished ['The Rush From You Touch']... Once I was walking through downtown Nashville, and I came up to a life-size bronze statue of Johnny Cash. At that moment, I realized the power of what I do for a living."

He acknowledges the currently tumultuous climate out there for musicians. The recent success of male singer-song writers has many artists struggling to stand out. Yet, Gonzalez remains calm and cool. Is he worried about the inevitable comparisons and critiques? "Not at all ... the biggest reason why is that right now there aren't any male singer/songwriter piano players out there ... Ben Folds is really the only one that comes to mind, but he's already been around for a while and his music is far more eclectic than mine."

Gearing up for a big 2004, Gonzalez will be making the rounds on the college circuit, making at least 25 stops on this upcoming tour. Having played over 60 gigs in 2003, touring is nothing new for the seasoned musician. "I enjoy visiting new places and meeting people from all over the country," he said.

For Gonzalez the buzz surrounding "The Rush From Your Touch" is a compliment, but he isn't concerned with fame or notoriety.

"I get paid to play music and it's a great feeling," he said. "I've always said that I'll have 'made it' when I make a living playing my own music. I'm already doing that, so in a sense I've reached my lifelong goal. Where it goes from here is just icing on the cake."

With a new album, "A Rush from Your Touch," and an upcoming college tour, Rob Gonzalez is making a name for himself.

it's a great building and there is not a single view obstruction," said Beauchamps.

First to rock Mullins this semester will be Toby Keith.

Keith will appear at the Mullins Center on Feb. 12 in support of his latest album "Shock'n Y'all," which has sold nearly 600,000 copies since its releases in Nov. 2003.

"We are very excited to have Toby Keith," Beauchamps said. "We were trying to convince his agent to bring him here last year."

But at the time Keith's management felt the Amherst area was not a thriving market for artists of his genre. Beauchamps believes that Keith's appearance will be a success, saying that she is confident that the show will sell out by the time Feb. 12 rolls around.

"This is an untapped country market," Beauchamps said. "This event will prove to a lot of agents that Amherst is a strong country market ... Toby Keith is an experiment. Lucky for us it's a good one."

Barenaked Ladies last played the Mullins Center in Feburary 2001. They will make a return trip in 2004 to UMass for a Valentine's Day show.

Less experimental, Barenaked Ladies will invade the Mullins Center just two days after Keith.

"The Barenaked Ladies are still, in my mind, a college band," said Beauchamps. When the Ladies last appeared at the University of Massachusetts in Feb. 2001 the Mullins Center sold out its 8,000 plus tickets. Beauchamps is confident that history will repeat itself this Valentine's Day, when BNL comes to Amherst as part of their "Peepshow" tour.

The Canadian quintet, probably best known for radio singles "The Old Apartment" and "One Week," come to the Pioneer Valley in support of their latest studio album, October's "Everything to Everyone."

BNL has proven to be a success at the Mullins Center in the past and the band has earned a lot of praise for their live show, but scheduled for the year's biggest night for romance, it's possible Valentine's Day may deter some concertgoers.

Beauchamps remains optimistic. "We are hoping that it ends up being a great date night for UMass."

Like the Ladies, Neil Young, an artist who has endured for nearly four decades in the spotlight and still maintained a reputation as one of the most talented songwriters and guitarists in the business, shows promise of drawing a sizeable audience, as well.

"Neil Young is really perfect to play the Mullins Center," said Beauchamps. "We have a lot of old hippies around here," she said, adding that she believes the market is strong for a performer of Young's caliber.

When the rock veteran plays the Mullins Center on March 21, Beauchamps believes he will be "an act that has huge appeal." Unlike Toby Keith, she feels there is little risk with Young, and although the show is on the last day of spring break, students will not want to miss this performance.

Capitalizing on the current popularity of extreme sports the Mullins Center will also play host to Xtreme International Ice Racing on Feb. 4. Beauchamps hopes the event will be a success. Should the event get enough support she said there is the potential for doing it every year. With a number of small clubs in Western Massachusetts already practicing motorcycle ice racing, this is "an event that should have great appeal on campus," said Beauchamps.

What does a lineup like this spring's mean for the Mullins Center? Beauchamps thinks it's a positive sign. "I think our slump is over. People are seeing the Mullins Center is a great place to bring a show," she said.

Matthews tours the Northeast with a little help from his friends

Phish-deficient DMB fans were already familiar with because Matthews has been covering it in live shows since April 2001. "Waste" was performed along with Matthews's own "Everyday" as part of an acoustic duet with Anastasio in the show's encore. To see these two icons of folk/rock music sharing a single, acoustic stage was enough to leave the crowd breathless — or at least speechless — for both songs.

Fans that were lucky enough to score tickets to the following night's show in Madison Square Garden in New York City were treated to yet another dazzling show. It featured an even longer and more intense performance of "Dodo" and a cover of Led Zeppelin's "Fool in the Rain," as well as performance of the song "Sweet Up and Down," an unreleased DMB song from the now infamous "Lilywhite Sessions" that had not been played since the summer 2000.

The true highpoint of the MSG show, and a moment that truly captured the whole mood of the tour, came during the encore when Matthews and Anastasio took the stage. Starting out with one of the few tracks fans embraced off the band's 2001 album of the same name, "Everyday," the crowd began what has become sort of a DMB ritual, singing the phrase "Hani Hani" during the final verse. After the crowd started in, Anastasio leaned over to Matthews and whispered something to him. He then placed his hand on Matthews' guitar and stopped him from playing. The two then sat back and smiled – letting the audience do all the work as they sang for several minutes. As is typical at a show with Matthews, the inclusion of the crowd made each member of the audience feel like they were truly part of the show.

The opportunity to see Dave Matthews, Trey Anastasio and Tim Reynolds share the stage is an experience no music fan should deprive him or herself of. However, the collection of talent found on the "Dave and Friends" tour was not limited to guitar prodigy Reynolds, jam band king Anastasio and Matthews. Tony Hall laid down some strong bass lines and dominated the Wonder cover "Tell Me Something Good." Brady Blade filled the shoes of usual Matthews percussionist Carter Beauford quite nicely, bringing his own, and very different, style to the show. Ray Paczkowski strongly rounded out the group on keyboard, adding a richness and depth to the "Some Devil" material.

The unusual nature of this tour and the seemingly supernatural collection of musicians that came together to create "Dave and Friends" made for 12 powerful, passionate and brilliant shows, each different than the one before. It may be a long time before Matthews shares the stage with Anastasio, Reynold and the others again. They may never come together again, but for the sake of Dave Matthews fans everywhere, let's hope he gets the chance to play with his friends again soon.

Elephant Man is good 2 stay

By Glen Straub
Collegian Staff

The ignition key to Jamaica's club scene has always been the heavy-bass 'riddims,' or rhythms, of dancehall reggae. But last summer it was Sean Paul and Wayne Wonder who carried the 'riddims' to the airwaves of mainstream American radio stations with their top-selling records, "Dutty Rock" and "No Holding Back," respectively. Their watered down Jamaican accents and ability to hypnotize the ladies' eyes with smooth, boyish looks made the two Jamaican natives perfect candidates for leading the dancehall revolution back into pop culture as it was in the early 1990s.

Elephant Man
'Good 2 Go'
VP/Atlantic

But the question was and continues to be, can some of the other artists that have floated around the dancehall scene get their music out to the album-buying public?

With VP records' third major LP release since it merged with Atlantic in October 2002, Elephant Man's "Good 2 Go," has shown that you don't need everyone to understand what you are saying, you just need the combination of the hottest 'riddims' going around and a unique singing style and appearance akin to the Ol' Dirty Bastard.

Born O'Neil Bryan, Ele's title comes from his peers at grade school in the Seaview Gardens area of Kingston, Jamaica calling him "Dumbo Elephant" because of his large ears. With his banana-yellow dreads — reminiscent of early dancehall star Yellowman, huge smile and a piece of gold for every extremity on his body, Ele is the classic outlandish character, perfect for the development of the dancehall genre in mainstream culture.

His look and lyrical style have been compared to Busta Rhymes of the hip-hop world. The two even collaborated on Lil' Jon's "Get Low" remix this fall. His rapid-fire shouts at the mic on top of powerful acoustic guitar and Nintendo game-like beats simply make a statement on the ears. His high-octane performance style has branded him with another nickname, "Energy God." Like Busta, Dirty and fellow dancehall artist Shabba Ranks, his sound may be annoying at first take, but with more listens the delicate and difficult balance of rawness with a smooth deliverance is achieved.

"Good 2 Go" is Ele's VP debutand it's release was timed perfectly. Dancehall and hip-hop are in fusion these days and Ele's passion to combine hip-hop beats with his brash Jamaican patois dialect is the perfect equation for commercial success. Rather than making "Good 2 Go" a crossover album, Ele sticks to the ragga themes such as his home country and its dancehall scene and limits the amount of contributing hip-hoppers to three (R&B serenader Jimmy Cozier —whose chorus on "So Fine" is brilliant, — Killah Priest and Lil'Jon).

The 20-track "Good 2 Go" set is a portrait of Elephant Man's party animal personality. Each track pours out more energy, the kind only you thought children had. Listeners get no time to rest as track after track is a brand new party. Elephant Man prepares the listener for this by stating in the first three words of the disc the title of the album. He was ready to go and never really stopped.

"Pon De River..." is the first anthem of the album but with a catchy Celine Dion sampled chorus, "Signal De Plane," has a similar effect Paul's "Get Busy" had — catchy and uplifting. "Signal De Plane" captures the hot and energetic atmosphere of the Caribbean and its melody is uplifting. He repeats the art of sampling in "Fan Dem Off" when he transforms everybody's favorite guilty pleasure and the theme from the Rocky movie series, "Eye of the Tiger" into a catchy dancehall chorus.

It is quite hard to understand what Ele is saying throughout the disc, but he makes up for it in his vigor and style. His speedy pace is tiresome toward the latter half of the album though. It is as if he doesn't know when to slow down, take a break and let us regroup. Finally, by the end of the album with his ballad, "Mexican Girl," he has taken some Nyquil and is ready to fall asleep with his "sweet senorita, my tia maria."

Right now Sean Paul is the leader of the pack in dancehall arena, but "Good 2 Go" reveals Elephant Man's ability to be a ringleader as well, at least for those who forgot to take their Ritalin.

Ani takes an 'Educated Guess'

By Meghan Healy
Collegian Staff

Not many modern artists have Ani Difranco's kind of staying power. After two or three albums, many have worn out their welcome. With five or 10 albums under their belts, many find they have nothing new to offer. Most artists will never even make it to 10 records. But with her 16th full-length release, Difranco proves she is just getting started.

The "First Lady" of folk returns with "Educated Guess," released Jan. 20. After just one listen, it is clear that Difranco is truly an artist in her prime. The 14-track album is a triumph for the multitalented guitarist and singer. Conscientious, powerful and unforgiving, "Educated Guess," is the album that will guarantee Difranco a place on the unwritten list of transcendent musicians including Bob Dylan, Johnny Cash, and the Beatles.

If it were possible to credit Difranco's longevity to just one thing, the artist's unrelenting ability to reinvent her already unique sound would be a likely candidate. A trip through her songbook would prove to be an ever-evolving journey — no two albums are quite the same. While most artists cling stubbornly to what they know works, the proven formula, Difranco fearlessly enters uncharted waters again and again. The result? An incredibly loyal fan base and the respect of a broad spectrum of the industry's most powerful.

Ani Difranco
'Educated Guess'
Righteous Babe

On "Educated Guess," Difranco combines her poetic ambition with her "Righteous Babe" ingenuity to produce a solid and formidable album. Although she has essentially been a solo artist throughout her career, "Educated Guess" is Difranco's debut as an artist on her own. Holding the disc in your hands, it is awing that this is a creation completely brought into being by Difranco herself.

She created every sound heard on the album. She sings both lead and back up vocals. She plays every instrument. If it were possible to look beyond the disc and see the recording and production process, the vision would show Difranco at the mixing board, setting up the mics, designing the cover and booklet and, of course, writing the songs and lyrics in their entirety.

It can be dangerous for a musician to hijack a project and cut off outside input. Only an artist of Difranco's talent, experience and intelligence – and there aren't many – could pull it off.

The title track readies the listener for the learning experience that "Educated Guess" is, when taken in its entirety. "Yes school is in session/ Get your chin off your desk... Use your education/ And take an educated guess about me," Difranco says.

As with all of her albums, this is a disc centered on reality, and on self-discovery. The irony of an "educated guess" does not escape the songwriter.

The heated and defiant "Origami" is reminiscent of old-school Ani, with its abbreviated and fierce guitar riffs. With the lyrics, Difranco creates an assertive, strong woman and calls into question the stereotypes associated with gender. Yet unlike albums past, "Origami" seems to show a more grown-up point of view, a wiser take on things. "You got to let it ebb and flow,/ If you want the ball to bounce,/ You gotta let it go/ Just let it go."

COURTESY RIGHTEOUS BABE

With her last six releases, Difranco's sound has edged slowly away from assaulting punk-folk that she started out with a near 14 years ago and into the land of experimental jazz. On tracks like "Animal," "Company," "Rain Check" and "Swim," Difranco takes this sound to another level, creating a genre that cannot really be described, only experienced.

In the vain of live favorite "Self Evident," Difranco punctuates "Educated Guess" with four spoken-word tracks, "Platforms," "The True Story of What Was," "Grand Canyon" and "Akimbo." While "Platforms" and "Akimbo" are brief — both are under 30 seconds long — they leave an impact on the listener, setting the tone for the album and reminding that the world is in a state of unrest.

The prophetic "Grand Canyon" is relentless in its quest to truly define patriotism. "I love my country./ By which I mean I am indebted joyfully/ To all the people throughout its history/ Who have fought the government to make right ... So that we could stand here and behold breathlessly the sight/ how a raging river of tears/ Cut a grand canyon of light," declares Difranco in a new sort of "Pledge of Allegiance." Though her music-backed tracks hold a great deal of political and socio-economic meaning as well, the absence of instruments on these tracks somehow impresses Difranco's thoughts, fears and outrages more deeply upon the listener.

With each album Difranco manages to find a way to go above and beyond her previous work. "Educated Guess" is no exception. By maintaining complete control of the record's creation, she has produced an album both beautifully constricted by the limitations imposed by solidarity and magnificently freed by the embodiment of her realized vision. When it comes down to it, "Educated Guess" is, as Difranco says in "The True Story of What Was," a musical admission that "I am not really who I said I was/ Or who I thought I'd be/ just a collection of recollections/ Conversations consisting/ Of the kind of marks we make/ When we're trying to get a pen to work again."

Britney: borderline 'In the Zone'

By Nikolas Markantonatos
Collegian Staff

After working non-stop since her 1998 hit "Baby ... One More Time" made Britney Spears a household name, the princess of pop decided it was time for a much-needed break, especially from the media scrutiny that had taken away her private life and chronicled her high-profile split with ... well, you know.

Britney Spears
'In the Zone'
Jive

But an interesting thing happened during her intended vacation: Media attention increased on the pop tart. Perhaps the blame lies partly with Britney. Smoking, drinking and her club-going ways begged for tabloid coverage.

So it should come as no surprise that Spears has crafted an album of club-ready anthems for "In the Zone," her fourth studio album. Like "Me Against the Music," featuring 'material mentor' Madonna, much of the album relies on upbeat songs with basses heavier than Spears' bank account. Clearly aiming at the street and clubs and less at radio, techno and hip-hop beats cushion lyrics depicting scandalous scenes further dirtying her once squeaky clean image. The formula proves effective.

On "(I Got That) Boom Boom" featuring the Ying Yang Twins and "Showdown," Spears displays her penchant for fun dance tunes, both of which employ zigzagging strings and undeniable hoots to get dance floors in a rage.

The R. Kelly-produced "Outrageous" is an ego-boosting song ("Outrageous as I want to be/ I got these fellas chasing me") with la la la's that will appease teens but still appeal to an older audience. "Early Morning," produced by Moby, where attitude is replaced by breathy vocals, is less effective.

The best song on the album is "Toxic" where screeching strings collide with Britney's vocoder-enhanced vocals. As with all her songs, the best ones are those where attitude is in plenty of supply.

Despite the bevy of producers, "In the Zone" is a surprisingly cohesive album where the hip-hop, techno, vocoders and other tricks gel. And while her limited voice hasn't expanded, her sound is easily differentiated from boring artists like Mandy Moore and Hillary Duff.

COURTESY BLGRAVITYNET.COM

Britney Spears' "In the Zone" is filled with club-ready songs.

While the split with her ex led to the loss of her innocence and into an edgier sound, there is no Britney version of "Cry Me a River," much to the chagrin of gossip columnists.

Spears has the ability to be around as long as she wants, but her marriage with a childhood friend, one that earns the trophy for launching the most "Oops" headlines, seems like a cry for help from someone that the media has savagely tormented. Her intended six-month vacation lasted a measly three weeks, which she says she chose to end because she didn't know what to do with herself.

The future holds a tour, a new album for which she's already writing songs, starting a record label and shooting videos. Time will only tell whether she'll go the way of Michael Jackson or Madonna.

Enrique scores with new look, but misses with new sound

Enrique Iglesias
'7'
Interscope

You know you have a problem when your mole receives more attention than your music.

Such is the case with Enrique Iglesias' third English-language release, "7." The release of "7" coincides with the removal of the mole that was the subject of many jokes over the years (remember Jimmy Fallon's parody at the 2002 MTV Video Music Awards?).

If the music was of better quality, perhaps the mole wouldn't command so much attention. Over the years Iglesias has enjoyed a string of hit singles — "Bailamos," "Be With You," "Rhythm Divine," "Hero," "Escape" — with his Latin-tinged English songs. But the Latin pop that made him popular has slowly faded from his music and is nowhere to be found on "7."

Instead we get a serving of cheesy arena pop that sounds like it was crafted for the soul reason of wooing the 17-year-old fans screaming in the front row while Iglesias coos sweet nothings like "I'll lose a leg, go blind/ I'll sail a thousand ships/ to find and kiss your lips." Ewww.

All 13 songs (including the bonus "Adicto") were co-written by the heartthrob himself, and needless to say, they're all love songs. Requisite guitar riffs, choruses and rock-ish effects make differentiating the songs nearly impossible and are employed to melt the coldest hearts. But the breathy vocals sound like they'll elicit more laughs than swoons.

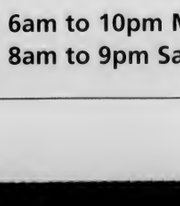
Missy Elliot passes the test with her latest record

By Nikolas Markantonatos
Collegian Staff

Here's the bad news: Missy Elliott's fifth studio album is not as good as its predecessor "Under Construction," nor do any songs hit the spectacular high note of that album's standout single, "Work It."



Missy Elliott
'This is Not a Test'
Elektra

Here's the good news: Elliott is not your average R&B singer, so when we say "not as good" we still mean fantastic.

No doubt released to capitalize on the incredible success, she enjoyed last year riding on the strength of the experimental "Under Construction," on "This Is Not a Test" Elliott continues to show off her gifted lyrical wordplay. Sidekick Timbaland is back at the helm, delivering earthquake-like beats.

Missy Elliott is one of the most important artists in the world of hip-hop, shattering the public perception of the female MC. By refusing to use her sexuality as part of her marketing campaign since first introducing us to her futuristic music in the mid-'90s, Elliott has still managed to move more than one million copies of all her studio albums. Despite being overweight (she's since dropped the weight because of health concerns), Elliott presented herself as sexually confident.

Her sex talk reaches a climax on "This Is Not a Test." On "Toyz," she gushes about sex gadgets. The single asserts two things: that she doesn't need a man to pleasure her, and that there's alternatives for women who may not be able to get a man. Despite looking trim (in a fold out poster she sports skin-tight short shorts as if to say "Look, I can look good too!") she's still holding it down for heavy females everywhere.

As with the rest of her canon, her best songs are those in which Timbaland goes delirious, unleashing syncopated electro beats, sirens, bells and other sound effects that turn the commercial rap marketplace has to be boring on its head. On "Let It Bump," Timbaland employs scratching noises, sirens, trickling beats while Missy moans and sings, reminding everyone that she and Tim make the best team in hip-hop. On tracks like "Pump It Up," featuring Nelly, and "Keep It Movin'," featuring Elephant Man, Elliott proves she can hold her own with some of the best rappers and R&B stars (nine in all on this record) in the business.

Of course, making sure she's not staid is one of Elliott's famous goals, and she encourages others in the hip-hop game to do the same. On "Wake Up," featuring Jay-Z, she shouts "hip-hop better wake up," that blingbling isn't important, but rather the quality of the music that brought hip-hop worldwide attention is. It's a topic she brought up in her last record and one that she wants to make sure she still brings attention to.

Other hip-hop stars can learn something from Missy Elliott's playful and inventive music — one that helps smash stereotypes and promotes harmony all while making sure the music is top-notch.

A day in a woman's life

women appear on the surface, inside, they are fighting just as hard as everyone else. Inside, they are just trying to find ways to make it easier.

"One is the humor, and just how that shapes our day," Joffrey said. "The humor of ordinary circumstances is one thing I really love ... how many people, no matter what their circumstances use humor to get through their day. I like how many roles that women play ... how we multi-task and how well we do it, that's another thing that really strikes me. And also the importance of friends and the relationships in our lives, you see how important it is to feel connected."

There are so many different things that can be taken from this book, lessons, perspectives, and even a new outlook.

"You don't know what's going on in their heads," Joffrey said of both the day diarists and people we meet everyday. "We spend so much time judging externals it's nice to see what's going on inside. It's a way to understand an experience you just otherwise wouldn't."

"This Day" is an amazing asset because you will not only feel inspired and encouraged both during and after reading it, but you will also find comfort, understanding and the feeling that you are never alone, you always have the company of truly incredible women.

Stephen King releases his fifth book in the 'Dark Tower' series that has come to seek their aid. In it are members from the farming townships, including the very same priest from King's "Salem's Lot," Father Pere Callahan, and one of the worlds last remaining androids, Andy— a messenger robot who has many other functions.

The story focuses primarily on the gunslingers helping these people fight off "the Wolves" that come once every generation to steal their children. Though this is done in somewhat of a predictable classic western/detective style, King mixes in sub-plots and back-stories that make the adventure more than just a 'shoot 'em up' western.

The most prominent of these sub-plots began in the third book of the series, "The Wasteland." While attempting to pull the last member of their group, Jake, through a portal between Roland's world and the boy's Susannah allowed herself to be raped by the demon that guarded the doorway. The repercussions of this action were feared, but scarcely mentioned in the fourth book. In this installment, however, the group's worst fear comes true, Susannah is pregnant with the demons child.

Roland watches as Susannah or rather an alter ego who calls herself Mae — meaning mother in Roland's language— eats all manner of living creatures, in order to feed her "Chap." This proves to be a major problem towards the end of the story, but in true King-style, readers will have to wait for the next book to find out what happens to her.

There are numerous other stories revolving around the new characters, the ones from Roland's world as well as some from our own. Father Callahan has come into possession of a piece of what Roland calls, "The Wizards Rainbow." They are thirteen orbs of colored glass that give their owners special abilities, but at a price. It just so happens that Callahan has gotten the most powerful and subsequently most dangerous one of them all — Black 13. Though they fear it greatly, the travelers use the sphere to open a door to a version of New York where perhaps the very key to the Dark Tower lay in imminent danger.

While all of this may sound like it would make for a very choppy read, the limited number of characters and King's writing skill make all of the strands of story flow together. Even the seemingly pointless flashbacks prove to be necessary elaboration on a point from a previous book or are the starting points of a new substory that will be wrapped up in a later chapter.

Seeing as this is only book five of seven it would be inconceivable for the heroes to die, so they don't. That is not to say, however, that the group escapes all possible mortal harm as a whole in this tale. For in his own way, King may have dealt the group a blow more powerful than any bullet or blade could.

Though it may seem a daunting read, the "The Dark Tower" series is a read comparable in quality to such legendary works of fantasy as J.R.R. Tolken's, "The Lord of the Rings" trilogy. With the next volume, "Song of Susannah" due out this coming summer and the final chapter, "The Dark Tower" following in November of this year, there is still time to be one of the first readers who sees Roland's quest for the Dark Tower from beginning to end.

Father Pere Callahan, who some readers may remember from King's "Salem's Lot," reimerges in this new fantasy novel.

theater screens, it becomes abundantly clear that each film — released annually over the past three years — represents one third of a larger movie. It's the nine-hour long epic fantasy-adventure that made viewers believe in a world of elves and dwarves and dragons and heroic three-foot-tall creatures known as hobbits.

In some hands, a "The Lord of the Rings" movie may have come off as silly and inconsequential. It is, after all, a straight-faced embrace of the kinds of things best appreciated by the members of the local "Dungeons and Dragons" society. There are elves draped in silky blonde locks, dog-faced baddie creatures called Orcs and a wizened old white wizard who has the name of Gandalf. The whole story centers on a "quest" across the verdant fields and gnarled forests in a land called Middle-Earth to a destroy a ring that can rain destruction on all involved.

Silly, no?

The amazing thing about "The Lord of the Rings" movies is that they never once seem silly or goofy. Past fantasy epics — the early Tom Cruise dud "Legend" as an example — were populated by the same sorts of mythical creatures, but they came off more like the fever dreams of a hallucinating "D&D" fanatic. Jackson, treating J.R.R. Tolkien's source novel with deadly seriousness, made the movies seem more real than some movies that take place in the "real" world. Jackson's greatest achievement was to take an already beloved literary mythology and breath complex cinematic life into it to make the lands, characters and events look like they took place in an all-too real world.

He did that by casting a group of actors who saw beneath the fantasy at the nuance within. He did it by emphasizing the human emotion at the center of the story, and the themes of strength, friendship, love, temptation, deception and heroism. He did it by focusing on special effects in assistance to the story, rather than as flashy eye-candy used to patch the holes in a nonexistent script.

He relies on the innate intelligence and patience of the audience to accomplish his goals. There are plenty of rousing action sequences in all the films — sword fights, creature attacks and a couple of major battles — but the films run an average length of over three hours, a huge demerit in today's world of bang-bang, MTV-bred, flash-cut editing. Despite the butt-numbing length, the films pack enough emotional charge in them to justify the running time. There's something for everyone in these films: battles and action sequences, elegant love stories, and enough nothing fireworks to satisfy the more demanding bad movie-scarred parents.

"The Lord of the Rings" movies are fantasy movies made with grace, eloquence and heart, acted with force and fury by an excellent cast and filled with some of the most seamless, spectacular special effects ever seen on a movie screen. More so, they are smart, moving commentaries on the ideals of bravery and sacrifice, of honor and nobility, of family and friend. The films may take place in a mythical, timeless, feudal landscape, but their 'Big Ideas' are carefully woven into the fabric of the stories and are also prevalent in today's war-ravaged land.

Now complete with "Return of the King," "The Lord of the Rings" movies are more than just a sci-fi geek's Holy Grail. They are an important part of cinema and a necessary addition to our pantheon of classics.

The best in pop gather for Kiss 108's 'Jingle Ball'

2003, and their new single, "This Love" was included on the soundtrack of the holiday chick flick "Love Actually."

The lowest point of the evening was perhaps annoying teen-queen, Hillary Duff. Duff took the stage with a full band, which had to blast their amps incessantly loud in order to drown out her terrible, terrible singing.

Duff performed her hit single "So Yesterday," as well as the annoying "Why Not," from "The Lizzie McGuire Movie." Duff should just leave singing altogether and stick to making abominable movies.

The "Newlyweds" followed Duff, and Jessica Simpson truly stole the show for the evening. Performing with a band that included a guitar and a set of bongos, Simpson proved why she has the best voice in the music industry. Her renditions of "With You," off of her third album, "In this Skin" and "Irresistible," off of her albums of the same names were particularly memorable. Simpson got a four-song set, and her hubby, only received one. The "Newlyweds" camera crew was on hand for the evening, so audience members can look forward to seeing some highlights from the concert when their show returns at the end of January.

Aiken followed Simpson and Lachey. Despite bronchial problems that had been plaguing him since the "Billboard Music Awards," Aiken displayed a good vocal performance, though he lacked much of his usual energy. Aiken performed four songs from his debut album, "Measure of a Man," including his new single "The Way," and his current creepy radio hit "Invisible."

Closing the evening was Canuck pop band Simple Plan, who's debut album "No Pads, No Helmets, Just Balls" has gone double platinum. Simple Plan has come a long way since performing with Sugar Ray at Mt. Holyoke College less than two years ago, but their stage antics haven't changed a bit. They've had three hit singles, and headlined the Warped Tour. The group staged a great performance, and has great chemistry. The highlight was perhaps their rendition of current teen-angst single "Perfect," which they called for the audience to whip out lighters and cell phones to light up the arena.

The whole "Jingle Ball" experience isn't just limited to the musical performances, but they are a big part. Audience members can meet their favorite artists at the Strawberries Music tent, and surprise guests are to be expected during the course of the evening. On hand that night was Bob, "The Bachelor."

Who would have thought that Bob was a budding music star as well as reality TV pimp? Apparently he is, and apparently his whirlwind promotion of his album, "3 Sides," has gotten him into trouble with the producers of "The Bachelor." ABC is suing Bob for breach of contract, which one would assume included not promoting his album while under the thumb of ABC.

From performances that were as stellar as Jessica Simpson's to ones that were as horrific as Hillary Duff's, radio-sponsored concerts often offer a wide variety of activity for any kind of taste in entertainment, and Kiss 108 continued to not disappoint.

'Newlyweds' and an 'Idol' shine for Kiss 108

LOWELL — Holiday multi-artist shows have become a staple of the radio industry, and Kiss 108 in Boston followed suit, throwing a major bash on Dec. 15 with their annual "Jingle Ball," held at the Tsongas Arena.

Kiss has been sponsoring concerts such as this since the late '80s when its annual summer kickoff "Kiss Concert" became a huge hit with audiences. Then in 1997 they decided that they should do something mid-year as well.

Fefe Dobson, Hillary Duff, Stacie Orrico, Nick Lachey, Jessica Simpson, Clay Aiken, Maroon 5 and Simple Plan were all on hand on the frigid winter evening and each made their own attempts to warm the arena, albeit some were more successful than others.

Dobson took the stage first and set a high standard for the evening. Dobson, who hails from Canada, delivered a high-energy four-song set that included her first single "Take Me Away," as well as her upcoming single "Everything," from the upcoming MTV production "The Perfect Score." Dobson proved her legitimacy as an artist and singer, and in the process danced the hell out of all of the hard-popish music on her self-titled debut album.

British pop star Dido was supposed to be on hand for the evening. However, she had to return to England after she was stricken with the flu. Replacing her was David Corey, a former Kiss music director and DJ, and an artist currently trying to make a name for himself in the music industry.

Perhaps it was lack of rehearsal, but Corey lacked any kind of energy, and basically performed a karaoke stint for the 5,000 people on hand.

Following Corey was newcomer Maroon 5, who passably performed four songs off of its debut album "Songs About Jane." The group lacked much on-stage chemistry, but they do have a lot to offer musically. "Harder to Breathe" was one of the biggest hits of late

Time for more student bodies in the seats

Talk about the winter of our discontent.

UMass Athletics suffered a pretty rough stretch since students left campus back in December. In fact, in the stretch from Dec. 20 to Jan. 20, the basketball and hockey teams have combined for a 7-15-2 record.

A hard winter in the Pioneer Valley, indeed.

And there are plenty of reasons to bring up for why the teams have struggled so mightily. Some (OK, many) think that men's hoop coach Steve Lappas should be fired. Some feel the effect of forward Stephen Werner's absence during the World Junior Tournament has been a key to the hockey team's pitfalls this winter. And it's no secret that Marnie Dacko isn't playing with a full deck — oh, she's not crazy or anything, but she doesn't have point guard Katie Nelson to run the floor, not to mention the well-documented lack of experience and size inside that left with Jennifer Butler and Nekole Smith.

That's not to say there haven't been any victories. Hockey beat Boston University at Walter Brown Arena for the first time ever on Jan. 7, newcomer Edris Bailey dropped 20 points in a 78-68 Minutewoman win over Atlantic 10 foe Dayton on Jan. 11, and the men have continued to improve, including in a convincing 83-65 win over Marshall on Dec. 20, with freshmen Rashaun Freeman (twice) and Maurice Maxwell earning A-10 Rookie of the Week honors.

What there hasn't been is an audience. Men's basketball has averaged 2,794 fans in six home games between Dec. 20 and Jan. 23, hockey managed just 2,974 in its one home game during winter break (vs. UMass Lowell, Jan. 4), and the average crowd (730) for women's basketball could probably cram into Thompson Hall.

And of course, there's a reason for that. Most of the students have been away from campus, enjoying snowball fights and post-New Year's hangovers. So you get a reprieve for the last month.

However, now you, Joe and Jane College, need to show up.

It's not always going to be fun, but if you really expect anything out of any of these teams down the stretch, you have to show up and tell them so. The athletes notice. A number of players, on many of the teams, have mentioned how much of a difference it is to be playing in front of a large crowd, especially one populated by the most volatile animal in college sports: the student.

More importantly, they have mentioned how much of a downer it is to look out just before the opening tip or face-off, and see a sparse crowd of diehards and the event staff as the only people in attendance.

You should expect something from them, too. But you can't do that from afar, it's just not the same to yell at your TV, when the game is taking place just a short walk down Commonwealth Ave.

Should you go out and paint your face and camp outside the Mullins Center for tickets? No, it doesn't need to be drastic. No one is shading the truth here — this is not the hoop halcyon days of the mid-90's, there's no reason to pretend that being at a UMass game is the event it once was. But the teams can't win in a vacuum, at least not for that long. Just showing up might make the little bit of difference the squads need.

That's why you, as a tried and true UMass fan, must stop griping on message boards and drinking away your sorrows, and instead throw on your Maroon Platoon T-shirt (yes, that means you might just have to join), make the trek down to the Bill every game night, and show these teams why they should be proud to play for the name on the front of the jersey.

The chicken-and-egg scenario of UMass sports has gotten to the point where the players want the fans to come so they can be more confident, and the fans want the players to play well enough to win every night. But when those fan votes are made in absentia, they just don't count.

Should you expect something in return? Of course, but not cheap gifts or a trip to Cancun for Spring Break. You should expect that the teams give their all, night-in and night-out. If they don't, let them have it, let them know that you're there, that you took time out of your night of partying to come down and see them play. Just let them know live and in person.

So start showing up to games. Not just men's basketball, not just hockey, not just women's basketball, but all three. Then, branch out a little, and take a look at Russ Yarworth and Bob Newcomb's swim teams, and Julie LaFreniere and Ken O'Brien's track teams. You'd be surprised at what you'll see — that UMass athletics aren't dead, they just haven't had an audience to please.

Besides, when Lappas and Dacko finally get things turned around, when Cahoon's team realizes its true potential, won't it be that much more fun to say you were there when the teams were just starting to get it together?

FOXBOROUGH (AP) — Ty Law has made big plays before. He's just never made so many in one game.

The Pro Bowl cornerback picked off three of Peyton Manning's passes in the AFC championship game Sunday to help New England beat the Indianapolis Colts 24-14 and advance to the Super Bowl. Strong safety Rodney Harrison also picked off the NFL co-MVP and forced a fumble.

"When you have five turnovers," Patriots offensive lineman Matt Light said, "everybody knows what the outcome's going to be."

The outcome for New England is a second trip in three years to the Super Bowl, where they'll face the Carolina Panthers. The last time, Law returned an interception 47 yards for a touchdown to lead the Patriots to their first NFL title; his four career postseason interceptions are a franchise record.

Vernon Perry of the Houston Oilers had four interceptions in a 1979 AFC playoff game against San Diego, an NFL postseason record.

Law also spent much of the day blanketing star receiver Marvin Harrison, limiting him to only three catches for 19 yards. Patriots coach Bill Belichick said the plan was to bump the receivers to knock them off their routes.

"The only thing that beats speed is power," Law said. "That's what we did."

Manning had two virtually perfect playoff games to reach the conference championship, and he hadn't thrown an interception in the postseason. All week, the Patriots kept hearing about how good he was.

"It was getting kind of tiring," Law said. "I

UMass limps through break

By MIKE MARZELLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Heading into winter break on the heels of a disappointing 2-4 record, third-year UMass coach Steve Lappas saw the potential for the Massachusetts men's basketball team to turn things around after what amounted to a disappointing start to the season, which included a 90-50 shellacking at the hands of Texas Tech, a heartbreaking 76-75 overtime defeat at Boston College and a bad 72-66 loss to Hartford.

With a trio of winnable games prior to their annual clash with top-ranked Connecticut, and a pair of home games to open the Atlantic 10 portion of their schedule, the Minutemen appeared to have an inside track on the road to respectability — a road they've been trying to navigate for the better part of three years.

However as Lappas soon found out, things did not go at all as planned, as the Minutemen recorded victories in their initial three contests before dropping six in a row to fall to 5-10, 0-4 in A-10 play as of Jan. 20.

Beginning wintersession play without the services of injured top recruit Art Bowers, it was classmate Maurice Maxwell who paced the Minutemen in an 83-65 trouncing of Marshall in Amherst.

The Philadelphia native poured in a team-high 19 points and sophomore forward Rashaun Freeman continued to impress with 18 points and 10 rebounds.

The Maroon and White then evened their record at 4-4 with a hard-fought 67-60 win over Maine at the Mullins Center in which Freeman scored a career-high 23 points and grabbed six boards on his way to being named Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week for the third time.

With things seemingly on the upswing, the Minutemen carried their solid play into a third-straight contest at the Mullins Center with a chance to climb above .500 for the first time since opening night, and did not disappoint.

Riding another solid performance from Freeman (a game-high 22 points and 10 rebounds) and the return of Bowers (13 points) to significant action, the Minutemen opened up a 45-21 halftime lead and never trailed, cruising to an 82-66 victory over Albany.

Ups and downs

By ANDREW MERRITT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After one of the finest starts in the program's history, with a 9-2-1 record over the first 12 games, a cold streak was all but expected for the Massachusetts hockey team.

That cool-down came in the month of December, where the Minutemen went winless (0-1-3), and began the winter break on a sour note with a 5-3 dismantling at the hands of Harvard. By the end of 2003, the sheen on UMass' season had worn off, and the long Hockey East schedule ahead loomed a little larger than before.

To make matters worse, the injury bug that had mostly ignored the Minutemen all season finally began to catch up. Greg Mauldin suffered a scary injury after a collision at UMass Lowell on Jan. 3 that sent him to an area hospital. He is expected to return soon, but has not played since the incident. The Mauldin-Stephen Werner combination has also missed its 20-02-03 center, Matt Anderson, who has not played a game all season due to a shoulder injury.

Though it was unrelated to injury, Chris Capraro also missed five games before returning to the lineup for Jan. 16's 3-0 loss at Maine.

It didn't get much better, at least not right away. While a 5-2 win at UMass Lowell on Oct. 11 gave all the appearances that the Alumni Cup would be headed to Amherst, the River Hawks voiced their opposition in the first series of the new year. Lowell trounced the Minutemen in the two-game set, shutting them out in both games. Chris Davidson made 25 saves in the first game, and Elias Godoy scored twice to lead Lowell past UMass. The next night in Amherst featured a much more even matchup, but Godoy again made the headlines, scoring the only goal Davidson 127 saves would need with 5:20 to go in the second.

"In the second Lowell game, we played as well as we possibly could," UMass coach Don Cahoon said.

Mired in an eight-game winless streak, the Minutemen needed a boost, and that boost came with the return of Stephen Werner, fresh off a gold-medal winning trip to Finland with the U.S. National Junior Team in the IIHF World Junior Championships.

Werner scored five goals in the tournament including two shorthanded goals and a game winner — and then notched two assists in his first game back with the Minutemen, as UMass defeated Boston University at BU's Walter Brown Arena for the first time in history on Jan. 7.

"At BU, we completely shut them down, and we managed

An addict confesses

By Bob McGovern

My name is Bob, and I'm addicted to fantasy sports.

I'm one of those online sports junkies that keep the same name (Southern Comfort), and play in the same leagues year in and year out. It's a second life to us, one that puts the most avid sports fans in the seat of a General Manager.

We wake up and go to sleep with our teams, making the slightest alterations in hopes of achieving any cyber-GM's dream; a championship and the ultimate bragging rights.

As technology increases so does the virtual reality of fantasy sports. It has gotten to the point where we are so involved with how our teams are chosen, that when it is all said and done we feel like these players are actually ours.

The interactive online draft has added a whole new angle to the majesty that is fantasy. Members of the league know the day of the draft like it's their birthday; we cancel appointments and put a hold on our outside lives for the hour or so that it takes to build our franchise.

When the day comes we talk about the potential picks, ameliorating certain player's abilities, hoping to sway the opinion of one of the rival GMs. We lie with a straight face normally reserved for an intense poker match, deep down we think we know what the others are thinking.

Then it begins.

The away messages go up and all programs are shut down, aside from the small manila drafting screen and the stat page you're using to cram. You see where you're team's pick is in relation to the others and then the paranoia begins to set in.

You wonder who is going to pick whom, and the clicking of your roommate's keyboard sounds so devious. You know he's working on something, he sees something that you didn't, there is some tiny fact, stat, or injury that was overlooked and now ... it's too late.

First pick goes, it's a gimme, then again so are most of the first round picks. Then it's your turn, the clock on the top left of the draft board turns yellow and your name sits atop a timer, ticking down second by pressure-building second.

The first pick seems obvious, the player you hoped would fall has fallen, and now he sits there on your screen begging to be picked. To click and move on would be so easy, but you begin to wonder why he fell to you, why he wasn't someone else's priority. Then you think, "Is this the one that is going to carry my team?"

The chat room that is part of the draft board begins to light up with two-faced encouragement, and the others begin to push for a move. You ignore and highlight that certain someone that, with the click of the mouse, immediately becomes one of your favorite players.

It's done, you got him and now the team has its mighty captain. Switching your attention down to the GM chatter, there is a slew of comments varying from, "nice pick bro," to, "no! That's who I wanted." The draft goes on and you're off the hot seat for the moment, there is a little more time for analysis before round two.

Each round brings a different set of variables, a new position to fill with a candidate surrounded by self-imposed question marks. Every time the yellow box beckons the anxiety sets in, it's crunch time all over again.

You go up and down your lineup, looking at the starting team, checking out the potential stars, and it looks good. The names just seem to jump off the screen as, "your," players seem to have that special virtual chemistry that champions are made of.

After the final pick there is silence in the chat room and cautiously you put the mouse over the X in the top right corner of the draft board. One last glance, then it's gone, the season has officially begun and its time to set up the roster.

The roommates emerge from their offices, gather in the small college apartment living room (which is the main forum for sports talk), and discuss. Everyone knew I was going to be in for some action, and I was looking forward to it."

Pats are Super Bowl bound after AFC title

PATS from C1

The Patriots scored on their first drive, then Indianapolis seemed poised to do the same thing before Rodney Harrison picked off Manning in the end zone with 3:26 left in the first quarter.

"It kept them from making the game real close at that point," Belichick said. "It saved us points, so it was a huge play."

The Patriots drove for a field goal that made it 10-0. Then Law picked off Manning on the Colts' next play from scrimmage, reaching out for the ball with his right hand and tipping it back to his body.

Law came through again late in the third quarter with a diving interception that helped protect a 21-7 lead. His third pick came midway through the fourth.

"He went out and proved he's the best corner in the league," said Rodney Harrison, who last went to the Super Bowl as a rookie special teams player with the Chargers in 1995.

"We were really ticked off because no one gave us credit," he said. "It was all about Peyton Manning. To go out and pick, pick, pick a guy that everybody was building up ... it was huge for us."

Law had six interceptions during the regular season, when he made his fourth Pro Bowl — and third in a row. But the season didn't start off very well for him when good friend and fellow defensive back Lawyer Milloy was cut five days before the opener.

Law lashed out at Belichick, and the Patriots lost to Milloy's new team, the Buffalo Bills, 31-0. It wasn't just that his friend was gone: The move was seen as a signal to Law, who is due to cost the Patriots more than $9 million against the salary cap next year and could be headed for a similarly tough negotiation.

If so, he made a good case that he's worth it.

"There's probably going to have to be a decision made as far as my future," Law said. "The best thing I can do as far as negotiating is go out there and play football. Hopefully, I'll be here for the long haul. If I have to leave, I want to go out as a champion."

Ricky Manning Jr. had three interceptions, and the defense made Donovan McNabb miserable, forcing the superstar quarterback out of the game with bruised ribs.

"The defense played lights out," Panthers quarterback Jake Delhomme said. "It's a huge team win, and that's what this is about."

Look familiar?

The Patriots beat Indianapolis 24-14 in the AFC championship game the same way, harassing co-MVP Peyton Manning into his worst game of the season. Ty Law also had three interceptions, and Jarvis Green had three of their four sacks.

"I'm going to try not to think about the Patriots tonight so I can at least get some sleep," Delhomme said. "I don't want to think about that defense just yet."

Now the Super Bowl in Houston features two defensive teams with consistent quarterbacks. Manning and McNabb may have grabbed all the headlines, but Tom Brady and Delhomme are the only quarterbacks left playing.

Carolina, known mostly for its off-field problems until this season, cruised to the NFC South title. It all happened just two seasons after one of the most disastrous finishes in NFL history.

The final game to close it out was against New England on Jan. 6, 2002 – the last regular-season meeting between the two teams.

The Patriots won 38-6 to wrap up the AFC East title and hand the Panthers their record 15th consecutive loss in front of a nearly empty stadium. George Seifert was fired the next morning, while the Patriots went on to win the Super Bowl, with Brady leading the way.

This season, Brady finished third to Steve McNair and Peyton Manning in the MVP voting, and he did enough against the Colts, going 22-of-36 for 227 yards and a touchdown.

The more impressive statistic: Brady is undefeated in five playoff appearances and 39-12 in his first 51 starts.

"Tom Brady is the greatest winner in football right now," Law said. "I want to go out there with Tom Brady. With all due respect to Steve and Peyton, winning is the card that trumps everything."

Both teams know how to win with defense. The Panthers have one of the best lines in the league with ends Mike Rucker and Julius Peppers, tackles Kris Jenkins, an All-Pro, and Brentson Buckner, thanks to defensive-minded coach John Fox.

"We know they've got a great defense, especially their front seven. They've got some very dynamic players up front," Belichick said. "We've got our work cut out for us."

Unlike the Patriots, the Panthers have a standout running game with offseason acquisition Stephen Davis, who finished third in the NFC with 1,444 yards rushing.

New England overcame early injuries on defense and the loss of Lawyer Milloy to stymie its opponents. Its only Pro Bowl selections were on defense: Richard Seymour, Law and Willie McGinest, who was added as an injury replacement at linebacker.

Brady becoming the next Montana

By Jim Litke
Associated Press

FOXBOROUGH — Too bad the nickname is taken.

"Tom Cool" will never have quite the same ring as "Joe Cool," yet Patriots quarterback Tom Brady hardly suffers in any other comparison with a young Joe Montana.

Brady already has the icy stare down and now, despite just three seasons as a starter, he's also displayed the kind of big-game temperament and level-headed leadership that come along only once or so in every NFL generation.

On Jan 18., Brady combined those qualities with smart reads and an accurate short-passing game to send a chill down the spine of the Indianapolis defense that was every bit as uncomfortable as the snowy New England winter. Last Sunday, he did the same to Tennessee. That means the two quarterbacks who finished ahead of Brady in MVP balloting, the Colts' Peyton Manning and the Titans' Steve McNair, would trade places with him now – in a heartbeat.

Brady is headed to his second Super Bowl two weeks from now; bet against him in Houston at your own risk.

He hasn't lost a playoff game in five tries, going back to his cold-blooded championship run in 2001. That fifth win also gave him the third-best career start for any playoff quarterback, nudging him past Montana and Jeff Hostetler, who both won their first four tries.

"The guy is building a legacy for himself," said tight end Christian Fauria, one of eight Pats to catch at least one throw from Brady.

Teammate Ty Law thought that assessment was almost too modest.

"Tom Brady is the greatest winner in football right now," he said. Asked to compare his quarterback with McNair and Manning, whom Law intercepted three times, the cornerback readily endorsed his fellow Michigan Wolverine:

"What do stats mean when you're sitting at home?" Law said. "I want to go out there with Tom Brady. With all due respect to Steve and Peyton, winning is the card that trumps everything."

Brady was far from flawless, except when it mattered.

He misfired twice on the opening drive, but kept it going by running a gutsy 2-yard sneak when Patriots coach Bill Belichick took a huge gamble just 90 seconds into the game on a fourth-and-1 at his own 44. Then, as Brady found his rhythm, he began alternating passes to Deion Branch and David Givens, finishing the drive with a 7-yard toss to Givens that produced the Pats' only touchdown all day.

Though Brady drove the Patriots inside Indianapolis' 10-yard line four more times, they were forced to settle each time for a field goal.

"Obviously, we left a lot of points out there. But we're working on it," Brady said through a crooked smile and several days' growth of beard. "We're working on it."

Despite his boyish looks, Brady, at 26, already has the heart of an assassin. His winning percentage as a starter stacks him alongside all-time leader Roger Staubach and he's a very cool 14-1 in games decided by seven points and fewer, a number that puts him in Montana's neighborhood.

But he wasn't about to be drawn into any comparisons.

"The only person I care about proving myself to is myself and my coach," Brady said. "Everybody else doesn't matter."

Still, he's been impressing almost everybody he plays alongside or against since his days at Junipero High School in San Mateo, Calif., where NFL Hall of Famer Ozzie Smith and San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds also began their careers. Brady went 20-5 at Michigan, but somehow failed to convince the pro scouts.

He fell to the Pats with the 199th pick of the 2000 draft, a quirk that has a lot of personnel "experts" shaking their heads to this

Junior Chris Chadwick has seen the Minutemen struggle mightily in his first season in Amherst.

UMass continues to struggle

MEN'S HOOP from C1

"Three consecutive wins give you some confidence back," Lappas said. "We finally felt like we were starting to play good basketball heading into our toughest game of the year."

The confidence surely took a hit two nights later, however, as archrival and No. 1 Connecticut proved to UMass why it is the country's elite team.

Led by a seemingly unconscious 34-point effort from guard Ben Gordon that saw the All-American shoot 7-of-8 from three-point range, the Huskies cruised to a 91-67 victory before a sellout crowd at the Hartford Civic Center.

"They showed why they're the number one team in the country," Lappas said. "They've got talent and size everywhere, and were just the better team tonight."

Jeff Viggiano was the lone bright spot for UMass, as he recorded a career-high 22 points.

Back at 500, the Minutemen then returned to the Mullins Center for another difficult test – this time with SEC power Tennessee (5-3).

With a season-best crowd of 5,041 on hand, the Minutemen put forth a valiant effort against the Volunteers but ultimately came up just short, bowing 74-66 in their final tune-up before A-10 play.

Guard Scooter McFadgon led UT with 22 points, while backcourt partner C.J. Watson added 14 points.

Gabe Lee had 23 points for UMass.

"We just didn't have enough," Lappas said. "I thought we played well at times, but when we didn't play as well, that's when it hurt us.

Sitting at 5-6, UMass was set to begin its Atlantic 10 docket with home games against La Salle and George Washington, before hitting the road to face St. Bonaventure and Duquesne.

The unraveling was about to begin.

Despite taking a one-point lead three times in the second half against the Explorers, reigning A-10 Rookie of the Year Gary Neal scored 23 of his 26 points in the second half, as La Salle got UMass off on the wrong foot in conference play, winning 78-64.

Anderson had 20 points for the Maroon and White and Freeman added 12.

The Minutemen then continued their struggles three nights later, as old nemesis GW easily slipped past UMass 76-61 behind 17 points from Tamal Forchion.

The Maroon and White were dominated early, falling behind 12-0 and unable to recover despite 19 points from Freeman and 11 apiece from Bowers and Lee.

UMass was then faced with its first road trip of the young A-10 season, as Olean, N.Y. was first on the itinerary and proved to be another tough contest.

Despite playing their closest league game of the season, it was Patrick Lottin's 22 points that paced St. Bona past UMass 77-71.

All-conference point guard Marques Green added 15 points and six assists as the Bonnies snapped a five-game losing streak.

The Minutemen did receive solid performances from Anderson (26 points eight rebounds) and Freeman (19 points), but packed their bags for Pittsburgh, Pa. losers of five in a row.

Things did not get any better for UMass in the Keystone State, however, as Duquesne dropped the Maroon and White to 0-4 in conference play with an 88-62 win.

Freeman again paced the Minutemen with 16 points, but Jack Higgins had a career-high 24 points, including six three-pointers as the Dukes broke out early, 3-5 deadlock and never trailed.

"This is obviously not where we want to be," Lappas said. "We're not playing like we're capable of, and we just don't have any confidence anymore."

"We have a lot of things to figure out, and unless we figure them out quickly things are not going to get any better.

Ups and downs for hockey

HOCKEY from C1

to score a couple of goals as well," Cahoon said.

Nick Kuiper scored at 9:02 of the first period, and then Craig MacDonald tallied the eventual game-winner on the power play at 14:43 of the second. Gabe Winer made 22 stops in the effort, and Werner earned Hockey East Player of the Week honors for his efforts both abroad and in Boston.

"With Stephen in the lineup in the first Lowell game, it wouldn't have made a difference," Cahoon said of the Chevy Chase, Md. native. "In the second game, it might have been the difference. But he's playing at a heightened level for us now, since the junior tournament he's raised his level."

"The biggest factor [in the team's struggles] is the lineup, which has been completely decimated," Cahoon said. "We had Greg Mauldin, Stephen Werner, and Chris Capraro out at one time or another, as well as a host of other guys who have been out."

The Minutemen have also been hurt by a smaller scoring output from defenseman Thomas Pöck. He scored two goals against Vermont, in a 5-5 tie in the final game of the Sheraton/BankNorth Classic in Burlington, Vt., but the blue liner with the white-hot slapshot is now being treated with kid gloves by opposing teams.

"Now, people are paying a lot of attention to Tommy," Cahoon said. "They've been able to shut down Pöck. So, we've had to do some things to create room for him."

On the bright side, UMass ended the winter session on a high note, with a 1-0 defeat of the Black Bears in the third and final game of the teams' regular season series. Marvin Degon scored at 8:56 of the first period, and Gabe Winer made 22 saves to hand the Black Bears their first home shutout since the 1999-2000 season.

With the win, the Minutemen finish the break with an 11-7-5 overall record, and are 7-5-2 in Hockey East.

"The funny thing is, we've played fairly well with an undermanned team," Cahoon said. "We played very well in the second game against Lowell. We just need all of our artillery, we just need to generate offense until [everyone is healthy.] You can't make chicken soup out of chicken bones."

Cahoon also hinted at the possibility of Anderson's return. While the sophomore has been skating since November, it is unclear whether he will be able to come back to game shape this season.

Still, Cahoon said, "there's always that distant hope."

UMass returns to action tomorrow night, when it hosts the Northeastern Huskies. It's the first game of a trio of Hockey East clashes, all at the Mullins Center.

St. Joe's on a torrid run

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

The last time an Atlantic 10 men's basketball team began a season 15-0 was 1996, when John Calipari's Massachusetts Minutemen began the season 26-0 en route to a 35-2 overall record and a berth in the NCAA Final Four.

This season, however, it's the St. Joseph's Hawks who have "Refused to Lose."

Behind the stellar play of point guard Jameer Nelson and backcourt mate Delonte West, the Hawks are off to a perfect start despite playing the sixth-toughest schedule in the nation, according to the Jan. 12 RPI report.

Prior to this year, the best start for any St. Joe's team was 11 straight wins, which the 1914-15 squad ripped off to begin its campaign.

The Hawks have now also climbed to No. 6 in the latest Associated Press poll, the highest ranked team to ever call Hawk Hill home since the 1965-66 squad ascended as high as No. 5 in the national polls.

They have also been ranked for nine consecutive weeks, the longest stretch of its kind for St. Joe's since the '65-66 squad was ranked all 16 weeks of its season.

It is also the highest ranking for an A-10 school since Temple was rated No. 5 in the final 1999-00 poll.

Flying High

While St. Joe's has garnered the majority of the attention from the national media regarding the A-10, last season's conference tournament champion Dayton has put together the makings of a very successful season under coach Brian Gregory.

The Flyers, who began the season by winning the EA Sports Maui Invitational, are perfect in A-10 play at 4-0, and lead the conference's West Division.

At 14-3 overall, UD is receiving votes for the Top 25 in both national polls, but was hurt by a pair of losses to Conference USA schools Cincinnati and Saint Louis, including an 82-53 dismantling at the hands of the Bearcats, as well as a difficult two-point defeat at the hands of Wyoming.

Double the Fun

Richmond's Mike Skrocki is enjoying a career year – at least to start.

With his 17-point performance against Temple on January 17, the senior forward and All-A-10 performer has scored in double figures in 17 consecutive games, bettering his own personal mark of 15 straight set during his sophomore season of 2001-02.

First-year phenom

Massachusetts sophomore forward Rashaun Freeman, who sat out his freshman year as an academic non-qualifier, is an early odds-on favorite to be the first Minuteman to garner A-10 Rookie of the Year honors since teammate Anthony Anderson did so in 2001-02.

A four-time A-10 Rookie of the Week, Freeman is the only first year player in the conference to lead his team in both scoring (15.1) and rebounding (8.1).

Quality In Everything We Do

Men's indoor set for return

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Coming off his best fall season as a coach, Massachusetts indoor track coach Ken O'Brien hopes his men will carry that momentum into their first indoor season since the program was cut in 2002.

"We're suffering a few losses from last year," O'Brien said. "The returners looked good in the fall season. I just hope everybody has taken care of themselves over the four-week break."

Undoubtedly the biggest loss is sprinter Kwesi Frimpong-Boatang. Last spring, Frimpong-Boatang finished seventh at the first-ever NCAA East Regional in Fairfax, Va., and won gold medals in the 100-meter and 200-meter dash at the Atlantic-10 Outdoor Championships.

To compensate for the losses, O'Brien will be looking to many of his athletes, young and old, to fill in. Captaining the indoor squad will be seniors John O'Neill and Dave Falvey.

"They've done a great job keeping the team focused," O'Brien said. As a sophomore in 2002, multi-event runner O'Neill was UMass' third-leading scorer with 36 3/4 points, won the A-10 Outdoors decathlon title with 5,796 points, placed third in the New England Championships decathlon with a personal-best 5,941 points, and recorded the fourth-best 500-meter time in school history at the New Englands with 1:04.41. Sprinter Falvey will look to make this year's indoor season as good as the last one.

In 2002, Falvey was the lead-off runner in a 4x100 team that finished fourth at the A-10 Outdoors, finished eighth in the 400 at the A-10 Indoors with a time of 51.08, and was a member of the Minutemen's fastest 4x100 and 4x400 teams.

Both O'Neill and Falvey will be counted on to score points in the middle-distance events. The biggest asset to this team will be its depth, and that certainly can be said about the jumpers, one of the stronger units on the team.

"Everyone is back, and looks solid," O'Brien said. "I'm going to be looking to them to help out quite a bit."

Junior Derek Swart will lead this young, but sound unit. As a freshman in 2002, Swart finished sixth in the long jump at the A-10 Indoors with a jump of 21-1 1/2.Another noteworthy jumper is junior sprinter/jumper Joseph McCormack. As a freshman in 2002, McCormack finished seventh in the 200-meter dash at the A-10 Outdoor in 22.1 seconds, and also placed ninth in the high jump at the meet.

"Joseph is our most versatile athlete," O'Brien said. "He can score points in a lot of events, especially the triple jump and long jump. I'm going to try resisting the urge to overuse him, because he is going to need breaks with the events he does."

O'Brien will also rely on sophomore James Godinho, junior Mike Carr, and freshman Tyler Simpson to carry the load in those events. Another deep unit lies in the long distance. "We've got lots of backup strength in those events," O'Brien said. "We're going to need someone to step up as a frontrunner."

That frontrunner might end up being junior Jon Korhonen. This will be his first season in indoor, having not run in 2002. Korhonen did, however, place fifth that year in the 5,000-meter event at the A-10 Outdoors.

Relentless pursuit

No rest for the weary women

By Leah Wyner
Collegian Staff

Not every student at the University of Massachusetts has the luxury of a relaxed, five-week long winter break.

The members of the women's indoor track team never miss a beat in their training regime. After a short break during finals, the Minutewomen began a grueling schedule of workouts — that is, if running only five times a week instead of six can rightfully be referred to as a break.

Once they arrived at home, their three weeks of freedom were filled with distance runs, interval training, speed workouts, drills, hill workouts, technique work, and weight training.

The Maroon and White then returned to UMass for the remaining two weeks of vacation.

The students that lived off-campus simply moved in early, while those that resided on campus stayed in the Campus Center Hotel, eating their meals together on the 10th floor. UMass coach Julie LaFreniere does the important job of arranging the living situations; by handpicking the roommates, she does her best to promote team bonding.

"I assign roommates and try to put athletes from different event areas together," LaFreniere said. "It's so they can get to know and appreciate what someone from a totally different event area does for training, etc."

The entire team trains twice a day, both at 10 a.m. and after lunch at 2 p.m. In between, "they have time to relax together," LaFreniere said.

According to LaFreniere, the intersession training period in itself plays an integral role in team bonding and building unity, because when school is in session, the athletes train at different venues and at many different times of the day, and may not get to know their teammates as well as they would like to.

Ideally, LaFreniere would like to see the team training uniformly at an established time every day during the year.

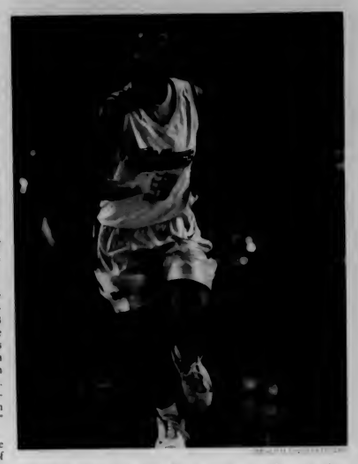
"[The separated training schedules] are basically because of our lack of facilities, and also due to class conflicts," LaFreniere said.

But at least for the two weeks before the semester officially begins, the team is together. In fact, with the recent inclement weather, they were more together than LaFreniere had anticipated. When the temperatures hit — negative-40 degrees with the wind chill factored in, LaFreniere was presented with a problem.

"I had the distance kids and the sprinters do a workout together in the pool, because it was too cold to go outside with wind chills of negative-40," she said.

As for the team-bonding angle, the weather only helped.

"I think that is probably one of the few times they have done a workout together," LaFreniere said.



Given the weather, and the facilities, the team has been doing extremely well. LaFreniere has been working with both sprinters and distance for the past weeks, and was very pleased with the results.

"Judging from this past week of training, both groups came back to campus in very good condition," LaFreniere said. "So far, everyone's attitudes and work ethics have been great."

Next up for the Minutewomen is the Husky Invitational in Boston on Friday.

Slam dunked

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

Judit Zsedenyi is the lone Minutewoman currently posting double-digit points per game. She is averaging 10.8 points per contest.

It's funny how an instant can encompass an entire team's frustration.

For the Massachusetts women's basketball team, that instant took place in the first half of its game against conference rival St. Bonaventure on Jan. 18.

The Bonnies, who were previously 0-8 at the Mullins Center, were putting a full-court press on the Minutewomen. Due to a lack of communication, UMass point guard Cleo Foster got trapped and was forced to burn a timeout. Visibly frustrated, she stormed off the court and slammed the ball on the ground.

UMass never bounced back.

The Minutewomen lost the game 70-58, continuing their winter slump. UMass has gone 2-8 during the winter break, with one more game to play before students return to campus, and has fallen victim to the frustrations of a team with more questions than answers.

"I think right now we're underachieving. I think we lack emotion and I'm a emotional coach," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said.

One bright spot for the Minutewomen has been the play of senior guard Judit Zsedenyi, who is the only member of the team scoring in double figures (10.8 ppg).

Zsedenyi has been frustrated with the team's losing ways; she sees a lack of urgency and respect from her teammates as the Minutewomen have lost the cohesion that was evident in the early weeks of the season.

"We don't listen, we don't listen to the coaches at all and there is a lack of discipline and a lack of respect. When you don't listen to your coach everything will fall," Zsedenyi said. "We are not working together, when we won against Vermont, people started working as a unit together."

Dacko is pleased with Zsedenyi's intensity and looks to her to be a leader on the court.

"Judit gives you everything all the time, she works hard, she cuts hard, and she's emotional," Dacko said. "She has the drive and determination to play at the next level. Her teammates look to her and when she has a hard time, no one is picking up the slack."

Earlier in the year UMass brought a different brand of intensity into all of its games. Bodies were frequently on the floor chasing loose balls, but recently the play has been sluggish.

"When you risk it all you risk the chance of leaving at all out there, but at least it's all out there," Dacko said.

Edris Bailey and Brooke Campbell, both junior college transfers in their junior season, have been up and down over the course of the season. Campbell, who was averaging a double-double in the beginning of the season, has watched her production fall as the season has dragged on.

"It's not JuCo anymore so our expectations are higher," Dacko said. "They have to put themselves in position to be the best they can be, but they're not there yet."

Zsedenyi and the other seniors are starting to get frustrated with the direction their final season is heading. Even though her level of play has been escalating, Zsedenyi knows that if the team keeps losing, her statistics will be meaningless.

"I'm happy that I'm getting better, that I can step up, but I'm not happy that we're not winning," Zsedenyi said. "How frustrating is that? When you're on the court for 36 minutes and doing everything you can and still your team cannot win, it's absolutely terrifying."

"Tom never lets his emotions get in the way of the game," Pats tackle Matt Light said.

Except once: In 1981, Brady's father took him to see the 49ers playoff game in nearby San Francisco that was decided by an improbable Montana-to-Dwight-Clark touchdown hookup now known, majestically, as "The Catch." Brady missed it and still regrets it.

has a good team on paper, but the question that arises is whether or not it is a good fantasy team.

The difference between the two is so vast that it can be confusing to the non-experienced GM. If you were told that Andrei Kirilenko was better than either Vince Carter or Kobe Bryant, you would have to laugh. In the world of fantasy, Kirilenko is king, and players like Carter and Bryant are good, but should be second options.

To explain this would be another column in and of itself but to those that play, you understand.

Well it looks like TJ Ford had another good night; I better pick him up before someone else does. Maybe after I'll post a message because I'm beating Scotty this week, and man it feels good.

UMass funds increase in Romney plan

By KEN MAGUIRE
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON (AP) — Gov. Mitt Romney wants to double spending on the Commonwealth College honors program at the University of Massachusetts, a pet project of William Bulger's that the governor tried to eliminate last year along with Bulger's job as president of the UMass.

Six months after Bulger resigned as head of the state's university, Romney has dropped his efforts to eliminate the presidency. He submitted a proposed budget for the next fiscal year that increases spending to UMass and embraces the Commonwealth College honors program.

The program was created by Bulger to allow top students to conduct research. Romney's budget proposal released yesterday would double spending on the program to $3.4 million.

Under the governor's proposed budget, he also announced plans to increase K-12 spending by just over 3 percent, to $3.6 billion. That should allow most school districts to maintain current spending, as opposed to 20 percent reductions in the current fiscal year.

Spending on public higher education, meanwhile, would increase by nearly 10 percent, to $863 million — still short of the $1 billion spent two years ago.

Unlike last year, there's no proposal to eliminate the UMass presidency, nor privatize any campuses.

"He's sort of learned a little something," said Paul Schlichtman, head of the Massachusetts Association of School Committees. "I commend the governor for looking at aid numbers that are realistic in the political sphere."

Bulger, the former state Senate president, headed UMass for eight years before resigning under political pressure last August. He was widely criticized for his lack of cooperation with a congressional investigation into the FBI's handling of mob informants, including his brother, fugitive mobster James "Whitey" Bulger.

Bulger established Commonwealth College in 1999. The program, which also teaches leadership and encourages community involvement, has 2,000 students.

In a statement, interim UMass President Jack Wilson said the proposal recognizes the university's contribution to the state's economic and social development.

The Republican governor also proposed offering scholarships for top scorers on the MCAS exams.

Students scoring in the top 25 percent by their junior year would have their tuition waived at any state college, for either two- or four-year programs. Also, those in the top 10 percent would receive a $2,000 annual bonus to defray the cost of fees under the governor's plan. The program is estimated to cost $12 million next year.

As expected, Romney's budget would also expand charter schools by eliminating caps on enrollment.

The increases in K-12 spending includes $40 million targeted to districts that score poorly on MCAS. It proposes funding for full-day kindergarten, and parent-preparation classes, along with after-school and summer tutoring.

Governor releases budget plan

By STEVE LEBLANC
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON (AP) — Gov. Mitt Romney, hoping the second time's the charm, unveiled a $22.98 billion budget plan yesterday that revives many of his banner proposals that failed to win legislative backing last year.

Romney is again pressing his case to merge the Massachusetts Turnpike Authority with the state highway department. He's renewing calls to fold the Boston Municipal Court into the district court system and eliminate the Inspector General's office. Yet again, he's looking to increase how much state employees pay for health insurance.

If lawmakers don't embrace the reforms, Romney said, they must raise taxes, make deeper spending cuts, or reject many of his proposals to invest in the state's children and the poor in a budget already projected to be facing a $1.2 billion gap.

"It will be different this year," Romney said. "The Legislature responds to what the public at large feels, and I believe that the Legislature is hearing that if we don't see reforms, then we're not going to be able to make those key investments."

The Republican governor said his budget plan anticipates a 3 percent growth in spending over the current fiscal year, assuming the Turnpike takeover. The proposed budget for the 2005 fiscal year, which begins July 1, avoids using the state's dwindling reserves and includes no new taxes, but would increase fees by about $16.5 million.

A key part of Romney's plan is an overhaul of the state pension system. Romney said his plan, which will not affect current retirees, places a cap on the pension an employee can receive based on a true reflection of the employee's earnings over the course of their career, rather than relying on the employee's three top earning years to calculate the pension.

But tucked away in the budget plan are dozens of cuts. Romney's plan would end funding for a suicide prevention program, eliminate a prostate cancer prevention initiative, cut in half funding for a teen pregnancy prevention program, cut $5 million in water and sewer rate relief, eliminate a school-based health program, and cut $15 million from programs for the mentally retarded.

Human service programs, which typically represent about half the state budget, would see their spending grow by $523 million, from $10.6 billion to $11.1 billion. Health and human service advocates say the increase still falls about $300 million shy of what is needed to maintain current services.

Although the budget would not cut eligibility for Medicaid recipients, it would reduce Medicaid payments to hospitals and other providers by $150 million. The budget would also reduce the state's contribution to a fund that covers uninsured patients who seek hospital care.

"This is a real step backward," said Ron Hollander, president of the Massachusetts Hospital Association. "This puts pressure on hospitals that are still very fragile."

Since 1986, the number of acute care hospitals in Massachusetts has dropped from 115 to 67.

Health and Human Services Secretary Ron Preston said the reductions are difficult but necessary if the state wants to protect the most vulnerable.

"None of these are things we take any pleasure in," he said.

State aid to cities and towns, which saw deep reductions last year as the state grappled with a $5 billion budget deficit, is level-funded in most categories in Romney's budget, with a slight increase for basic education funding.

"There's a lot of pain out there, but the governor's budget is certainly an improvement over what was proposed last year," said Geoffrey Beckwith, President of the Massachusetts Municipal Association.

Michael Widmer of the Massachusetts Taxpayer Foundation called the budget "very lean" and the governor's reliance on $500 million in one-time revenues "questionable from a fiscal point of view."

The president of the Massachusetts Bar Association (MBA) criticized Romney's decision to base funding for the trial court in part on a near doubling of what the courts collect in fees and revenues.

"Too much of this budget is dependent upon collecting more monies from less-advantaged individuals who must resort to the courts to seek justice," said MBA President Richard C. Van Nostrand.

eBay-UMass theft case resolved

By DAN O'BRIEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A former University of Massachusetts employee admitted to a judge in Hampshire Superior Court on Dec. 20 that he stole thousands of dollars worth of UMass laboratory equipment and then resold the items on the Internet.

Daniel Hunt, 39, of 197 River Road in Whatley pleaded guilty to 10 counts of receiving stolen property, 10 counts of breaking and entering in the daytime to commit a felony, 11 counts of larceny from a building and one count of breaking and entering in the nighttime to commit a felony.

Hunt worked at the University for 19 years as a fire safety officer and asbestos abatement expert for the Physical Plant before his arrest. He had keys to many campus buildings.

After an eight-month investigation, the University of Massachusetts Police Department suspected that the stolen items were being resold online. The UMPD got their big break on March 28, when a rare piece of equipment that was reported missing appeared the next day on eBay.com, an online auction website. Working with eBay's fraud unit, police identified Hunt as their suspect.

Police said the total amount of Hunt's thefts could be over $100,000, and the dollar amount of items he sold on eBay.com could total more than $50,000. According to court papers, one sale alone netted $21,432.

A police search of his home on April 11 turned up no equipment, however, his computer hard drive was confiscated.

UMPD began receiving reports of stolen science equipment in August 2002. Some of the equipment that was reported missing included camera lenses, a micrometer, microscopes, calipers and scales. The missing equipment was stolen from several labs, including those at the Graduate Research Center, Morrill Science Center, Hasbrouck Lab, Chenoweth Lab and the Goodell building.

Ron Grosslein, an engineer for the physics department, was one out of a group of people in the department who discovered a missing item on eBay.com. "I was saddened to find someone ripping off our equipment and affecting our research, but more so that it was a UMass employee," Grosslein said.

He pointed out that a large number of UMass employees, including professors, custodians and emergency officials, have master keys to a number of buildings.

"I'm pleased to be part of an organization where this [type of theft] is rare," he said.

Kerry lines up endorsements; Dean may shake up staff

By RON FOURNIER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON (AP) — John Kerry has a winner's pocketful of money and momentum for a cross-country campaign blitz designed to solidify his standing atop the Democratic presidential field. His rivals must make do with less — and with little time.

Reeling from Kerry's back-to-back thrashings in Iowa and New Hampshire, Howard Dean retreated yesterday to Vermont where he resisted efforts by advisers to scale back his fight-in-every-state ambitions. The former governor also was considering staff changes.

"I think they can get their act together," said Jeff Link, a Dean supporter and strategist to Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin, who has endorsed Dean. "But the hard part is, how do you slow Kerry down after two big wins?"

The same question loomed for Wesley Clark and Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina after they finished 26 percentage points behind Kerry and 14 percentage points behind Dean in New Hampshire. They hope to cherry-pick a victory or two — and some delegates — from the list of seven states holding elections Tuesday.

Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut finished fifth, and ignored the advice of some supporters to drop out. "I got a good start," he said, even as some backers said he was finished.

Kerry pressed his advantage yesterday by preparing to saturate the airwaves with political ads in all seven states — Missouri, Arizona, South Carolina, Oklahoma, New Mexico, Delaware and North Dakota.

He unveiled key endorsements, starting with South Carolina Rep. Jim Clyburn, and worked to secure more proof that the Democratic establishment was falling behind his candidacy. Aides said they expected to bring the governors of Michigan and Arizona into the fold soon.

Still, Kerry has his hurdles to climb. He has not aired ads or visited the states in months. And, as the front-runner, he is now a big target spreading his resources across seven states while rivals choose their spots.

He has adopted the same momentum-building strategy once used by Dean, who racked up endorsements from former Vice President Al Gore and his 2000 rival, Bill Bradley, along with Harkin and two major labor unions.

The high-profile embraces contrasted with Dean's anti-establishment image, slowing a campaign already staggered by the candidate's miscues and his rivals' attacks. Kerry doesn't expect that problem because he hopes to be the establishment candidate, the rallying point for party elite wary of Dean.

That leaves the New Hampshire also-rans little room to maneuver in seven states where voters are just starting to pay attention — with their first sight being a front-running Kerry.

The candidates' problems are compounded by a lack of money. Even Dean, the field's top fund-raiser, has less than $5 million on hand. He has not aired TV ads in any of the seven states this week, and it would cost at least $1.5 million to saturate the airwaves, like Kerry.

Several Dean advisers, speaking on condition of anonymity, said there is not enough time to slow Kerry's momentum before Tuesday.

Court addresses UMass theft case the astronomy department said that the majority of the items stolen from his department were microscope lenses. He mentioned that the way in which the items were stolen made it difficult for people working in his department to notice that they were missing.

"We didn't notice the thefts right away because people swap [the microscope lenses] all the time," he said.

John Machta, head of the physics department, said that the equipment stolen from the physics department was worth about $20,000. Machta also said that the thefts set back student projects.

"It took about two weeks to get the equipment replaced," he said. "Five graduate students were unable to pursue their theses during this period."

He said that the guilty plea has allowed his staff and students in his department to begin to somewhat let their guards down.

"Before he was caught it was pretty intense because we didn't know who did it. It was definitely a damper on morale," he said.

Hunt's sentencing is scheduled for Feb. 4. Assistant Northwestern District Attorney Joseph Quinlan is asking that Hunt serve two and a half years behind bars at the Hampshire Jail and House of Correction and five years of probation upon his release.

Hunt's lawyer, C. Jeffrey Kinder, is asking that his client serve probation and community service, as well as pay restitution.

New budget marks a step in the right direction

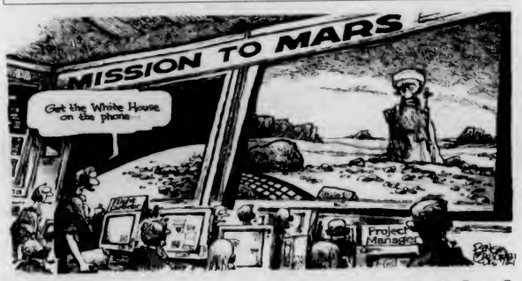
Apparently, public education is no longer on the chopping block here in Massachusetts.

Yesterday, Gov. Mitt Romney announced the Commonwealth's budget for fiscal year 2005, and included in the $22.98 billion are measures to improve spending on education. This includes a twofold increase in spending on the University of Massachusetts' Commonwealth College, as well as an overall increase in higher education spending by nearly 10 percent.

The new budget stands as a strong sign of hope for students, faculty, staff, and supporters of the University, be it the Amherst flagship campus or the other campuses in the eastern part of the state.

It is also a striking reversal of fortune for the state's public education system, which only a year ago was in danger of becoming a casualty of Romney's initial plans for the Commonwealth. Included in this was a proposal to eliminate the president's position at UMass. Though the proposed elimination was likely just a strike against Romney's strongest Democratic foe, former UMass President William Bulger, it also could have had long-lasting, damaging effects on how this institution is run, as well as the value of the diploma that seniors will receive in a few short months.

The measures made in the governor's budget proposal show that there is hope for UMass, as well as all public education in the Commonwealth. Though the final dollar amount falls $147 million short of the number that was allocated for education two years ago, it represents a marked change in the direction that public education is taking in this state. Where the last 18 months have been full of doubt and worry about the fiscal health of UMass, yesterday was a banner day for those who represent this university, be it through teaching, maintenance, or the consumption of the valuable education offered here.



It isn't perfect, though. There is still a lot of work to be done, and although the new education budget is an encouraging sign of the commonwealth's willingness to fund a primary need of its citizens, it still doesn't quite fix what's broken. Among the critics of the new budget is Cathy Boudreau, president of the Massachusetts Teachers Association.

"We're just glad it's not another year of deep cuts ... but it still doesn't provide for real growth, it does not restore programs and funding," Boudreau told the Associated Press.

Indeed, that which has been lost in the massive cuts implemented on the Commonwealth's education budget will not be restored by the new plan. Here at UMass, programs like child-care will not be getting back the funding they lost in the first months of Romney's tenure. That which has been broken has not been fixed yet, and it is up to the UMass community to remain steadfast in its pursuit of the restoration of funds, be it through communication with state legislators, rallies, or any other measures that can show Governor Romney how vital it is to support the state's institution of higher education.

The Daily Collegian applauds this change, though we aren't out of the woods yet, and hopes that this is only the beginning, and not a one-time reprieve for one of the Commonwealth's most valuable and important assets.

MTV's message is one-sided

Erin Lemkey

Along with an inordinate amount of sleeping, this winter break allowed me to indulge in a hearty dose of trash TV: a potent mix that consists of flicking between MTV, VH1, E! and Bravo.

One Saturday morning descended into a three-hour "Real World" marathon — a show I had ceased to watch somewhere around the forgettable Seattle cast. Snippets I've glimpsed since prepared me for the "Real World: San Diego": an unusually gym-toned and stylish bunch of Americans living in an oceanfront mansion. What I was not so prepared for was the conservative politics embedded in Mary Ellis-Bunim and Jonathan Murray's editing and production.

It is clear that MTV's "story of seven strangers" has changed from one with a mixed race, class and sexual orientation narrative to a story of seven beautiful, apolitical, and culturally mainstream individuals whose homogeneity challenge the very concept of being "strangers." This largely reflects the production changes within MTV as a whole. The implications of "The Real World" portrayal of race within current American society are frightening.

The composition of "RW: San Diego" fits well with MTV's new style: five light-skinned folks, a Korean-American girl, and a Morehouse graduate named Jacquese. Jacquese is correct when he identifies as being "put in this situation": "The Real World" has a long tradition of putting one black man into a house with a predominantly "white" culture and community. In this loaded situation, Jacquese has to constantly combat stereotypes of becoming the "angry/sensitive/unsociable/'ghetto' black man." Not surprisingly, his housemates are quick to jump to these stock characterizations in social situations that range from the awkward to the downright racist.

MTV capitalizes off this engineered dynamic (drama = good ratings), and in doing so, makes an attempt to deflate a funny and smart member of the household. Jacquese lacks a social support system, and has to reach out to friends at home and his mother to keep his bearings. This is a difficult task for the only identified "Other" on a veritable island of middle-class white privilege.

The climax of the episode is reached the next evening, when the cast goes out for a night at a local club. Robin is again the focus, as she gets into a fight outside with a man she accuses of calling her a "bitch". Jacquese, seeing Robin upset, pulls her aside to talk about it. Robin admits to having called the man a "nigger", and Jacques shakes his head at the letdown. He attempts to explain the problems of a white person calling a black man "nigger", regardless of the provocation. Frightened either by her own racism or Jacquese's impassioned assertion of self, Robin becomes irrationally defensive, pointing her finger rudely at Jacquese as she rants. This finger pointing is symbolic of a desire to push her problems onto Jacquese, and is a foreshadowing for the way this event will become "his problem." The scene ends with Jacques riding home alone in a taxi, and the white house members crowded into a van to comfort Robin. She has co-opted the spotlight, reframing the event in terms of her own perceived victim-hood.

During the ride home, the rest of the cast reflexively works together to preserve what cultural theorist Noel Ignatiev calls 'the club of white privilege'. Randy, Robin's pending love interest, asks her "why [she] feels sorry for him," bolstering her sense of violation. In a frightening clip, Randy concludes to Robin, "It will be solved," to which she replies, "It'd better be." This edited moment of frightening dialogue harks back to a dark period of U.S. history that "solved" issues of race in criminal ways. The clip suggests that the spirit of that period has not definitely disappeared.

Once in the car, Brad displays knee-jerk white guilt, proclaiming that he "doesn't see the black-white thing." He puts on a style of black speech here that shows that he's "down", even though he's not down enough to ride home with a brother in a time of need. Brad quickly cleanses himself of guilt through apolitical BS, however he fundamentally still supports and stands by Robin.

MTV has a fascinating role in the editing of the rest of this episode, focusing in on Cameron's kindergarten-teacher sympathy for "sensitive" Jacquese as well as the continuing baby-girl drama of Robin (on returning to the house, we see her sucking her thumb while looking dolefully out of the window of their SUV). MTV is quick to come up with a resolution of this "race issue", before it can branch into more complex issues of systemic discrimination and a fundamental culture of white supremacy.

Jacquese forfeits his "struggle for respect" to Robin's show-stealing cry of a past rape. The last scene shows them playing basketball together outside the house, to the accompaniment of Robin's court chants and smooth moves. MTV has packaged the issue of race into an hour-long program, including a cliched handshake between Jacques and Robin as the last clip. Nothing has actually been addressed or solved. What is important here, however, is to realize that MTV's "real world" is in fact a thoroughly constructed one: out of hundreds of hours of videotape and conversation, Ellis-Bunin and Murray have crafted these scenes to create an editorialized narrative. What does this have to do with MTV's politics of race in the United States? Everything.

There is a class being taught this semester called, "Rethinking Race at UMass", that will be questioning fundamentally what we understand about race. This class will be using current race theory, movies, and will also be working with the Office of ALANA Affairs to create events on campus to change the way race is perceived and acted upon in our community.

The man behind the curtain

Mark Ostroff

"How fortunate for leaders that men do not think."
– Adolf Hitler

Last December, the world finally caught a glimpse of the most wanted man in Iraq. In a coffin-sized hole outside Tikrit, the megalomaniac that once held Iraq in terror — Saddam Hussein — was found.

Americans knew him in recent years only in a highly novel sense — as a mysterious dictator, a lover of hats and Russian antiques (of the automatic variety), and a man who went out of his way to teach his two sons the art of torture. He was America's classic bad guy: the kind of guy you could see Superman going after. Brutal, morbidly self-centered, and rich enough to own solid gold Kalishnakov rifles, he was a shining example of the gross excesses of the Third World elite.

But Saddam is no longer sitting on his golden throne. His face no longer graces every billboard. He is just a man who, like most of his people, now understands the poverty and terror with which his regime has plagued the birthplace of civilization. With salt-wound irony, he would wake up every morning only to stare at a monument to his own collapsed ego — one of his many palaces. His feasts now consisted of rotting fruit and Mars candy bars, a luxury by the standards he had set for his own people. Defeated, alone, and destined to die with far less dignity than those who have been killed in his name, he sits now in a cell in an undisclosed location.

To the troops in Iraq that made it possible to carry out this mission and to bring such a man to justice, the world owes more gratitude than the mind can conceive. In the minds of these soldiers, they knew what they were doing was right. They followed orders and tracked down a man who, through his own actions, was more of a cunning beast than any human. I would even say that our troops in Iraq are a shining example to the moral decency that this nation has boasted about since its founding. The troops should, however, be the only ones deserving of this gratitude, for nobody outside of these brave men and women should ever take credit for Saddam's downfall. Not the Bush administration, not the CIA, not even the Pentagon.

When America forgets about those cowards who, in the interest of oil and money, helped this madman rise to power, each and every troop gives their life and service in vain. The men and women of our armed forces were following orders, with limited knowledge of Saddam, outside of Bushian heaven-and-hell rhetoric. In fact, many of these troops were taking orders from people who had once lifted Saddam to the place he had fallen from.

The day that I would congratulate any Washington bureaucrat for this man's capture is the day I would congratulate an arsonist for reporting a fire.

"If Saddam Hussein is indeed a monster, he's a monster that the West helped nurture and protect," reported the Sydney Morning Herald.

The year was 1963. In the name of "fighting totalitarianism," as Sean Hannity paradoxically put it, the CIA helped the Baathists stage a coup against the populist leader of Iraq General Abdul Karim Kassem. According to Britain's Guardian newspaper, the anti-colonialist leader began to nationalize Iraqi oil, placing a burden on American oil interests.

A young, exiled Saddam Hussein had returned after a previously botched coup to attempt a CIA-backed putsch against the Kassem regime. After a successful uprising — compliments of both U.S. taxpayers and a "contingency budget" left over from WWII — General Kassem was tied to a chair and shot in a radio studio. Young Saddam rose through the ranks of the Baath, using the very tactics that saw both Stalin and Hitler rise to power—striking mistrust and terror in his own comrades.

The reign of terror of the so-called "Butcher of Baghdad," got off to a start with the completion of his first political hit list, which just so happened to run perfectly parallel to the CIA's list of what Winston Churchill used to call "uncooperative Arabs."

After the anti-Baathist elements were killed off and buried under the sands of Persia, Jim Critchfield, director of Middle East operations called the developments, "a great victory." "We rode to power on the CIA train," said Ali Saleh Sa'adi, the Baath Party's secretary general.

As late as 1989, one year after Iraqi streets ran with the blood of violently poisoned Kurds, President George H.W. Bush proclaimed, "Normal relations between the United States and Iraq would serve our longer-term interests and promote stability in both the Gulf and the Middle East." Saddam's reign of terror was conveniently irrelevant.

This war has shown us that "evil" is what you make of it. Our own government, the Bush administration, and even the Bush family, have yet to answer for their mistakes. But they seem to have no problem taking credit for sending over 100,000 Americans to the Middle East to repair those mistakes. The hawks of Washington, spending already meager tax income to put on million-dollar PR stunts, gloat over the historical milestones brought about solely by the will and courage of the everyday American.

This only leaves me to say that the day that I would congratulate any Washington bureaucrat for this man's capture is the day I would congratulate an arsonist for reporting a fire.

As long as it serves our interests for the moment, we seem to have no problem overlooking the mass poisoning, the rape, the pillage, and the torture. In fact, Americans should look around the world today and examine the countries that we still support — nations who still commit abuses against their own people, for the benefit of the American way of life. The fact that Americans choose to turn their heads at such atrocities, all for the sake of their own material gain, is a stenchful hypocrisy to what we claim to stand for.

The same people who have condemned Saddam for his actions were the same ones who not only supported him, but gave him money, guns, and yes, weapons of mass destruction to secure their anti-Soviet investment. According to L.A. Weekly, a 1991 report by Rep. Sam Gejdenson (D-Conn.) indicated "Between 1985 and 1990, the U.S. government approved 771 licenses for exports of biological agents, high-tech equipment and military items to Iraq."

If America wants to spend its history chasing monsters, it should at least chase after monsters it didn't create. Saddam is gone one down, countless to go.

Don't judge Jackson too quickly

Gilad Skolnick

According to an article in January's Reader's Digest, Will Wright, a contestant in "Wheel of Fortune", had host Pat Sajak jump into his arms and hug him tightly after he won $48,400 on the show. Now he's suing the show for two million dollars, claiming that Pat Sajak's actions have caused a painful back injury, mental anguish and family disruption.

A man in Cincinnati is suing a bar for over a million dollars because he got so drunk that he fell off the stool and hit his head. He claims that it was the barkeeper's fault for not cutting him off. A woman in Atlanta was awarded $220,000 after her dance partner "tried a shag style spin move" and broke her finger. Hazel Norton of Mississippi sued her doctor for giving her a medication to treat heartburn that may cause heart damage in some patients. She even admitted to have never been hurt in any way by the medication. A North Carolina man shot and killed two people and won half a million from his psychiatrist for not insisting that he continue his treatment several months before the murders. At least that was overturned in an appeals court.

I don't care much for Michael Jackson, but it's all too easy to try to accuse someone like him of being a pedophile.

To top that all off, now there's some little boy charging pop star Michael Jackson with child molestation. About a decade ago, Jackson was charged with a similar crime. To have the case dropped, he paid tens of millions of dollars to the accuser. That's quite a hefty sum, enough to pay off a mortgage and even maybe buy a small country or two. Jackson claimed he paid the money to end the case, which he found a humiliating lie. No evidence supporting either side was ever found.

According to CNN, last February, Los Angeles County child welfare officials found there was no evidence Jackson had had "inappropriate contact with the boy." In addition, BBC reports that the boy told social workers that he had not been molested, and there is an audiotape in which the boy and his mother said there had been no inappropriate contact.

I don't care much for Michael Jackson, but it's all too easy to try to accuse someone like him of being a pedophile. He's kind of strange and does some weird things, from the countless nose jobs to his "Neverneverland" amusement park, to dangling his baby over a four-story high balcony. I must admit that even I have been unable to resist making an occasional joke about him, but this looks like this is just another situation in which someone wants a piece of his wealth and he's an easy target.

Even if some evidence does surface that he is guilty of "performing lewd or lascivious acts" on the child, the mental state of the parents of this child comes into question. What kinds of parents send their child to sleep alone in a bed with a sketchy adult male? If Jackson is found guilty of anything, the parents should be charged as well. Not only did they let their child sleep with an adult male, but also they knew that he had been accused of child molestation in the past. This is like if the parents were to drop their child in a lion's cage in a zoo and then press charges on the zoo because their child was mauled, perhaps even demanding that the lion get put to sleep.

It's completely unnatural for unrelated adults to want to sleep alone in the same bed with small children. As much as Michael Jackson should understand that, the parents of the "molested" child should know that even more so. Are they fit to be parents if they're going around letting men who've been accused of pedophilia sleep with their kids?

If Jackson were indeed guilty of the crime, then I wouldn't be opposed to his parents being charged with being an accessory to the crime and neglect. I don't have much respect for Jackson, but it appears that this is just another example of extortion, of someone trying to unjustly take someone else's money. I'm sick of people abusing our judicial system and ruining the lives of others in an effort to get rich quick.

Welcome back to campus! We are looking forward to an exciting spring semester. As you arrive, you will notice some small changes as the university has continued the much-needed work of renovating and repairing the campus and classrooms. The most visible change you are likely to notice is the reduced lines for students picking up excess checks, which will be available in Whitmore in rooms 161B and 163.

We are continuing our efforts to make UMass the strongest and most student-friendly university in the country. As your elected representatives, we share several concerns that are impacting our campus community. During the upcoming SuperBowl and post-game celebrations, we will remain committed to preventing the dangerous behavior that occurred during the baseball playoffs. The Student Government Association (SGA) stands firmly behind all undergraduate students and is here to defend any student wrongly accused of inappropriate or illegal behavior at any time. However, we do not support and can not condone any actions that threaten the safety of anyone on this campus. As some of you may know, the post-game activities after the Red Sox playoff games included illegal and inappropriate actions such as throwing objects at police, turning cars over, and breaking into the Dining Commons, among others.

These activities resulted in costs totaling around $200,000 to the university. In response to this, the university has increased the number of security cameras within the residential areas. Similar cameras already in place last semester were utilized by the police and the Dean of Students and contributed in 23 students being charged criminally and receiving university sanctions which includes suspension or loss of campus housing. The financial costs of these situations are passed directly on to you. If these events continue, eventually, the costs of your housing and dining services will be affected.

If you need assistance, the Student Government Association funds a Judicial Advisors Program, available through the Dean of Student Office (5-2684) or the SGA directly (5-0342). We also employ three attorneys available for legal assistance usually free of charge for undergraduates. They can be contacted at 5-1995 and are located in room 922 of the Campus Center.

For those students wishing to enjoy the SuperBowl outside of the dorms or their apartments, the Student Activities Center will be working in conjunction with Auxiliary Services and the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life to bring energy to the Blue Wall Café. There will be free food and good prizes (honest) and offers a place where those of legal age can enjoy the bar atmosphere with their underage friends.

We work for you! If you have any question, please call or e-mail us at any time.

Nominees announced for Oscars

By David Germain
Associated Press

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. (AP) – Middle-earth crowned its monarch. Now, Academy Awards voters seem ready to crown "The Lord of the Rings: The Return of the King" as the first fantasy to win best picture.

The final chapter of Peter Jackson's trilogy, based on J.R.R. Tolkien's classic set in an imaginary world of hobbits, wizards and elves, took a leading 11 Oscar nominations Tuesday, among them best picture and director.

Key acting nominees included Golden Globe winners Bill Murray as a washed-up actor in "Lost in Translation," Diane Keaton as a down-on-love playwright in "Something's Gotta Give," Charlize Theron as serial killer Aileen Wuornos in "Monster" and Sean Penn as a vengeful father in "Mystic River."

The Napoleonic era naval adventure "Master and Commander: The Far Side of the World" received 10 nominations, including best picture and director for Peter Weir.

The other best-picture nominees were the quirky Tokyo tale "Lost in Translation," the somber vengeance story "Mystic River" and the uplifting horse-racing drama "Seabiscuit."

The biggest surprise was 13-year-old Keisha Castle-Hughes. For her performance as a Maori girl bucking tribal tradition in "Whale Rider," she became the youngest person ever to be nominated for lead actress.

Joining the teen, Keaton and Theron in the best-actress category were Samantha Morton as an Irish mom in New York in "In America," and Naomi Watts as a grieving mother in "21 Grams."

It was the fourth nomination for Keaton, a best-actress winner for 1977's "Annie Hall." Keaton plays an older woman who has closed the door on love, then finds herself pursued by two men in "Something's Gotta Give," which has topped $100 million at the box office.

"It's fantastic for actresses of my generation," Keaton said. "It means we can still be in romantic comedies, and if they're well-written and directed and acted, it works and it makes money."

Along with Law, Penn and Murray, best-actor nominees were Johnny Depp as a wily buccaneer in "Pirates of the Caribbean: The Curse of the Black Pearl," Ben Kingsley as an Iranian immigrant in "House of Sand and Fog," and Jude Law as a Confederate deserter in "Cold Mountain."

Murray is the latest in a string of actors such as Tom Hanks and Robin Williams who earned hard-won respect after a career that began in broad comedy. Academy voters had snubbed Murray for one of 1998's most acclaimed performances in "Rushmore."

Another surprise pick was director Fernando Meirelles for the Brazilian film "City of God."

"Lost in Translation" earned nominations for directing and original screenplay for Sofia Coppola. She was only the third woman ever nominated for director, after Lina Wertmuller for 1976's "Seven Beauties" and Jane Campion for 1993's "The Piano."

"It's pretty unbelievable. I'm happy to be in good company," said Coppola, the daughter of Francis Ford Coppola and the first American woman nominated for

Trio of bands rock out Orpheum

3 Doors Down, Shinedown and Tantric satisfy crowd

By Dan Lamothe
Collegian Staff

BOSTON – In a rock 'n' roll market that has become increasingly saturated with bleak, sorrowful music and snarling rock 'n' roll personas, it's becoming hard to find acts who remember one of the most basic elements of the genre for as long as it has existed – fun.

That wasn't the case at the Orpheum last week, though, as 3 Doors Down took the stage for an energetic, albeit cookie-cutter, 15-song performance that included all of the basic elements of good ol' boy southern rock 'n' roll.

The Escatawpa, Miss. natives came out guitars blazing, weaving material together from their two major studio albums, 2000's "The Better Life" and 2002's "Away From the Sun." Opening with "Duck and Run", the band ripped quickly through several songs primarily from "The Better Life," including the title track for the album and the band's breakthrough hit, "Kryptonite."

All the while, the band showed an onstage confidence that has gradually grown in the band over the last three plus years as the band has continued to tour. Frontman Brad Arnold pumped his fist to the music, dancing a one-legged dance as he kept time with the music. The band pulled out all of the age-old rock 'n' roll gags one could expect to see at a concert, including a seven-minute solo by new drummer Daniel Adair and Arnold throwing his microphone stand across the stage in the middle of a guitar solo.

Musically, 3 Doors seemed polished, but plain on a number of slower songs, especially "Be Like That," a hit from the American Pie 11 soundtrack. Where the band hit their stride was during their upbeat songs, particularly on "When I'm Gone" and a rousing cover of Lynard Skynard's "That Smell"

Shinedown's Smith ready for fame

By Dan Lamothe
Collegian Staff

BOSTON – Brent Smith, the creative force behind one of hard rock's newest breakthrough bands, has had enough.

"I'm just sick and tired of the 'whoa is me' shit," he said before their performance with 3 Doors Down and Tantric last week. "I don't really understand [it]."

Smith is the singer and lyricist for Shinedown, a Jacksonville, Fla., based group that has been catapulted from obscurity to a nationwide tour, thanks in large part to the attention their first single, "It's From the Inside," has received. The song showcases something that's a common thread through nearly all of their debut album, "Leave a Whisper" and something that is still important to Smith: hope.

"I wanted to make a positive record," he said. But I didn't want to sacrifice the lyrical knowing that you have to come from a dark place sometimes, and it's up to you to pull yourself out of it. You really have no one to blame but yourself if you don't."

"It's From the Inside," according to Smith, is about "that unattainable dream."

"It's about having a dream

Boston seduced by 'The Graduate'

Lorraine Bracco stars as sultry Mrs. Robinson

By Joe Piedrafite
Collegian Staff

BOSTON – Summer. Southern California. The 1960's. Benjamin Braddock has just returned from college and much to his parent's dismay, has no idea what he wants to do with his summer, never mind the rest of his life. Spending his days lazing about in the family pool, he becomes involved in a bizarre and chaotic love triangle with the daughter and the wife of his father's business associate, Mr. Robinson. Mrs. Robinson, a bored and sex-starved house wife, seduces and has an affair with Benjamin, only to find out that his true feelings lie not with her, but with her young daughter, Elaine.

'The Graduate'
Colonial Theater
Boston
through Feb. 8

Terry Johnson directed and adapted "The Graduate" for the stage from Charles Webb's 1962 smash novel of the same name. That best selling novel later turned into the classic 1967 film, directed by Mike Nichols and adapted by Buck Henry and Calder Willingham. That definitive coming of age and multi-award winning film skyrocketed the career of Dustin Hoffman, and Anne Bancroft redefined sex and seduction. "The Graduate" was an icon of the 1960's, a social commentary of one of the most turbulent decades of our history.

Almost 30 years later, Johnson, with set and costume designer Rob Howell and lighting designer Hugh Vanstone, created a stage version of the classic. In March of 2000, "The Graduate" opened in London to raves, as did its husky-voiced star, Kathleen Turner, who also made quite a stir with her nudity in the production. "The Graduate" proved to be a sellout in London, as it was the hottest ticket of the 2000 theater season. A Broadway transfer was immanent, and in April 2002, Kathleen Turner reprised her critically acclaimed Mrs. Robinson alongside up-and-coming starlets Jason Biggs (as Benjamin) and Alicia Silverstone (as Elaine). The production was a smash, and "The Graduate" is the highest grossing Broadway comedy in history.

Returning to Boston's Colonial Theater after its sell-out stateside premiere in February 2002, (prior to Broadway), this "Graduate" stars television and film star Lorraine Bracco. Bracco is probably best known to audiences as Tony Soprano's shrink, Dr. Jennifer Melfi on the award-winning HBO drama "The Sopranos." Bracco comes to "The Graduate" fresh from its Broadway run, where she received rave reviews for her sultry performance, and closed the show in March 2003. Co-starring with the smoky-voiced Bracco are Broadway veterans Jonathan Kaplan, who was nominated for a Tony Award for his performance in "Falsettos" and Devon Sorvari in the roles of Benjamin and Elaine respectively. Rounding out the cast are William Hill, Dennis Parlato, Kate Skinner, Winslow Corbett, Nathan Corddry, Tracy Griswold, Corrina May, Brian Russell and John Leonard Thompson.

The current tour of "The Graduate" will host a trio of Mrs. Robinsons, beginning with Jerry Hall, who also dropped trou in London as Kathleen Turner's replacement. Bracco and "Top Gun" vixen Kelly McGillis. Tickets for the strictly limited Boston engagement (it runs for two weeks only, January 27th – February 8th) are $30-$72.00 and can be purchased by calling the Colonial Theatre box office at 617-931-2787 or logging on to www.ticketmaster.com. $25 student rush tickets are also available on a performance-by-performance basis at the Colonial box office, cash only and a valid student ID is required. Check out www.broadwayinboston/studentrush.html for more information about rush tickets.

In case you miss the Boston engagement, "The Graduate" will seduce New England once again later this spring to help heat things up after a long winter. The aforementioned "Top Gun" bombshell Kelly McGillis takes over the role of Mrs. Robinson for engagements at the Shubert Theater in New Haven, Conn. from March 23-28, the Providence PAC April 13-18 and finally the Bushnell in Hartford, April 20-25. Ticket info for these performances, as well as other information about this production of "The Graduate" can be found at www.thegraduate.info.

Jerry Hall was the first to play the role of Mrs. Robinson on the current tour of "The Graduate."

Things are looking up for Shinedown

that seems so larger than life that everybody tells you you're foolish for trying for it, that you're never going to make it, that you're not good enough," Smith said. "But then you fly from the inside, and that's basically finding the strength to look inside yourself and believe ... I think the whole album kind of keeps this circle that yes, things can get really bad, but you have all the power in the world to change them."

The song reveals the two main things that have already begun to propel the band into the rock 'n' roll spotlight: thoughtful songwriting and a complicated collaboration of musical styles, elements and heritages that has been compared to everything from Lynard Skynard to Tool and Staind. The dynamics easily could have clashed, but typically, they blend beautifully.

"My biggest influence was probably Otis Redding," Smith, a native of Knoxville, Tenn., said. "I'm really big into soul music and have a really deep heritage in songs like blues with guys who really, you know, know how to make a microphone bleed."

Combine that with drummer Barry Kerch's love of James Brown and funk music, guitarist Jasin Todd's connection with both Blind Melon and death metal plus bassist Brad Stewart's enjoyment of Soundgarden, Alice in Chains, and all things grunge, and Shinedown's music can be complicated to dissect — but also extremely compelling.

"The music that we're writing now is the music I've always wanted to write," Smith said. "I've always been a rock writer, even though I write a lot of different kinds of songs. I think I'm just influenced by talent, just creative people."

Shinedown was born in 2001 after Smith says he broke away from another band and moved to Jacksonville with a developmental deal with Atlantic Records in hand. By 2002, Atlantic had signed the band to a deal, and they were flying to Los Angeles to cut an album.

"I found all my brothers in Shinedown," Smith said. "We tell everybody we packed 20 years into two."

Since the album's release in July, Smith says life has been turned "kind of exactly upside down, which is what I wanted." Shinedown has been on the road for over nine months, seven of which have been with 3 Doors Down – something the band is very grateful for.

"It's [playing with 3 Doors Down] catapulted us into all these crowds," Smith said. "It's really allowed us to play in front of a lot of people that we wouldn't normally get to, being a debut band."

For now, Shinedown's plans for the future remain uncertain and simple as they "try to make [as many people as possible] understand what the band is about." Smith says he's hoping the band will have the opportunity to tour with either Kid Rock or Sevendust in April, as they continue to release music from "Leave a Whisper." The second single, "45" is already in radio airplay, and Smith said the third is likely to be a track called "Burning Bright."

> "I've always been a rock writer, even though I write a lot of different kinds of songs. I think I'm just influenced by talent, just creative people."
> -Brent Smith

"[We want to] tour this record until we can't tour it anymore and try to get it to as many people as we can," Smith said.

In the meantime, Smith and the band won't cringe too much as music critics continue the inevitable comparisons to some of the other rock bands selling records today. Smith says he's heard comparisons to, in no particular order, Creed, Staind, Tool, Nickelback and Puddle of Mudd — none of which he thinks is a fair comparison.

"I think a lot of that is the critics," he said. "They don't know what else to do, how to kind of categorize us ... I don't feel like we're like those bands in a lot of ways, but to tell us that we're like those bands is a huge compliment because they've sold lots of records and they have lots of fans."

Smith says that the band has been blown away by the connection some fans have developed with their music, and that all of the thank-you's they hear make the grind of touring and recording worth it.

"It's an amazing thing to hear," Smith said. "There's actually five people in the United States who have the Shinedown logo tattooed on their body, which is pretty crazy."

Shinedown's sound has been compared to the likes of Creed, Staind, Tool, Nickelback and Puddle of Mudd.

3 Doors Down excites Boston

Tantric frontman Hugo Ferreira and the rest of the band opened for 3 Doors Down in Boston on Jan. 20.

during an encore. The last song of the evening was "Loser" featuring harmony with Tantric's Hugo Ferreira.

Tantric went on before 3 Doors, covering all the staples from their 2001 self-titled release, including "Breakdown," "Mourning," and "Astounded," but spending perhaps half their set previewing material from an album to be released late next month, including a catchy song framed around the background vocals, "Hey Now!" and an upbeat number called "Change the World."

Shinedown opened the show with a seven-song, 30-minute set. The newbie rockers from Jacksonville, Fla., started off weak with technical difficulties (mic trouble) through their first two songs, but turned things around with a stellar cover of their breakthrough hit, "Fly From the Inside," and a spine-chilling rendition of Lynard Skynard's "Simple Man." By the end of their set, Shinedown was playing before a nearly full Orpheum – nearly all of which remained on their feet from the end of the Skynard tune on.

'LOTR' gets 11 nominations

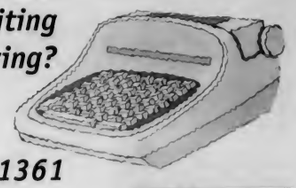
director.

A win for Coppola would make her kin the second family of three-generation winners, joining Walter, John and Anjelica Huston. Coppola's father is a five-time winner and her grandfather, Carmine Coppola, won for musical score on "The Godfather Part II."

The most notable snubs were for the Civil War saga "Cold Mountain," which failed to get nominations for best picture, director Anthony Minghella or lead actress Nicole Kidman, last year's best-actress winner for "The Hours." The film had scored well in earlier movie honors.

"Cold Mountain" did manage to pick up seven nominations, though, among them best actor for Law and best supporting actress for Renee Zellweger as a salt-of-the-earth Southerner. It was Zellweger's third straight nomination.

Besides Zellweger, supporting actress nominees were Shohreh Aghdashloo in "House of Sand and Fog," Patricia Clarkson in "Pieces of April," Marcia Gay Harden in "Mystic River" and Holly Hunter in "Thirteen."



Contenders for supporting actor were Alec Baldwin in "The Cooler," Benicio Del Toro in "21 Grams," Djimon Hounsou in "In America," Tim Robbins in "Mystic River" and Ken Watanabe in "The Last Samurai."

Besides best picture and director, nominations for "Return of the King" included original score and song, visual effects, film editing and adapted screenplay. The film was shut out in acting categories, though.

With their strange creatures and mythical settings, fantasy flicks have had a hard time gaining favor with Oscar voters. No such fantastical film has ever won the top Oscar, yet universal acclaim and success at previous awards have positioned "Return of the King" to break that barrier.

"Obviously, we've got reason to hope that happens," said Jackson, also considered the favorite for the directing Oscar. "I think what's helping us with 'The Lord of the Rings' is that people respond to the performances, to the reality of the situations on screen and the depth of it. It feels real to them.

Bowers finds success

With junior center Gabe Lee out for the rest of the season, UMass will be looking to its guards to help out more underneath.

"We've been playing very small so the guards have to come in and rebound," Bowers said. "The past three or four games I've been trying to get seven or above, that's been helping us. [rebounding] has been a big factor of why we've been losing in the past."

Coach Steve Lappas also believes that UMass' recent wins have to do with the young players, particularly Freeman and Bowers, getting more comfortable with their surroundings.

"He's another guy who's just understanding positioning so much better," Lappas said of Bowers. "He knows where he is a lot better now too and he's starting to figure out what's going on out there defensively and now where he needs to be to box out a guy."

Bowers also attributes some of his confidence to the fact that UMass has been playing small.

"Playing four out is different. It's opening up the floor for our team, if [Freeman] inside has a good look they go down and double him, he kicks it out, four guys out can hit it and I've just been making my shots."

Bowers finished last night's game against the Rams with 18 points, 7 rebounds and a career high 8 assists.

"I figured I just want to pick everything up in every area and just work harder at everything I'm doing," Bowers said.

Art Bowers and the Minutemen will put their two-game winning streak on the line this Saturday as UMass travels to face URI.

ket when the sophomore made the first of a one-and-one situation, before grabbing the rebound of his missed second shot and converting a lay-up to make the score 68-63.

Freeman came back with another tough basket off of a solid post move, but Haynes responded with another two before an Anderson basket and a Breland free throw narrowed the edge to 70-68 with under two minutes left.

The Minutemen hung tough, however, as another low post basket by Freeman pushed the lead to four with 34 seconds remaining. The Rams were then unable to come up with anything offensively, settling for a long three from Haynes before a free throw apiece from Freeman, Chadwick and Maxwell all but sealed the deal for the Maroon and White.

"We had our chances, but Freeman just made great plays when they needed them," Rams coach Dereck Whittenburg said. "I thought that was tremendous."

UMass turned an early deficit into a 15-8 advantage with a 10-0 run that included eight points and a pair of 3-pointers from Bowers.

UMass then built its lead to 31-16 at the 3:44 mark on the strength of a 9-1 burst that culminated with forward Jeff Viggiano connecting on UMass' first four point play of the season. The sophomore was fouled as he connected on a 3-pointer from the right wing and subsequently added the free throw.

After Fordham trimmed the lead to eleven at 36-25 on a Derrick Breland trey, Bowers answered with a three of his own before closing the half with a layup off a feed from Anthony Anderson to push the Minuteman lead to 41-25 at intermission.

The Rams fought back again, however, as after Stephane Lasme opened the half with a basket for UMass, the Rams ripped off nine straight points and pulled within single digits at 43-34 when Haynes converted a strong move to the hoop into a three-point play with just under 17 minutes remaining.

After a Lasme free throw bumped the UMass edge back to ten, the teams traded baskets for the next two minutes before a Breland 3-pointer capped five consecutive Ram points and pulled the Rams within seven at 52-45 with just over twelve minutes remaining.

UMass holds on again, downs A-10 foe Fordham

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Over the five-game stretch that opened the Massachusetts men's basketball team's Atlantic 10 conference schedule, the Minutemen seemingly found five different ways to lose.

However, exactly a week after coach Steve Lappas' squad was blown away by No. 3 St. Joseph's for the fifth of five consecutive losses, the Maroon and White have found a way to win.

Fordham	70
UMass	76

After downing Temple 66-65 to post its first league victory despite blowing a 22-point lead, UMass again raced out to a double-digit lead last night, and again had to hang on down the stretch, this time outlasting Fordham 76-70 before 2,988 at the Mullins Center.

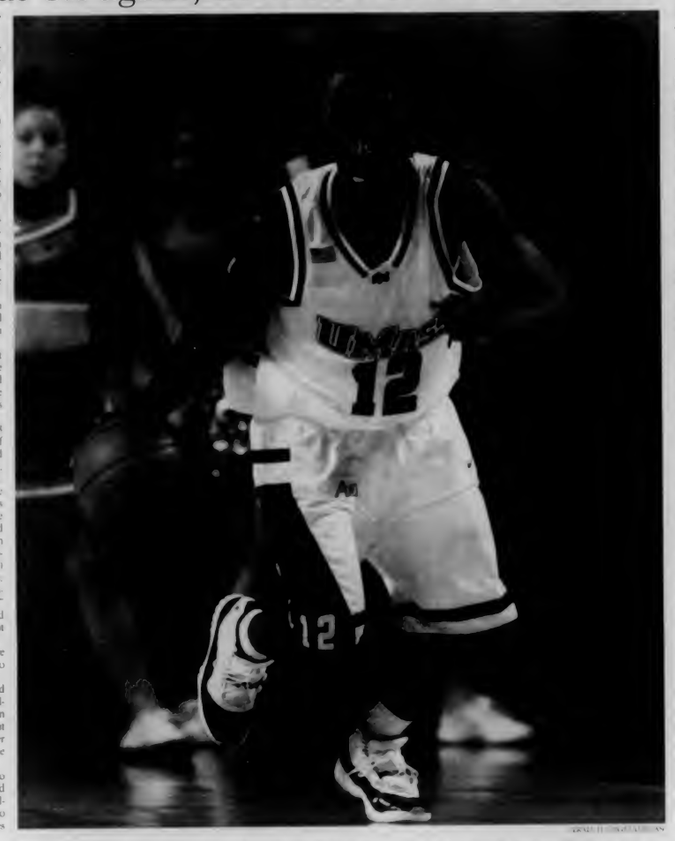
The Minutemen (7-11 2-5 A-10) return to action Saturday afternoon, as they will travel to Kingston, Rhode Island for a 1 pm tip-off with URI at the Ryan Center.

"I think our guys are enjoying what they're doing right now, because they sure look like it to me," Lappas said. "We had an unbelievable first half and a mediocre second half, but still made the right plays when we needed to down the stretch."

Mike Haynes led all scorers with 28 points, while the backcourt combination of Mark Jarrell-Wright and Derrick Breland chipped in with 12 points and 10 points, respectively for the Rams (4-13 1-5 A-10).

On the UMass side, it was again the youngsters that came up big as Art Bowers had 18 points and eight assists while Rashaun Freeman tossed in 18 points and grabbed 10 rebounds. Junior captain Anthony Anderson (14 points) and sophomore forward Jeff Viggiano (11 points) were also in double figures for the UMass.

"We've got three freshman and a sophomore out there, a lot of new guys," Lappas said. "I see them getting better, and that to me is the most important thing, that we're improving."



"We're getting better as a team, we're getting better as individuals and it's fun to see," he said.

Trailing 33-49, Fordham guard Jermaine Anderson's pair of baskets sandwiched around a free throw from Freeman narrowed the UMass lead to 57-51, but five points from Anderson on a 3-pointer and a pair of free throws widened the UMass lead to 62-51 with 7:30 to play.

Nonetheless, Fordham would not go away, as five more points from Haynes and a pair of buckets from guard Mark Jarrell-Wright helped the Rams climb back to within six at 66-60 with under five minutes left.

Haynes then answered a Freeman bas-

Guard coming into his own

Freshman guard Art Bowers has stepped up in all aspects of the game for the Massachusetts men's basketball team since returning from an ankle injury in late December. He came back slowly, but in the past four games he has provided clutch shots and strong stat lines for the Minutemen.

"I just wanted to come out and play a whole lot more confident. Instead of hesitating on shots, start believing in myself and just play hard," Bowers said after last night's game against Fordham.

"Once I got down, my ankle got hurt, I wasn't as mobile, my shots weren't falling and my leg wasn't as strong," he said. "I missed a couple of shots and I got down on myself, but I've just been in the gym working hard and I got my confidence back up."

Last night, Bowers helped his team out to an early lead with a quick bucket followed by back-to-back three's. He shot four-for-five from three-point land, a place where in previous games he had been struggling to find his rhythm.

Bowers had 14 points in the first half, shooting five-for-seven (3-of-4 from 3-point range), forcing the Rams to play him closer in the second half and forcing Bowers to work more on his dishing abilities.

"The second half was a whole lot more intense," Bowers said. "I would get in the lane and I would draw a player and I was just kicking it out to the perimeter and getting it into [Rashaun Freeman] and they were finishing it."

Bowers' regained confidence has been useful in clutch situations for the Minutemen. In Saturday's 66-65 win over Temple, Bowers hit a 3-pointer with 32 seconds remaining to give his team a one point lead and their first win in eight games. Bowers registered a career high 19 points in shooting 7 for 11 from the field.

Fordham head coach Dereck Whittenburg wasn't blind sided last night when Bowers stepped up for his team again, he knew from watching the tape what Bowers was capable of.

"I just thought he made shots, lot of shots at key times and I wasn't surprised."

Mass Attack set for NU

It's about time.

The Massachusetts hockey team (11-7-5, 7-5-2 Hockey East) hasn't played a game since its 1-0 win over Maine at Alfond Arena on Jan. 17. It hasn't played at home since being shut out, 1-0 by UMass Lowell on Jan. 4, and it hasn't played in front of a significant student crowd since the dramatic 2-2 tie with New Hampshire on Dec. 11, its last home game before winter session began.

Greg Mauldin remains questionable this weekend, as the junior forward is still recovering from a concussion sustained Jan. 3.

Tonight, the Minutemen, sitting fourth in the conference, return to the ice, and the homestretch of the Hockey East season begins with a real challenge.

The Northeastern Huskies (7-11-4, 2-9-3 HEA) are one of the hottest teams in Hockey East right now, something that seemed unlikely when NU was mired in an 11-game winless streak to begin the season.

However, after notching its first win of the season with a 1-0 win at Vermont on Dec. 6, Northeastern has played completely unlike the team that lost seven of its first eight conference game, with a tie to Providence on Nov. 7.

The biggest sign of change on St. Botolph Street was the Huskies' stunning 3-0 win over top-ranked Boston College on Jan. 3. Junior Keni Gibson (2.86 goals against, .896 save percentage) made 34 stops in the win, and Jason Guerriero tallied three points, including the Huskies' first goal, to lead NU past the conference-leading Eagles.

"We're playing a great team, we're playing the team that's played the best since Christmas of any team in our league," UMass coach Don Cahoon said, "so they're going to be enthusiastic, hungry to play, and we need to measure up to that."

Northeastern, though it is still at the bottom of the Hockey East standings, had one of the finest showings in the period since Dec. 23, going 4-2-2. New Hampshire (4-1-1) and BC (6-1-0) were the only teams to achieve better records in that time.

The Huskies have been led by the play of Guerriero, who leads the team in goals (9) and points (23), and his 14 assists gives him a tie for the team-lead with Mike Morris.

They've got a decent makeup in terms of their team speed, they've got a couple of good scorers, and they've put together a good power play," Cahoon said. "Gibson, when he's playing well, is a good goaltender, and for the most part, they're as good a team as most the teams in the league."

"I think secondly, they've stopped worrying about losing games, they're playing to win now. And the final attribute is that they're hungry, and they're probably enjoying the game as much as any team in the league."

Cahoon hopes the Minutemen will counter with a high student turnout.

"I think the kids are going to be really anxious to get going, get the students out there, get a home game under our belt with a chance of getting people to come out and see us play," he said. "Every game is going to be really competitive, as they all are, but now the ante has been raised. The league is starting to take shape, and we're fighting like crazy to keep our heads above water."

"If we can feed off the energy of our home crowd, enjoy being in our own locker room and own facility, and keep focused, then it plays to a big advantage for us."

The Minutemen are still fighting some nagging injuries, including the one that has kept junior Greg Mauldin out since a violent collision at Lowell on Jan. 3. Cahoon said that Mauldin might be able to return this weekend, after "a bunch of good days in a row."

Struggling Minutewomen to face conference rival Temple

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

Marnie Decko has the chance to reach a major milestone in her young coaching career as the Massachusetts women's basketball team travels to Philadelphia today to face Dawn Staley and the Temple Owls — her 100th win.

The Minutewomen could also set a new UMass record without a road victory after tying the 17-game losing streak on Jan. 16. The last time they met, Temple used a 14-3 run in the final 5:21 to defeat UMass, 52-40, on Jan. 9 at the Mullins Center.

Staley has had a storybook basketball career as a player and coach. A native of Philadelphia, Staley was named USA Today's High School Player of Year in 1988 as a senior at Dobbins Technical High School. She went on to be a two-time National Player of the Year at Virginia, leading the Cavs to three Final Fours and holding the NCAA record in steals with 454. After professional stints in France, Italy, Brazil, Spain and the ABL, she went on to start for the historic U.S.A. Women's Basketball team, compiling a 60-0 record and a 1996 Olympic gold medal in Atlanta.

In her young coaching career, Staley has shown promise since changing the role from a star player to a fresh, young coach.

The third year coach has won over 50 games, captured Temple's first A-10 women's hoops title and has made two postseason trips, including a 2002 NCAA tournament trip.

Staley, with no prior coaching experience before Temple, has averaged 18 wins per season and has already earned the prestigious 2002 Big Five Coach of the Year.

The Owls (10-7, 6-0, A-10) sport a winning record after starting the season off 4-6, facing the 36th toughest schedule in the nation, according to www.collegerpi.com. Since the dismal start, TU has won six of their seven contests, including two impressive OT wins last weekend against Richmond and Saint Joseph's.

Temple is led by promising sophomore Candice Dupree and freshman point guard Britney Jordan. Dupree, a 6-foot-2 center, dominated the paint against the Minutewomen (5-13, 1-6, A-10) tallying 13 points, 12 boards along with three blocks and a steal in the 52-40 victory on Jan. 9. Dupree is averaging 14.8 points per game and 7.5 rebounds per game this season.

Jordan, the highest ranked recruit in Temple history, has enjoyed a stellar freshman campaign, putting up 9.8 points and a team-best 4.24 assists. Jordan's playmaking ability is deadly when combined with an accurate three-point shot, going 23-for-67 (.343) from behind the arc.

The entire UMass team is frustrated during a struggling transition year. Adding to the frustration, Ashley Sharpton will probably miss the rest of the season with a knee injury.

The lone bright spot for the Minutewomen has been the play of senior Judit Zsedenyi. The Budapest, Hungary native has improved last season's scoring average from 3.2 ppg to a solid 10.8 ppg while playing 33.8 minutes a game.

University prepares for possible disturbances

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

This Sunday at 6:25 p.m., the New England Patriots will face off with the Carolina Panthers in Houston, Texas for the 2004 Super Bowl. As Americans across the country sit back in their easy chairs, donning team jerseys on their backs and hot wing sauce on their lips, students at the University of Massachusetts will be crowding local sports bars, restaurants and dorm rooms to cheer on their favorite teams.

However, the Patriot's attendance at Super Bowl XXXVIII also brings an air of concern for University of Massachusetts administration, security and students alike. When the Patriots won the 2002 Super Bowl, thousands of UMass students rioted in Southwest Residential Area, causing damage to university property and resulting in several arrests. This past fall, the Red Sox's win over Oakland in the American League Division Series and loss to the Yankees in the American League Championship Series resulted in a range of disturbances that caused widespread destruction across the campus.

Administrative action

The University administration, in combined efforts with the UMass Police Department, the Student Government Association, and students themselves, is working to prevent another post-Super Bowl disturbance from happening this Sunday.

"We have a lot of fun activities planned," said Michael Gargano, vice chancellor of student affairs. "We really want students to go [to them], enjoy the Super Bowl, and celebrate with their team."

On-campus activities have been planned by the Student Activities Center and the SGA. A Super Bowl party will begin at 5 p.m. in the Bluewall Cafe in the Campus Center, and will include free appetizers such as a five-foot sub and soda, contests, prizes and several flat and large-screen televisions airing the game.

According to Gargano, the Office of Student Affairs has heard from thousands of concerned parents and students since the fall disturbances. "People do not want this behavior on their campus and they want us to end it," he said. "As vice chancellor, I take [that message] very seriously."

Gargano said that any students found engaging in riotous behavior would be immediately removed from the campus.

"They will be exiting the university the same day," he said. "We will be sending them home to live with their mom and dad."

According to Gargano, the destruction caused in last fall's disturbances and riots cost the university more than $200,000 in damage, including the costs of destruction of university property and the additional security measures that required the use of state and town police.

"Students should be able to celebrate without causing harm ... that's what real fans do," said Gargano.

He also pointed out that if a student is expelled from the University, it will permanently stay on his or her track record, making it "not so easy to find a job" in the working world.

Student Government actions

Mina Safain, SGA secretary of public policy and relations, says the SGA has been working closely with the vice chancellor of student affairs in order to promote a safe weekend. SGA staff members will be present in Southwest after the Super Bowl. SGA president David Carr, attorney general Mark Morrison, and senate speaker Jared Nokes, as well as Safain, will be stationed in the command center with the police, "basically making sure that student rights aren't being violated and the that the police aren't doing anything unlawful," Safain said.

According to Safain, the UMPD will also be using surveillance cameras stationed around John Quincy Adams tower as means of patrol. In the past, the camera tapes have been used as a way of finding perpetrators after the riots. However, on Sunday, the authorities will be watching the tapes live. This means that suspects will be arrested immediately, rather than several days afterward.

"The SGA does not approve of any riotous behavior," said Safain. "It ruins the reputation of our school, devalues our degrees and gives a very bad

Explosion kills seven soldiers in Afghanistan

By Stephen Graham
Associated Press

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) — An explosion at a weapons cache in Afghanistan killed seven U.S. soldiers and wounded three more Thursday, the U.S. Central Command said. One American soldier was missing.

An Afghan interpreter also was wounded by the 3 p.m. explosion near the city of Ghazni, 60 miles southwest of the capital, Kabul. The soldiers were working around a weapons cache when the blast happened, Centcom said in a statement.

Centcom spokesman Capt. Bruce Frame said the cause had yet to be determined.

Separately, investigators sifted through evidence Thursday from suicide bombings that killed British and Canadian soldiers in Kabul the two previous days. The ousted Taliban regime has claimed responsibility for both blasts.

The cause of Thursday's weapons cache blast was not immediately known. The wounded soldiers were evacuated to a hospital at Bagram Air Base, headquarters for U.S.-led coalition in Afghanistan.

The names of the victims were being withheld pending notification of relatives.

Earlier this month, the U.S. death toll in the two-year war in Afghanistan reached 100. Only 16 Americans died in the lightning war that drove the Taliban from power at the end of 2001 for providing a refuge and base for Osama bin Laden, the suspected mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks. The rest of the Americans died after the Taliban's defeat.

The toll includes deaths in other parts of Operation Enduring Freedom, such as a helicopter crash in the Philippines nearly two years ago that killed 10 American soldiers.

The United States provides 9,000 of the 11,000-member coalition troops stationed in Afghanistan.

Troops at Camp Souter, the British base in eastern Kabul, held a memorial ceremony Thursday for the soldier killed the day before by a suicide bomber. The victim was identified as Pvt. Jonathan Kitulagoda, 23, from Plymouth in southwest England.

Commanders and diplomats joined about 150 soldiers to hear readings, prayers and tributes from Kitulagoda's friends in a

Honors college may recieve new grant

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Dean Linday Slakes said theres a long way to go before the University gets the new grant.

The first stages of a considerable grant to the Commonwealth College are underway after Governor Mitt Romney approved Wednesday, a $3.43 million budget allocation.

With hard work from University of Massachusetts Interim President, Jack Wilson and Chancellor John V. Lombardi, Romney has proposed an allocation to the Commonwealth College that is double the amount that the college has currently received. According to Dean of the Commonwealth College, Linda Slakey, the college had received $1.75 million in years past.

"We are very grateful that Chancellor Lombardi and President Wilson were able to make Romney understand what the Commonwealth College is all about," Slakey said.

The Commonwealth College was started with the freshman class in 1999. Students who maintain a 3.2 GPA can apply to the college. This past June, the first class of the Commonwealth College graduated, and now, approximately 2,800 students from all four grades are enrolled.

According to Slakey, the money that was given to the program in the beginning was only enough to fund the college for the first two years.

Two important things happened within the first two years that made it difficult to fund Commonwealth College programs with the given money.

"First of all, more students were attracted," she said, "and secondly, we were in the middle of difficult financial times."

Although the proposal is a major accomplishment for the college, Slakey stressed that the recent move by Romney is just the first in a series of steps necessary for the college to acquire the funding.

She said that Romney has proposed the idea of allocation $3.43 million, but it must pass first through the House of Representatives and the Senate before potentially being passed for the next fiscal year on July 1, 2004.

"We're pleased to be at the first step," Slakey said. "Governor Romney has understood the logic, and now it's important for the House and the Senate know the logic."

If this proposal is approved, students can expect a number of positive changes in the Commonwealth College next fall. The money would potentially go to instructors and student projects.

"This is the beginning of a political process. I am very grateful to the Governor for the vote of confidence in the Commonwealth College," Slakey said. "The college has depended heavily on goodwill or faculty and departmental administration even though we were funded explicitly. Now we would be pleased to have it funded for four years."

Currently many instructors are not being compensated for teaching honors courses in their department, and the money would enable the University to pay professors who teach for the Commonwealth College.

Students would be able to find more honors courses under the general education requirement than there are currently, and individual student projects would be able to be funded.

Meredith Lind, the director of communications and program development, said that currently there is less than enough money to support good student projects.

"We are only able to fund or partially fund about two-thirds all student proposals for research projects," Lind said.

Democrats will come together at University

Off-year convention will educate participants on policy, campaigns

By Dan Lamothe
Collegian Staff

Thousands of Democratic delegates will convene at the University of Massachusetts in May when the party holds its state convention at the Mullins Center.

The party is experiencing what Jane Lane, communications director for the state party, terms an off year, with no nominations and no major issues for the party to decide on. For that reason, the focus of the convention, planned for May 8, will be different than normal.

"We see this convention as being very interactive," Lane said.

The focus of the convention this year is to educate, according to Lane. Panel discussions are planned for the entire day along three tracks — conversations on public policy, a campaign training institute, and a third track with what Lane categorizes as discussions on issues that are important to young people.

"Just because it's an off year, we thought we would try something very different," Lane said. "The UMass setting fits in with this perfectly. Rather than using a typical convention hall setting in Worcester or Springfield or Boston, we decided to go with a campus location."

Each panel discussion will have three to four experts leading a dialogue open for discussion with students. Lane said the party has had similar panels occasionally in the past to great success.

"We've actually had to turn away people because they were so popular," she said.

The campaign training institute will offer students a chance to learn how to run a campaign in numerous different ways, according to Lane, including from the point of view of the campaign manager, the fundraiser and the candidate.

"These institutes really kind of teach the whole process to campaign workers," Lane said. "You leave there with a bible. The democratic nation committee provides with this really large book on how to run a successful political campaign.

The third track was created in part because of the location.

"We thought [discussions on issues for young people] would be essential since we are having the discussion at UMass Amherst," said Lane.

The University Democrats will play a strong role in attracting students to the convention and to developing topics for panel discussions — something that plays right into the party's philosophy of getting college students involved, according to Lane.

"It's really one of the primary objectives of [Democratic Party Chair] Phil Johnston to involve and attract more young people into politics and political activity."

Lane said Johnston got his start in political activity at UMass. He began his political activity and involvement at UMass while working on the Kennedy presidential campaign here.

President travels to NH in reelection campaign

By Jennifer Loven
Associated Press

MERRIMACK, N.H. (AP) — President Bush, taking the New Hampshire political stage all for himself after the Democrats decamped, defended his economic record Thursday against his rivals' charges that he has favored the rich and let 2.3 million jobs slip away.

"You can tell I'm upbeat," Bush said, almost drowned out by cheers. "And I got reason to be. Not only do the numbers say things are looking pretty good, the American people are telling me that they feel pretty good."

From New Hampshire, Bush headed to Connecticut to raise $1.1 million for a re-election campaign well on the way to its fund-raising goal of $170 million. That's just for efforts between now and the official start of the general election campaign in September.

There was no sign of Connecticut Gov. John G. Rowland at the Greenwich fundraiser. Rowland is state chairman of Bush's campaign but, as the subject of a federal corruption investigation, decided to stay away.

A fund-raiser host and Bush's cousin, name to the Institution. We support [Gargano's] zero-tolerance policy."

The SGA is offering the Judicial Advising Program to UMass students who are facing riot-related disciplinary review by the Dean of Students office. Directed by Morrison and funded by the SGA, the program provides students with representation from trained individuals who are familiar with the University's student code of conduct.

"What they say before the Dean of Students could cost them their education," Safain said.

Residential life preparations

UMass resident assistants are also prepared to handle any disturbances that may arise this weekend, especially after experiencing the 2003 baseball season celebrations. According to Jennifer Tripp, a UMass RA, when police break up large-scale gatherings outside, the night for an on-duty RA has only begun.

"When the cops give a dispersal order, everyone runs into the dorms and it becomes pure chaos," she said.

RAs receive crowd-control instructions when training for their positions, but some situations can prove too dangerous to work under.

"If we are possibly in harm's way, the best thing we can do is call the police. [At that point,] we can discourage people from going outside, but we have to stay inside ourselves," said Tripp.

During the week of Red Sox disturbances, RAs from Sylvan, Northeast and Central living areas were asked to volunteer their services in order for the Southwest RAs to get a much-needed break after several long nights of being on duty. During a riot, normal night shifts are often made longer due to the enormous number of student write-ups, which require RAs to remain on duty until all paperwork is completed.

For Tripp, the type of students who were arrested during the fall disturbances has also been disconcerting.

"The majority of the people I saw arrested were 18- and 19-year-olds, first year students. Do they think this is what they need to do to enjoy college? It concerns me that they are getting this impression."

The UMPD

The UMPD Chief of Police Barbara O'Connor says that the UMass police will be out in full force on Sunday, as well as the alcohol task force.

"The main focus of the night is to allow students to have fun, as long as they behave responsibly. Our preference is that they enjoy the game. I'm a Pats fan. I want to see them do well and enjoy the victory," said O'Connor. "However, if the crowd gets out of hand, we'll have to deal with that as we've done in the past."

In past disturbances, the largest problem for the police department arose when students refused to leave an area after authorities gave a dispersal order. A dispersal order signifies that a gathering has become an unlawful assembly and a reasonable amount of time to exit the premises is permitted. Anyone who refuses to leave after this time period is considered in violation of the law.

"Students want to see the show and wind up getting arrested," O'Connor said.

O'Connor also pointed out the life-threatening consequences to such behavior.

"I don't think students realize that if you throw something out of one of those high rises, you can kill someone. You will be charged with murder."

"Our biggest goal is to do as much prevention as we can. However, we have to be prepared for the worst, and we are."

private gathering, said Capt. Tom Smith, spokesman for the 300-strong British contingent. Kitulagoda's body likely will be flown home next week, he said.

Kitulagoda was killed when a suicide bomber detonated a yellow-and-white taxi next to an open-topped British Land Rover jeep. Four other British soldiers were wounded. The attack came a day after a Canadian soldier was killed in a similar suicide attack.

Investigators pored over evidence from the two suicide bombings. Afghan police said they identified the original owner of the taxi.

"We have a name and an address," said Mohammed Haroon Asefi, a senior police commander at the Interior Ministry. He said no one had been arrested and he refused to release any other details.

Kabul police boosted security in the city in response to the attacks. Officials said they had more uniformed men on the sidewalks, more patrol cars on the roads and extra undercover officers moving among the city's 3 million residents.

Governor takes step to approve grant

Students in the Commonwealth College often times propose research projects to the selection board to be funded. Unfortunately, many good proposals have been turned away because of lack of funding.

There are two kinds of fellowship projects that students can apply for. Sophomores usually assist research projects that a professor has been working on and he or she is paid minimum wage for the work. The second kind of fellowship program is for juniors or seniors who conduct their own research and apply for a grant or partial funding from the University.

"The faculty selection committee has to accept only realistic projects," Lind said, "but they have still had to turn away many proposals because of funding."

This past fall a student has been working on a research project in the classics department, titled Etruscan Text Projects where he is translating a number of works to a database that Etruscan scholars from around the world can access.

"He requested money for a second-hand Mac computer and software for web programming," Lind said.

Other student projects in the past have included various science researches in which lab supplies and equipment were needed and just last year students had worked on a 3D film project.

"We're trying to help support students that wouldn't be able to afford to fund themselves," Lind said." In essence to help provide more money."

President looks at NH as crucial to reelection campaign

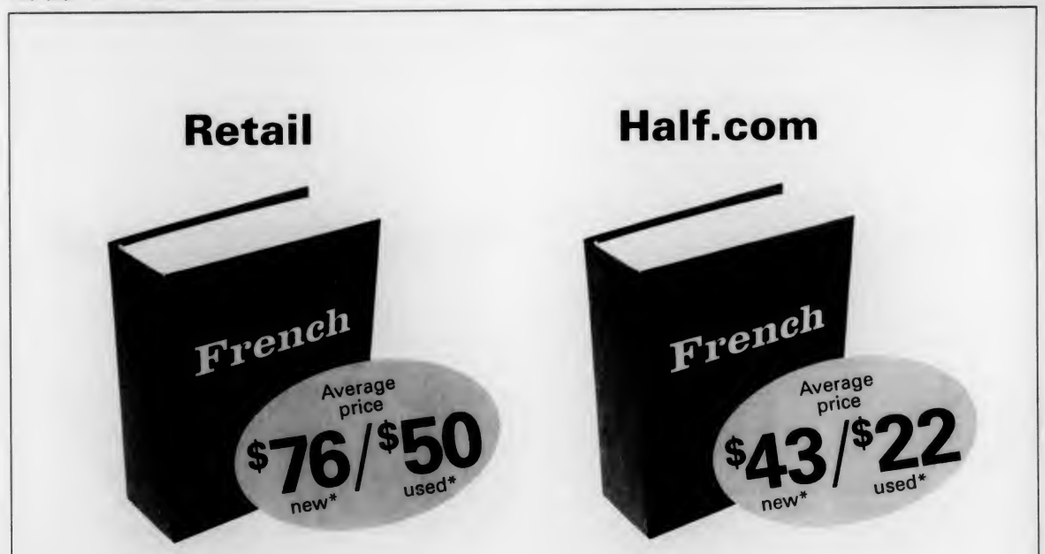
Debbie Stapleton, perhaps inadvertently contradicted the president's preference for stressing his ties to down-home Texas over his membership in an old, wealthy New England-based family.

"You may associate him with the Lone Star State, boots and spurs, but I know him in his earlier Connecticut days of family gatherings, Yale Bulldogs and Old Blue," she said. "Please welcome my cousin, Connecticut's own native son, born in New Haven, with deep family roots in Greenwich, the grandson of former Connecticut Sen. Prescott and Dorothy Bush — President George W. Bush."

Bush took it in stride, making fun of himself as he noted the presence of former Yale University classmates. "They were the ones who invented shock and awe when they heard I was president," he said. "They're all fine lads — they themselves were C-students."

Making his fifth visit to New Hampshire as president, Bush said the economy was rebounding under his watch — and that he was determined to see it through to even better days.



Aides insisted there was no political component to the choice of New Hampshire to press that message. However, they offered no other reason the president chose to come here to have the last word on the economy just two days after the state held its first-in-the-nation primary.

New Hampshire is seen by Bush political advisers as a crucial prize despite its relatively small cache of four electoral votes. The president won the state in 2000, but by only a slim margin. And since it was his only victory in the Northeast, it is a state the campaign wants to hold on to.

The topic of the economy is a weak spot for Bush among the independent voters who make up a sizable share of the electorate here. Four years ago, the state had an unemployment rate of around 2 percent. Now, though it remains well below the national level, the unemployment rate has increased to 4.1 percent as New Hampshire has shed 20,000 manufacturing jobs.

But alongside Bush at Fidelity Investments on Thursday, six local workers and business owners gave firsthand accounts of the benefits they are realizing from the president's tax cut packages.

Bush's remarks and the accompanying suppo-rtive testimonials countered months of pummeling of the president's economic record from the Democratic candidates, now moved on to other primary-holding states.

'Classroom Blitz' offers a new and improved look

We at the Massachusetts Daily Collegian applaud the Physical Plant for their efforts to renovate areas of campus over winter break.

In a project dubbed the "Classroom Blitz," the Physical Plant refurbished many classrooms over the past six weeks. The repairs were necessary to keep the University of Massachusetts in tip-top shape, despite a time when there have been severe budget cuts.

The workforce began the "Classroom Blitz" the day after students left for break. Of course, the team could only work at a time when students were off campus, leaving a small amount of time in which they could finish the job.

Oftentimes, the work that the Physical Plant does goes largely unnoticed by the student body because much of their work is "behind the scenes."

But despite their low profile, the workers in the Physical Plant are an important part of keeping the University looking good. And students and professors, no doubt, are grateful for their hard work.

Prospective students and other visitors judge the University partly on the way that it looks. And college rankings in publications oftentimes take appearance in consideration when deciding on the list. The first thing people see when they visit campus are the buildings and the condition that they are in. Although it is not an entirely accurate representation of the quality of the campus, it is a factor that the people use to judge the University.

Visiting high school seniors may think the University is not the best choice for them if they step into broken down classrooms. Similarly, guest speakers who sometimes give lectures and entertain questions in classrooms will be shocked to walk in messy classrooms.

No student or professor should have to suffer through a classroom that has holes in the projection screen, inadequate lighting, missing floor tiles and chipped paint.

Despite work on 25 classrooms, four auditoriums and more than 6,000 square feet of space in campus buildings, more work is necessary to keep the University in excellent shape. The walkway outside the library, for instance, is in need of repair.

The tight budget allowed only $450,000 to be allocated this year. The Physical Plant's "Classroom Blitz" committee and Chancellor John V. Lombardi have expressed interest in renovating more classrooms in the future. They also hope to utilize funding from alumni to use for the program.

The sprawling campus is no doubt difficult to keep up-to-date, but the thousands of students and faculty who attend the University deserve the highest quality buildings possible.

The program is essential to keep up the high standards the University sets for an academic environment. Professors prefer classrooms that have recently been "blitzed." Indeed, students deserve appropriate quarters for lectures and discussions.

As many buildings across campus need refurbishing because of old age and heavy traffic and usage, we applaud the Physical Plant and Lombardi for making a concerted effort to keeping the University's appearance looking sparkling.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

BAD PRESS AND BAD BEHAVIOR GIVES UMASS CAMPUS A BAD NAME

Over the course of our varied tenure here at the University, we have noticed an increase in unacceptable and embarrassing behavior from our peers. As fellow students, we are disgusted with the reckless actions of an alarming number of individuals, who fail to realize that the manner in which they conduct themselves has far-reaching consequences. As a top tier research institution, The University of Massachusetts at Amherst is in the national spotlight. Any publicity, positive or negative, has a profound effect on the value of your diploma.

It has come to our attention that as of late, the majority of coverage on UMass has been extremely negative. On Sept. 11, 2002, The Daily Collegian reported that a skinned goat head was found in the 14th floor bathroom of Coolidge Tower in Southwest. On May 5, 2003, the Collegian once again reported that a "tradition" at Hobart spiraled out of control as students and police clashed. On Oct. 4, 2003, in response to a dramatic Red Sox playoff-game victory, riots ensued in Southwest causing widespread destruction of public property, including the flipping of several cars. Three days later, the Red Sox won the American League Division Series and another riot broke out, resulting in one student jumping off the top of Berkshire Dining Hall. This is by no means meant to be a complete list of the unacceptable behavior present at UMass. We chose these because they all earned national media attention, further tarnishing the UMass degree.

Most recently, on Dec. 31, 2003, MSNBC.com reported that a University of Massachusetts sophomore allegedly placed tires in the middle of a road in Easton, MA as a "prank". Sadly, a 21-year-old Northeastern University student, Edwin Keach, died after his SUV collided with one of the tires, sending him into a tree.

UMass strives to attract top students from across the nation, but their efforts are continually hampered by student participation in the aforementioned events. However, all the blame cannot be put squarely upon the students. The administration needs to do a better job creating an environment that does not tolerate such behavior. But in the end it is our responsibility to be respectful members of the campus community. It's our duty to set an example for incoming students, one that in the end maximizes the value of your diploma. We are proponents of enjoying the college experience; yet one must always keep in mind the ripple effect of one's actions.

'The show must go on' for the Amherst High School students

Matthew Ried

Freedom of speech is one of the most cherished and sacred rights that exists in this country. Regardless of the medium we choose to express ourselves, we as Americans hold dear the right to stand up and say what we believe without fear of prosecution or repression.

Like most rights in this country, or in any other country for that matter, we push our rights to the limit. With a right as broad and all-encompassing as freedom of speech, it seems only logical that the question would commonly arise, "How much is too much?" That is the exact question that Amherst area residents are currently struggling with.

As part of a weeklong series of events addressing violence against women, Amherst Regional High School students decided to put on a student-run production of the Eve Ensler play "The Vagina Monologues" on Feb. 13. The play, which Ensler started off-Broadway several years ago, has become a controversial and passionately discussed topic. It was recently decided that the Amherst Regional School Committee would allow the production to go on as scheduled. The decision has drawn severe opposition from parents and local residents.

Roberta A. Pastorello, an Amherst resident and mother of an Amherst High student, said that she feels "ashamed and embarrassed" that the students would want to put on the play, and that they would be allowed to in the first place, according to The Springfield Republican.

While the play may deal with mature themes not suitable for younger children (it is basically a collection of women talking about their vaginas and what it means to be a women), it is nothing to be ashamed or embarrassed about.

Yes, Ensler uses the "V word" more than 100 times during each show, but she is not just saying it to hear herself talk — there is a message. The message is one of awareness and confidence, and it fits perfectly into the events running during the week.

I am a male, and thus cannot appreciate the play in the same way that Ensler or any other woman can. But this controversy is not entirely about male versus female. A large part of it has to do with the overprotection of our children. We aren't talking elementary school or middle school children either. These are high school students who are a few years away from entering the real world. Some of them, whether we like it or not, already have full time jobs or even children, which puts them in the real world already. It's unfortunate that children these days grow up so quickly, but it's a fact that we have to deal with. If an 18-year-old is old enough to fight and die overseas, then a 17-year-old is old enough to hear the word "vagina."

If an 18-year-old is old enough to fight and die overseas, then a 17-year-old is old enough to hear the word 'vagina.'

David Foster, a Shutesbury parent in favor of the school committee's decision, said in The Springfield Republican that he has "had discussions with my 10th grader that I wouldn't ordinarily have." Clearly, when channels of communication are open between parents and their children, it is possible to find a strong, positive message amidst a cloud of ignorance and resistance. This play would allow for such an oppurtunity, at a time when it is sorely needed.

Just think of the number of books that have been banned, or nearly banned, from our high schools: "Native Son," "Huckleberry Finn," "I Know Why the Caged Bird Sings," "Of Mice and Men," "To Kill a Mockingbird." There are hundreds more examples out there. What are we so afraid of? These books will not poison our minds with senseless images of violence and hatred — and even if they did, children get enough of that with television and video games; if these books are well-written, doesn't that count for something?

"The Vagina Monologues" focuses on women talking about their sexual identity, and their identities in general. When she is onstage, Ensler is free, strong and liberated. Why should Amherst High School women be anything different? Do we not we promote men as superiors at every chance we get? Men are the strong ones, men are the leaders, and men are the ones in power. To use an example from my high school, we hold pep rallies for one athletic team throughout the course of the year: the annual Turkey Day rally for the (exclusively male) football team. The whole thing is a testosterone-ridden celebration of male dominance. The whole time, the male players are cheered for and encouraged, even by the all-female cheerleading squad. I participated in these rallies as a player, so I would not discourage them. However, having a rally for the (undefeated) girls basketball team wouldn't hurt either.

Isn't "The Vagina Monologues" be a sort of educational pep rally for females? Isn't it meant to encourage, inform and promote, to draw attention to those who deserve it, and to make people aware of something meaningful. It is certainly as necessary for the girls to have their time as it is for the all-boys football team to have theirs.

One of the more vocal opponents of the play's production said that the Amherst High students are not mature or experienced enough to handle the play's themes and messages. But when children are so totally sheltered from the rest of universe, will they ever be ready?

I would like to personally applaud the decision to let the performance of the play go ahead as scheduled. To repress it would be to silence the voices of a younger generation that is simply trying to express themselves and promote a worthwhile cause.

Lack of facilities makes it hard for students to keep in shape

Becky Martins

It can be difficult to stick to New Year's resolutions, especially when the goal is to be healthy. But when fitness facilities are limited, getting in shape becomes an even harder task.

On Jan. 1, I vowed to change my lifestyle. I promised myself my diet would become well balanced. I also decided to increase my physical activity by joining a fitness center. Starting Jan. 2, my gym membership was renewed and my eating habits changed. Not surprisingly, almost one month later and after working out every day, I felt and saw improvements. But upon returning to the University of Massachusetts, I wonder if these results will only be temporary as I struggle to find a credible, affordable facility to meet my fitness needs.

Students are given the choice of using three facilities on campus free of charge, each with the purpose of serving a different living community. Students from Southwest and Central find Boyden Gym quite accessible. Northeast and Sylvan students have a very short walk to Totman Gym. Orchard Hill residents have the option of using the Curry Hicks pool. All UMass students are welcome at any of the three free facilities, as well at any of the other multiple gyms around campus, such as those located in the Lewis or John Quincy Adams dorms, for a small semester fee. But while this setup may sound good on paper, in reality, UMass hardly comes close to offering what other colleges do in terms of fitness centers.

At other large state schools, such as the University of Connecticut or University of New Hampshire, students have the option of working out in state-of-the-art facilities, large enough to hold many people. Equipment is new. Space is abundant. Convenience is hardly an issue. Yet, at UMass, it is rare to find all, if any, of these traits in our gyms. Most of UMass equipment is not new and most times just leftover from the athletes. In places like Totman, the "gym" is nothing more than a room, unable to hold more than 40 people at a time.

It is hard to believe UMass has not already stepped up and created a place where students can truly improve their quality of life through exercise.

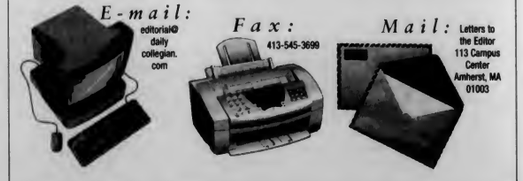
As for convenience, not everyone on campus has his or her own mode of transportation. Sure, it is possible to catch buses, but it would be even nicer if the best gyms on campus were within walking distance for everyone. That way we could all work out at our leisure, without having to wonder when the next bus is coming to bring us back to our dorms.

UMass' lack of good fitness centers may explain why so many students choose to get memberships off campus. Avid gym-goers are used to quality facilities, but on campus, they are hard to find. Thus, many Minutemen are forced to dish out at least $40 a month to simply workout in a place that meets their standards. This can be a hard task for students without transportation or with little money. In the end, such obstacles discourage many from joining a gym, and thus, living a healthy lifestyle.

It is hard to believe UMass has not already stepped up and created a place where students can truly improve their quality of life through exercise. Sure, the school does offer a multiple array of gyms, but sometimes, a room with a few weights, two treadmills and a Stairmaster does not cut it.

Personally, I believe one, large gym central to all students, or two at either end of campus, makes more sense then multiple, minor facilities scattered about. More people will be motivated to go if they will be using quality equipment, are in a non-confining space, and do not have to hike just to get there. Even if individuals were asked to pay a small semester fee, like students at Bridgewater State College do, I believe it would be money well spent if the membership included the use of new equipment and a bright, open space to workout in.

The idea of creating new fitness centers may be a pipe dream with all the recent budget problems UMass faces, but in better financial years, I believe this is an issue the school should address. Working out and eating healthy helps students improve their physical appearance and decreases their risk of numerous diseases, such as forms of diabetes. Also, according to www.workoutsforyou.com, regular physical activity increases levels of self-esteem and energy, helps individuals develop good sleeping patterns, and can even reduce bouts of depression. It seems ridiculous not to encourage such positivism.



Thus proving that with quality, fitness centers, made accessible to everyone, there is nothing to lose, but the pounds.

ARTS & LIVING

FRIDAY, JANUARY 30, 2004 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

'Rainbow Six' is better the third time around

Press Start to Play

Reid Davenport

Tom Clancy's popular Rainbow Six series is back with "Rainbow Six 3" currently on X-Box and PC. The game, also scheduled to be released later this year on PS2 and Gamecube, has been flying off store shelves over the past few weeks. The online play via X-Box Live is superb, despite occasional LAG problems, and handles well on an X-Box controller. The PC version, despite also being online, doesn't hold up to the ability to talk to team members and have other gamers assist you in your quest to move up in the rank list.

The new first-person shooter offers up more tactics and items to use in order to stop the terrorist threats. The group system will allow you to distract and take out terrorists that cannot be taken down by barging into the room guns blazing. With additional sub-commands like Zulu and Alpha, you have the ability to tell your fellow Rainbow members to blast open a door with the push of a button. As they do so, it distracts the terrorists so you can break through another door and take out the threat.

The group system takes time to master but will prove worthwhile when you continue in the single player mode. At times you will need to take out the terrorists without killing the hostages, or be forced to perform many other challenging tasks. Your team will be equipped with all the items you need to make it through. From heat sensor goggles to claymore mines that burst open doors, there is always something to make sure you and your team will complete the mission. In addition to items, it's good to learn how to set the manner in which your teammates enter a room so they don't blast away a hostage in a hasty moment of action.

The X-Box Live play leaves other games such as, "Counter Strike" in the dust. "Rainbow Six 3" does the reverse of "Counter Strike" by being better on line via X-Box than PC. As previously mentioned, the ability to talk over what is going on with other players makes you feel more interactive, but what gives it the edge over "Counter Strike" is that people new to the game can last as long as anyone whose been playing it for a long time. In "Counter Strike" you're lucky to survive 30 seconds, let alone one round. But, in "Rainbow Six 3" you can usually pair up with another team member and learn from their moves, while staying alive. "Rainbow Six 3" is also more tactics based than its rival "Counter Strike."

The online feature does have its problems with lagging due to low bandwidth, which slows down game play at times. Occasionally the screen will get jumpy and you start to appear in random places and sometimes you even find yourself stuck and just waiting to be killed, or even forced to quit the game. It becomes a problem if you're doing well and most people in the game will know. Fortunately, there is a solution: if you host a game you can avoid a LAG problem by booting those who show a low rating off of your game.

If you're interested in the X-Box Live experience but don't want to blow the $50 on the start-up pack, a few limited edition bundles that include "Rainbow Six 3" with X-Box Live and a headset were put on the market at $69.95 apiece, so you end up saving $30. I received a two-month trial membership in my copy, but there is no guarantee that there is one in each copy out there. Ask your local retailer for more of those details.

So you've gotten "Rainbow Six 3," but you still can't get through the levels? Well here's a code to turn on God Mode to enable you to get by. During game play press Up, Up, Down, Down, Left, Right, Left, Right, B, A, and you should see a message that says "God Mode" if entered correctly. Obviously this code should be familiar as it's the 99 lives code from the classic "Contra." The code will only make your character invincible, not your teammates or hostages. And if you want to add some spice to the game hit Up, Down, Up, Down, and click the right analog-stick twice during game play to turn "Rainbow Six 3" into "G.I. Joe" mode.

"Tom Clancy's Rainbow Six 3" is currently available for X-Box and PC for $49.99. It's slated to release on PS2 in March, but will not likely be online. A release date for the Gamecube version has been yet to be released.

Sizzling comedy comes to UMass

Dane Cook's delayed performance headed to the Fine Arts Center

Comedian/actor Dane Cook has earned acclaim for his unique and energetic stand-up act.

Comedian Dane Cook is set to perform a sold out show at the University of Massachusetts' Fine Arts Center Monday at 9:30 p.m.

The show was originally scheduled to take place this past Wednesday. It was rescheduled because Cook's airline flight was cancelled. Tickets purchased for the original date will be honored for the Feb. 2 show.

Dane Cook
FAC
Feb 2

If Monday is too long of a wait, relief is available in the form of Cook's DVD/CD combination pack "Harmful if Swallowed." It includes some of his famous animated antics from his most popular stand-up acts.

Cook may also be known for his appearance on, "Comedy Central Presents Dane Cook." In one particular routine Cook discussed how handy it would be to have acidic spit. He gets into detail about the disgust of homeless people making out. He shares the joys of the Burger King lounge and working at the drive-through window; apparently women make ordering a meal with pickles sound like they were about to molest him.

There are no boundaries to his physical comedy. It is anyone's guess what will come out of his mouth and into your ears via the microphone. Cook has even resorted to stripping down to his boxer-briefs to make a point while on stage. Cook's lady fans can only hope for such an extreme display this time around. This desire can be compared to that of those who watch auto racing for the chance of catching the tire that flies into the audience's face.

Cook has also started branching out into acting. His most recent role can be seen in the movie "Torque." Anyone who is familiar with Cook's work should know to expect nothing shy of an insanely intense performance. This show is sure to relieve any stress from the start of a new semester. Be prepared to laugh. People with weak bladders: consider yourselves warned.

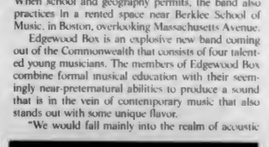
New band edges their way into the spotlight

By Cameron J. Woods
Collegian Staff

NEW BEDFORD — No longer are we separated from the outside world. Through electronic communication the world has become something akin to a vast village as opposed to the segmented sphere it once was. Taking full advantage of this new world is a band that is overcoming geographic separation to create their music.



Having its members split between Boston and Worcester while all enrolled in fulltime undergraduate study programs would have kept the bands of yesterday from ever functioning. However, with today's technology this spatial separation proved to be a minor obstacle for Edgewood Box.

Edgewood Box
'Leave of Absence'
Independent

Lead singer Jonathan Menard said, "I would just plug my guitar or keyboard into my computer and I would lay down something rough and then e-mail it to the others. We did this a couple of times and we would go back and forth to work it out." When school and geography permits, the band also practices in a rented space near Berklee School of Music, in Boston, overlooking Massachusetts Avenue.

Edgewood Box is an explosive new band coming out of the Commonwealth that consists of four talented young musicians. The members of Edgewood Box combine formal musical education with their seemingly near-preternatural abilities to produce a sound that is in the vein of contemporary music that also stands out with some unique flavor.

"We would fall mainly into the realm of acoustic rock, but all of our influences show through, from hardcore rock to softer music like Dave Matthews," said frontman Menard.

Jon Menard and the other three members of the band split their lives between music and their studies.

The band recently released its first album, "Leave of Absence." The seven-track disk showcases its talent not only as musicians, but as songwriters as well. "I wrote all of our song's lyrics and the music sort of filled itself in once we all sat down and worked at it," Menard said.

Rounding out the quartet are Hingham native Jonathan Chapman on drums and percussion, New Bedford native Robert Massoud on bass guitar and the out-of-towner, Atlanta, Ga. native and lead guitarist Mitchell Metcalf. Menard also hails from New Bedford and contributes piano and acoustic guitar in addition to lead vocals.

Having made the decision to make music in his life at the age of 11, Chapman has strived in everyway to become a good musician, not just a good drummer. Chapman has studied under some of the best percussion instructors in southern New England and his talents show the fruits of such labor. He is currently studying performance/modern songwriting and production at Berklee College of Music.

Massoud has studied music since the age of six when he started piano lessons. Around junior high he found the bass guitar and never looked back. After a couple of years of classical and jazz training he was playing professionally around the New Bedford area in all manner of genres. He is currently studying music production and engineering at Berklee.

Menard has taken the least formal musical education of all the members of the band, but that in no way diminishes his abilities as a musician. With his freeform style, Menard brings a feeling to the music, the spirit that can only come from someone who is making music not only from his instruments but from his heart as well. Being the only member of Edgewood Box not studying at Berklee, Menard suffers some good-natured ribbing from his bandmates.

As Chapman puts it, "There is very much a line here and we [Chapman, Massoud and Metcalf] are on this side and Jon is way over there. It is not just the schools, he is into everything that we aren't musically and this makes for some hard communication. I know it makes us stronger as a whole for being so diverse."

Menard is currently enrolled at Worcester Polytechnic Institute and is studying chemical engineering. "I have no clue how to explain why I am at WPI except that I simply love doing both the music and chemical engineering," he said.

Rounding out the group is Metcalf. He brings a harder edge to the band's slightly soft rock sound. Metcalf was originally brought into the band to hammer out some guitar solos, but chose to become a permanent member after playing with the other guys. "As soon as we all got together it just clicked: this is a good band. Then we played together and I knew for sure that I was a part of something that could be great," Metcalf said.

Observing Edgewood Box in practice sessions as well as live, it was easy to see that they were more than just a bunch of young musicians — they were a cohesive unit. They worked together in a harmony that could not exist with a group of people only playing for themselves.

Bassist Robert Massoud has trained his entire life to be a musician.

Massoud proved to be more than the just the band's bassist. When minor communication breakdowns would occur between Chapman and the other bandmates he would step in and mediate very quickly and efficiently.

Menard sometimes would take what they were doing a bit too seriously and at these moments it would be Chapman, Metcalf and Massoud who would lighten the mood through some good-natured sarcasm or a witty remark. "When I start to get a little too serious these guys bring me right back to reality," Menard said.

The band's name has a comical origin in a tiny error.

"My friend and I were coming back from Plymouth and we were just throwing out stupid band names and he reads this sign, Edgewood Boys," Menard said. "I thought that would be an awesome band name, when I told it to these guys they thought it was cool too but they heard 'box' instead of 'boy' and that was just how it stuck."

Edgewood Box came together with after Menard put the wheels in motion. The frontman decided that he wanted to put together a band. "I was practicing with my brother and a friend, but I needed people who could commit to the music. Then I remembered Rob Massoud."

Massoud continued the story and said, "After Jon called me up I gave it some thought and asked Mitchell and Jonathan, who I had met earlier in the year at Berklee, if they were interested. Then when we all got together and played. It just sounded and felt so right."

For more information about the band, how to get a copy of their debut album and updates on upcoming shows go to www.edgewoodbox.com.

'Mona Lisa Smile' leaves audiences smirking

By Jennifer Marcoullier
Collegian Correspondent

After watching "Mona Lisa Smile," you'll be glad the 1950s are long over — although some guys in the audience might regret the passing of the days when you could say of your soon-to-be wife that she's expected "to have dinner on the table by 5 o'clock" so she couldn't possibly go to law school.

Even with such hair-raising scenes like the aforementioned, "Mona Lisa Smile" weaves together images of art, academia and 1950s domesticity in a thought-provoking film that explores women's lives and choices.

Katherine Watson (Julia Roberts) is the new, bohemian art history teacher at conservative all-girls Wellesley College. It's the early 1950s and Katherine quickly finds that the best and brightest of the country's women want nothing more than to get married as soon as possible.

'Mona Lisa Smile'

Grade: B

What about after marriage, she questions student Joan Brandwyn (Julia Stiles). "Then I'll be married," replies Joan, utterly mystified about what else she would possibly do. Turns out Joan's always dreamed of law school, and Katherine encourages her to apply to Yale.

Katherine sets out to broaden the horizons of other students as well. Her most challenging case is the ultra-arrogant, uber-WASP Betty Warren (Kirsten Dunst) who's quite happy in her cocoon of privilege, thank you very much, resisting her teacher's attempts to soften and humanize her.

The film does not focus solely on Watson's quest to rehabilitate the brainwashed women of society's upper-echelon though. The movie also looks to the new professor's own weaknesses and struggles, mainly her inability to choose between her boyfriend back in native California and the handsome Italian professor at Wellesley (played by Dominic West).

Unfortunately, the Italian professor has a penchant for pretty undergraduates, which produces some of the most bizarre moments in the movie. Unlike today, in the world of Wellesley, 1953, having a student of the opposite sex in your dorm room could cause an uproar among the other students, but no one bats an eye at the obvious sexual relationship between a professor and his student.

After introducing the works of modern artists to her class, Katherine finds herself in trouble with the stodgy college administrators. She loves it at Wellesley, or so she tells us repeatedly, but will she compromise her values to stay there? Or will she, as the philandering Italian professor says, realize that she's pushing these young women into her own vision of life rather than letting them decide for themselves? In other words, maybe she'll discover that domesticity is a valid choice.

These are interesting questions and "Mona Lisa" does look to acknowledge them, particularly in a touching, heartfelt scene addressing the validity of different life paths. However, the movie inevitably invites comparison to the far superior film "Dead Poets Society" which was set in a similarly repressive era but at an all-boys prep school.

"Mona Lisa" lacks the power and drama of "Dead Poets." The emotional battles here don't have the same large scale — or dire —consequences. And there's no character transformation along the lines of shy Ethan Hawke standing on his desk shouting "O Captain, my Captain" to his departing teacher.

Ultimately, "Mona Lisa Smile" is a good movie and worth seeing. The performances delivered by the actresses are impressive and the world director Mike Newell creates on screen is compelling and well done, as are the few references to other reasons to be glad the '50s are over: illegal birth control, pretending homosexuality doesn't exist, the ultra-white student body. Although the emotional drama could have been more powerful, the film is still touching and thoughtful. And the images of women in the 1950s are themselves worth the price of admission.

Winter romances disappoint

Very little satisfaction can be found on the big screen

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

The only way to buy a romantic comedy is to believe in the couple at the center of the farce. You can pair any number of adorable stars together for that ultimate Hollywood premiere glow, but if there isn't, say, chemistry between the two then you might get something like the sodden miscasting of Luke Wilson and Kate Hudson as bickering would-be lovers in "Alex and Emma." Or you might just get Ben Stiller wooing Jennifer Aniston in a movie much like "Along Came Polly."

Stiller — a man who can scarcely go a movie without playing a wincing fussbudget neurotic — plays Reuben Feffer, top Risk Analyst at Indursky Insurance, a man who's job assessing risky behavior has led him to become an uncontrollably compulsive worry-wart. Reuben thinks he's found the least worrisome marriage partner in real estate agent Lisa (Debra Messing) — that is, until he finds her cheating on him on the second day of their honeymoon with a nudist scuba-diving instructor (a newly buff Hank Azaria, with a thick, plummy French accent). Dejected, Reuben slinks back to New York City to recover and decides to begin anew by asking out free-spirited Polly Prince (Aniston), a former middle school classmate he bumps into at an art gallery event.

It's believable that these two opposites would go on a first date together. What isn't feasible is that these two would ever go on a second date together, let alone fall in love. Reuben has irritable bowel syndrome; Polly takes him to an ethnic Moroccan restaurant. Can you guess what happens? Jokes abound involving an aging, blind ferret, Reuben's weak bowels and the embarrassing process of "sharting." The writer-director, John Hamburg, comes off like a one-man Farrelly brothers wannabe, piling the crudities on top of the supposedly sweet romance. But when the romance isn't believable the whole mess comes crashing down.

'Chasing Liberty'
Directed by Andy Cadiff
Starring Mandy Moore, Matthew Goode
Warner Bros
Rated PG-13
120 mins.
Grade C

For the life of me, I couldn't tell what Polly sees in such an irritatingly obsessive, insecure, controlling dork. The senselessness of it all may stem from the fact that Polly is a nerd's idealized dream of a free-spirited woman.

The cast also includes Alec Baldwin, channeling too many obnoxious-Jew stereotypes as Reuben's boss, Bryan Brown as an Australian mogul and adventurer and Phillip Seymour Hoffman, getting in touch with his inner Jack Black as Reuben's cheerful vulgar friend — another witless, unbelievable relationship. Stiller was hilarious doing this routine in "There's Something About Mary" and funny in "Meet the Parents." Here he suggests the excruciating experience of watching the Farrelly brothers with a lobotomy.

Sometimes all a movie needs is the right casting to make it sparkle. "Win A Date With Tad Hamilton!" is a sweet, cheerful, unexpectedly sharp romantic comedy in which Rosalee Futch (Kate Bosworth), a good girl in the small West Virginia hamlet of Frasier's Bottom, wins a chance to go out on a date with the Hollywood "It boy" Tad Hamilton (Josh Duhamel, of the TV series "Las Vegas") much to the chagrin of her loyal, secretly-in-love-with-her friend Pete (Topher Grace, "That '70's Show.")

It sounds like the silliest and slightest of ideas to come down the date movie pike in a long time, but the movie — surprise! — is a pleasant sitcom triangle. It helps that the three leads make it go down easy. Bosworth, a charming blonde with actual acting chops, is practically iridescent as the glowing Rosalee — conveying the humor, heart and vulnerability beneath her character's perky façade. Grace, with his acid-tongued smart-aleckiness, comes off like a younger, more caustic Tom Hanks and makes for a credible romantic lead. Duhamel, meanwhile, has the smarts not to play the womanizing Tad as a slimy Hollywood slickster, but as an essentially good man unfortunately wrapped up the glib shallowness of his lifestyle. Duhamel's performance gives the movie, as predictable as its outcome is, a frisson of suspense; after all, it's quite easy to see Rosalee end up with either man.

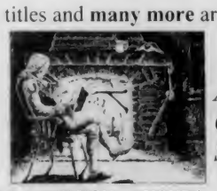
Nathan Lane and Sean Hayes scatter a few laughs around as Tad's handlers (both named Richard Levy) and director Robert Luketic displays the same light-fingered, appealing touch that he did with "Legally Blonde." But it's the acuity of Victor Levin's script and the performances of Duhamel, Bosworth and Grace that make "Tad" a date worth keeping.

The young couple falling in love over the course of "Chasing Liberty" help the movie float along for awhile too; unfortunately, they end up sinking with the ship. The movie is one of those pre-teen girl fairy tales that always seem to end up starring some sort of bubblegum pop star, in this case, teen princess Mandy Moore. As it happens though, Moore also happens to be a genuine actress. Here she's paired with the tall, dark and handsome Brit newcomer Matthew Goode, who has a deep rumble of a voice and the airy charm of Hugh Grant. Watching these two together, it's easy to believe that Moore, with her winsome smile, and Goode could actually fall in love. If only the movie had as much chemistry as its stars.

If only it had the drama and laughs too. For a while, "Chasing Liberty" is a tolerable, if empty, bit of little girl fluff in which Moore's rebellious First Daughter — see, she's sick of having daddy's Secret Service goons hovering around on her dates — escapes during a Roots concert and hops on the back of Goode's scooter. The two trundle around photogenic European locales — there are plenty postcard-pretty visions of Prague, Vienna and Berlin — falling in and out and back into love. What Goode can't tell her (what's meant to give us a jolt of romantic suspense) is that he's really an agent ordered to watch over Moore, in order to give her a sense of freedom.



'Along Came Polly'

Universal

Unfortunately, "Chasing Liberty" — a movie too lightweight to last much longer then, oh, 90 minutes — is stretched to an interminable two hours. It's a wan, pallid, overlong romance sparkled with bits and pieces of moments that could genuinely come off as engaging.

Moore doesn't really stretch her acting muscles here — she's all Pepsodent smile and perk — but it's hard not to like her; she positively radiates likeability. So too does Goode, who has the good sense to play his love interest role with a touch of dry humor. But the duo is constantly pulled through scenarios that have no heft to them; the movie evaporates into thin air.

And they're addled by a lethargic supporting cast that includes Mark Harmon as a not-very-presidential president and Jeremy Piven and Annabella Sciorra, flirting tepidly, as a Secret Service team hot on Moore's trail — talk about a pair without chemistry. Romance may be at the center of "Chasing Liberty," but movies like this aren't worth chasing around.

hospital.

"I was pretty excited to come back, I haven't played in three weeks or so, and any time you're that excited to come back and play, you're going to play your hardest," Mauldin said. "It was an up-tempo game, guys were going hard, and we haven't played at home in a while, so guys were ready to play."

"It wasn't pretty, it was a labor to get through it," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "Thank goodness for Greg's return, Tommy Pöck being able to make big plays, Gabe being solid in net, a skill player like Stephen Werner putting one in the net and Nick Kuiper being I think the best defensive defenseman in the league."

James Solon struck gold for the Minutemen at 6:11 of the first. Greg Mauldin took an outlet pass from Thomas Pöck, streaked up the left wing boards, and fired a wrister that Gibson stopped, leaving a rebound in the slot which Solon zipped under the recovering goaltender to make it 1-0.

Tomorrow night, the Minutemen welcome another Hockey East squad, Merrimack, to the Mullins Center for the first contest of the three-game regular season series. UMass leads, 2-0, thanks to two impressive wins in November. Gabe Winer earned his first career shutout in game one, a 2-0 UMass win on Nov. 7 at Merrimack's Volpe Center. The next night in Amherst, the Minutemen won their fourth straight game with a 5-3 victory.

Runners on track

Last week was certainly busy for the University of Massachusetts women's track; the team competed in two meets before vacation was even over. Boston University was the team's first destination, as they contended against Boston College, Boston University and Sacred Heart on Tuesday Jan. 21.

Boston College skirted by the Minutewomen to claim first place with 101 points, but UMass managed a second with 64 points. Boston University was close behind with 58 points, and Sacred Heart followed with 30 points.

UMass dominated the short sprints, with two excellent performances from Christina Huff. Huff took it away, placing first in the 55meter dash, and Kishana Hudson and Troyanah Evans placed third and fourth, respectively. Huff continued to win the 200 meter, and Elisabeth Budd and Hudson followed in third and fourth. Stace Brown and Shannon Williams placed well in the 400 meter, while Budd, Shannon Jackson and Jennifer Leahy earned third, fifth and eighth place respectively in the 500 meter.

The distance events revealed some excellent performances as well. Denise DiPaolo earned a seventh place in the 800 meter, while Alexis Anzelone and Kate Markopoulos ran sixth and seventh places in the 1000 meter, one of the most difficult events. Markopoulos and Anzelone also teamed up for the mile run, with impressive seventh and eighth place efforts in the event. Veterans Amanda Dahlberg and Tricia Silva, along with newcomer Cuisle Kierans, took care of the 3000 meter, placing sixth, eighth, and ninth.

Jackson and Crystal Therrien performed well in the hurdles, clocking 8.66 and 9.28 seconds, a good score for third and sixth place. For the jumping events, Ashley Creel and Katelyn O'Toole led the way in the high jump, both clearing 5'3" for first and second place. Chante Soares continued her excellent season in the long jump, earning second place. Next were Evans and Cheri Soares, in fourth and fifth. Jessica Curran was the sole UMass competitor in the triple jump, placing seventh, and UMass competed well in the throwing events, with Marissa Oliviera and Therrien in the shot put, and Sara Johnson and Jennifer Iasiello in the weight throw.

The Minutewomen traveled next to Rhode Island on Jan. 23, to place fifth out of seven teams at URI's home meet. Powerhouse UConn won the meet with 203 points, and Yale, Rhode Island and Maine finished in front of fifth place UMass.

Huff won the 55 meter dash again, and Hudson and Williams represented the team in the 200 meter. Brown, Budd and Jackson competed in the 400 and 500 meter races.

The usual suspects manned the distance events. Kristen Ford, DiPaolo and Nastaran Shams ran 2:26.86, 2:30.04 and 2:35.43 respectively in the 800meter. Loren Donohue earned points for the team in the 1000 meter, placing eighth with 3:12.39. Anzelone took it away with a time of 5:34.82 in the mile, while Kierans, Dahlberg and Silva all clocked just over 11 minutes in the 3000 meter.

Shannon Jackson placed well in the hurdles, and Creel and Therrien got some points in the high jump. Cheri Soares competed in the long jump, while Chante Soares and Curran placed sixth and eighth in the triple jump. Oliviera, Iasiello and Johnson stepped up to call the shots in the throwing events as well.

Today the Maroon and White compete at the Reggie Lewis Track in Boston at the Adidas Boston Indoor Games, a larger scale meet than their previous endeavors.

Swimming team rolls

By Matt Barstow
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts swimming and diving teams expect a positive turnout for Saturday's "Senior Day" meet versus Fordham, set for 1 p.m. in Boyden Gymnasium. The meet will act as a farewell to four Minutemen seniors who will compete in their last regular season meet before defending the Atlantic 10 title they have held for the past three years.

The Minutemen (4-1) are coming off a 151-135 point loss to Southern Connecticut St., Jan. 18. The 16-point difference may have been overcome if the team hadn't been forced to sacrifice several points, which were forfeited because all UMass divers were away on a training exercise.

"I hold myself partially responsible for the loss," men's coach Russ Yarworth said. "We started off in the hole because of our divers, but the A-10's are what matters the most, and the dual meets basically serve as preparation for tournament time."

After losing to Southern Connecticut St. for the first time in over 35 years, UMass rebounded by crushing Boston College 197-101 on Jan. 24.

Freshman sprinter Even Swisher dominated against Boston College, taking gold in four events. Swisher won the 100 and 200-yard backstroke races with times of 53.32 and 1:52.76, respectively. He was also victorious in the 200-yard individual medley (1:58.51). The Vermont native finished the day by swimming a leg on the first-place 200-yard medley relay team. Swisher's efforts earned him the honor of UMass Athlete of the Week.

Also leading the Minutemen was fellow freshman Greg Chartier, who won the 500 and 1,000-yard freestyle events, with times of 4:51.23 and 10:02.58, respectively.

But for a team often led by freshmen in the scoring department, attention will shift toward the team's upperclassmen on Saturday.

"Saturday's race is a final tune-up for the A-10's, and we're hoping everyone is sharp," Yarworth said. "We'll be tipping our hats to the accomplished seniors, but we still need to go out and compete."

For the women, a Fordham team that is 8-2, and 3-0 in the A-10, poses a serious obstacle. The Minutewomen view Saturday's race as an opportunity to feel-out a Ram team that will most likely enter the February 19th Conference Championships as the favorite.

In Saturday's loss to Boston College, senior tri-captain Lauren Rowell and sophomore Aimee Bourassa tallied the team's lone victories. Rowell, the teams backstroke specialist, finished the 100-yard back in 1:01.23. Bourassa's time of 1:59.22 in the 200-yard free was good for first.

The duo duplicated their success on Sunday, as they led the Maroon and White to victory in a tri-meet against Southern and Central Connecticut State.

Rowell won both backstroke events, with times of 2:14.43 and 1:02.24 in the 100 and 200-yard distances, respectively. Bourassa's time of 10:51.74 in the 1,000-yard free was good for first.

Dodgers sold to McCourt

BY JOHN NADEL
ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES (AP) — The $430 million sale of the Los Angeles Dodgers from News Corp. to Boston real estate developer Frank McCourt was unanimously approved Thursday by baseball owners.

"Welcome to a new era of Dodger baseball," McCourt said at a Dodger Stadium news conference. "I intend to restore the glory days of Dodger baseball with a team worthy of support from our fans. We've committed not just to buy this team, but to win a world championship."

The Dodgers haven't won a postseason game since winning the 1988 World Series.

"That's way too long," McCourt said. "My first objective is to end the drought. I truly know I can provide the leadership that this team needs to win."

The price is the second-highest for a baseball team, trailing only the $660 million paid for the Boston Red Sox two years ago. The highly leveraged purchase, likely to be completed within a week, probably will set off the third change in management in six years for the marquee franchise, which hasn't qualified for the playoffs since 1996.

"The Dodgers are one of our great franchises," commissioner Bud Selig said in a telephone interview. "We need stability there. We need a lot of energy. Having an unresolved ownership situation was, frankly, hurting the franchise."

McCourt said his wife, Jamie, will be vice chairman of the team, and Corey Busch, who helped negotiate the purchase, will be part of the front office.

"While today is not the day to talk about specific personnel changes, I do want to say I plan to act quickly and decisively to make the changes I feel necessary to get to our goal," McCourt said.

The O'Malley family controlled the Dodgers for nearly 48 years before selling to News Corp. in March 1998. The corporation quickly tired of running the club, and former movie executive Robert Daly took over as chief executive officer in October 1999 after purchasing a minority stake.

Daly has said he will depart when the sale closes. McCourt refused to discuss the futures of team president Bob Graziano, general manager Dan Evans and manager Jim Tracy. The Dodgers report to spring training on Feb. 18.

Los Angeles finished second in the NL West last season at 85-77 despite the worst offense in the major leagues. Still, the Dodgers drew over 3 million fans for the eighth straight year.

McCourt, 50, who believes the Dodgers were a bargain, says he will pay over $200 million in cash in the purchase. He emphasized he wants the Dodgers to win immediately and plans to pay what's necessary to do so. Los Angeles finished with a $113.2 million payroll last year.

"We're going to have a $100 million-plus payroll," he said. "We're going to sign a guy who can hit."

He promised other changes as well.

With the sale pending, the Dodgers made few moves during the offseason. Their only free-agent additions were right-handers Rick White and Jose Lima and infielder Jose Hernandez, who agreed to minor league contracts, and Bubba Trammell, who's expected to come off the bench.

Meanwhile, just down the Santa Ana Freeway, the 2002 World Series champion Anaheim Angels added pitchers Bartolo Colon and Kelvin Escobar and outfielders Vladimir Guerrero and Jose Guillen.

McCourt, whose grandfather was part owner of the Boston Braves, announced Oct. 10 he had agreed to buy the team along with Dodger Stadium and adjoining real estate, plus training facilities in Vero Beach, Fla., and the Dominican Republic.

He had lengthy talks with officials of the commissioner's office and other owners, who were concerned about the amount of debt in the deal. News Corp. will retain a minority stake.

Selig is convinced McCourt has the money to make the team successful.

"We have more stringent ownership rules than we've ever had," Selig said. "The banks were satisfied. We were satisfied. There's no doubt in my mind that he is will be a good owner of a very storied franchise."

The All-American pastime

BY EDDIE PELLS
ASSOCIATED PRESS

HOUSTON — "You may be wondering," the smiling lady said, "just exactly what the NFL, Breathe-Right nasal strips and snoring all have in common."

To tell the truth, nobody really was wondering.

The 100 or so people at the publicity event more or less accepted the fact that the marriage between the three was legit. It is, after all, Super Bowl week, and snoring, nasal strips and football didn't make any more, or less, sense being thrown together than chips, dip and an ice-cold can of beer.

In fact, no marketing ploy, publicity stunt or other show of excess surprises many people at the Super Bowl anymore. It is the nation's biggest "unofficial" holiday, an extravaganza of American revelry and indulgence that celebrates not so much football, as America's ability to celebrate.

You take an event centered on TV, lubricated by beer and junk food, add the gambling element, drop it in a perfect spot on the calendar, and you've got the perfect American holiday," said Bob Thompson, professor of television and pop culture at Syracuse University.

Who's playing? Who cares?

Some 137 million people — about half the nation's population — are expected to watch at least six minutes of it on TV. About 86 million will watch in much bigger chunks.

Frito-Lay has increased corn and potato production by 10 million pounds; about 33 percent more than they'd go through during an average week. Americans will spend about $2.5 million on canned chili beans this week, double what they would usually spend.

In a somewhat fanciful estimate, one number-crunching company says corporate America will suffer an $821 million loss in worker productivity due to people standing by the water cooler talking about the game.

But they don't just talk about the game. In fact, they may not talk about the game at all.

It's the Lingerie Bowl (on another network), the halftime show, the premiere of a new season of "Survivor" when the game is over, and the commercials — if you miss them, you'll simply be left out of the conversation on Monday — that make the Super Bowl what it is.

The past decade has brought the proliferation of cable channels and the decline of the once-sacrosanct network television ratings. Not this Sunday, though.

"The rating is pretty much bulletproof," CBS Sports president Sean McManus said.

The matchup, Carolina versus New England, barely matters, McManus said. Naturally, CBS would love a close game. But McManus conceded the difference between a close game and a blowout will probably only be the difference in about 3 ratings points — in other words, the difference between one of the 10 most-watched shows in the history of TV and just something in the top 40.

Because of the popularity of "Survivor," which will air after the game, McManus knew early in the week that Sunday would be the highest-producing revenue day in television history, at about $160 million. Super Bowl ads are pricing at an average of $2.3 million per 30 seconds.

"There is nothing else like the Super Bowl. It's watercooler, it's an event," Donna Wolfe of the Universal McCann ad agency said.

So when, exactly, did the Super Bowl turn into this?

When did a game that began as something of an exhibition between two rival leagues — the first "AFL-NFL Championship Game" between Green Bay and Kansas City didn't even sell out — turn into a cultural phenomenon that brings people together the same way Thanksgiving and Christmas do?

"The ratings for the Super Bowl have been pretty high for a long time," Thompson said. "But I don't know. I'd say somewhere around five or six years ago, the whole thing hit some new cultural plateau, and you can't really judge it by numbers."

Still, some numbers are worth mentioning.

By unofficial count, there are 87 "official" NFL parties, events and concerts scheduled for Houston, the Super Bowl city, to say nothing of the "unofficial" events and availabilities: Playboy is throwing a party, Superagent Leigh Steinberg is, too. Dr. Herbert Lepor, chairman of the urology department at New York University Medical Center, is available for interviews about erectile dysfunction. The hook? He says the discussion is timely because men might be confused by the barrage of Super Bowl ads for the various Viagras available on the market these days.

But the promotions don't stop there. Almost everyone wants to get their name attached to the Super Bowl in some way.

UMass topples Huskies

BY ANDREW MERRITT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

So much for rust.

After nearly two weeks off, and 25 days since its last home game, the Massachusetts hockey team entered a dangerous game last night, against a conference foe that has improved on its early-season struggles.

However, the Minutemen dispatched the Northeastern Huskies, 4-2 in front of 3,449 at the Mullins Center. UMass improves to 12-7-5 overall, with an 8-5-2 Hockey East record, good for sole possession of third place heading into the weekend. Northeastern, meanwhile, falls to 7-12-4 in the conference (ninth), with a 2-10-3 overall mark.

After a choppy first period, UMass broke the game open in the second, with two goals in 32 seconds. Greg Mauldin began the fun when he took a feed from Tim Vitek in the neutral zone, and skated in past the blue line, where he fired a heat-seeker over Northeastern goaltender Keni Gibson's right shoulder to make it 2-0 at 4:18.

Stephen Werner followed up at 4:50 with the eventual game winner. He camped out in front of the net to Gibson's right, and although Gibson (14 saves) stopped Werner's initial attempt, the rebound came right back to him, and he reloaded, converting on the Minutemen's third goal of the night. Chris Capraro earned an assist on the play.

Northeastern showed its first sign of life with 8:39 to go in the middle frame. Brian Swiniarski fired a slap shot off an Eric Ortlip pass, and it trickled through UMass netminder Gabe Winer's pads, making it 3-1 UMass.

Senior Thomas Pöck punctuated the Minutemen's scoring with a power play tally 31 seconds into the third. After a turnover in the UMass zone, the Minutemen honed in on Gibson, with four skaters up against one Northeastern defenseman. Pöck slipped the puck to Werner, who quickly sent it back to the defenseman. From there, Pöck came in on Gibson's net, made a pretty deke past a diving defender, and roofed it over Gibson's right shoulder.

Jon Awe scored at 11:30 of the third for NU, cutting UMass' lead to two. A loose puck deflected off a skate to his stick, and Awe shoveled a low wrister past Winer (19 saves). The Huskies couldn't add another, however.

Three UMass skaters — Pöck, Werner, and Mauldin — notched multiple points, each with a goal and an assist. Add to that Capraro's assist, and four of the top five UMass scorers made their marks last night. Mauldin played his first game since leaving the Jan. 3 game against UMass Lowell after a devastating collision that sent him to the Senior Thomas Pöck scored the final goal in the Minutemen's 4-2 victory over Northeastern last night. UMass returns to action Saturday against Merrimack at the Mullins Center for a 7 p.m. face-off.

O'Brien loss puts Celtics on brink

Dan Lamothe

With John O'Brien's resignation as head coach of the Boston Celtics this week, it has become painfully obvious how director of basketball operations Danny Ainge plans to rebuild his squad.

The lottery.

Since Ainge took over last May, he's made a series of questionable trades, gaffes and blunders. First and foremost is the noticeable absence of career Celtic Antoine Walker from this year's squad.

Yes, Walker shot too many 3-pointers. Yes, Walker was not in the best of shape. But he also bought into the system, unselfishly deferring to Paul Pierce as the Celtics' top scoring option while rallying the Celtics role players defensively. Walker may not have been a great one-on-one defender, but he was the unquestioned leader of a strong defensive unit.

But perhaps that one can slide. Ainge took a roll of the dice by trading Walker, reasoning the Celtics were too strapped for cash to make another leap in talent, and had no realistic chance of ever competing with Western Conference teams for the NBA title. There's no doubt the Celtics didn't get an even swap with the Dallas Mavericks in the Walker trade, but at least that one can be written off as being bold and being willing to start over.

The next big Ainge move was a little tougher to swallow. While sending Walker to Dallas could have been argued to be a move for at bettering the team long-term if you agreed with Ainge's assessment that the Celtics had hit a competitive ceiling, the packaging of Tony Battie and Eric Williams with Kedrick Brown — two selfless, hard-working veterans who rubbed off positively on younger teammates — for a collection of players who, like it or not, could do nothing to right a sinking ship in Cleveland and keep the 17-win Cavaliers competitive last year.

But even that one has worked out, to a point. Ricky Davis, the centerpiece of the trade for the Celtics, has proven to be a much more heady player than Boston fans ever thought he could have been, accepting a demotion to the bench as a sixth man before he even put on a Celtics uniform and playing team-oriented basketball that has included several clutch shots down the stretches of tough games, including a game-winner in Phoenix with 2.8 seconds left last month.

O'Brien's resignation, though, makes it even harder to back any positives that have come out of the Celtics' trades. It makes the truth painfully obvious — if O'Brien, a no-name coach three years ago who took two star players and a collection of role players and misfits to the 2002 Eastern Conference finals, doesn't feel like he can win with the ever-changing crew he's been handed, how in the world does this team have a prayer of competing with any kind of success?

Without O'Brien, the Celtics have been stripped of any kind of identity. Paul Pierce is now the only thing holding the team even to mediocrity. With the talent, experience and character Ainge has stripped away, Pierce is the only thing left holding this time even to the level of mediocrity.

The O'Brien Celtics of the last few years shot too many 3-pointers, had few consistent threats night-to-night, were shaky at point guard and had no consistent inside scoring threat. The strengths of the team were undeniable, though, and frequently overshadowed the weaknesses: the squad played tough, tight defense, used interchangeable parts to produce positive team results and possessed a passion and spirit that should make any member of Celtics dynasty team from yesteryear proud.

What they're left with now is ugly, and it is probably only going to get worse. Will Ricky Davis continue to be content with being a role player when the man who got him to buy into that plan — O'Brien — is gone? Will the team continue to play hard-nosed defense night in and night out, especially if Ainge continues to ship out the cogs in the engine that made that defense work? The answers aren't good, which means it's more likely to see the Celtics in the lottery two or three years from now than in the playoffs.

Jim O'Brien will land on his feet. He's a smart, unassuming man who knows the game in and out and gets players to buy into playing hard and playing for the best interests of the team. Few teams are lucky enough to have that.

The future for Boston isn't nearly so bright. Here's hoping Danny Ainge understands what he's doing and what kind of chemistry a team like the one he is putting together right now will have. The way it looks now, it's a matter of time before Celtics fans are wishing on their lucky ping-pong balls.

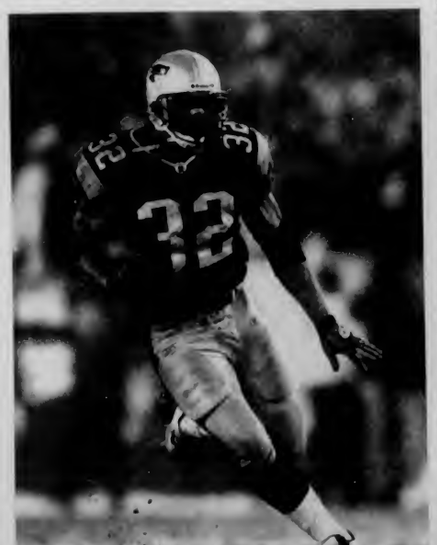
An epic battle of the Titans



BY DAVE GOLDBERG
ASSOCIATED PRESS

HOUSTON (AP) — If the Carolina Panthers win the Super Bowl, it will be with power. If the New England Patriots win, it will be with finesse, deception, intimidation and experience.

So while Sunday's NFL championship game may not feature football's biggest stars, it could be a fascinating chess match between two of the game's headiest coaches — accomplished grandmaster Bill Belichick of New England and Carolina's quickly ascending John Fox.

Don't look for glamorous quarterbacks. The most famous are otherwise occupied. Joe Montana is making a promotional tour and John Elway is certain to be voted into the Pro Football Hall of Fame this weekend.

Sunday's QBs are the quietly efficient Tom Brady of New England, who may someday be in that class, and Jake Delhomme of Carolina, who almost surely won't. Delhomme spent six seasons on the bench in New Orleans and was even a backup in NFL Europe.

JIM ROGASH/GETTY IMAGES/ASSOCIATED PRESS

Patriots running back Antowain Smith carries the ball during the AFC championship game. The Patriots take on the Carolina Panthers in Super Bowl XXXVIII in Houston.

So look to Belichick and Fox, both defensive masterminds. That could make this one of the lowest-scoring Super Bowls since the days when the Roman numerals were in single digits: Between 1969 and 1975, only one loser scored more than seven points.

"It's going to be a street fight," said Carolina defensive tackle Kris Jenkins, an All-Pro in just his third NFL season.

The contestants approach the game from different perspectives.

The Patriots, Super Bowl champions two seasons ago, have won their last 14 games, including a 24-14 victory over Indianapolis in the AFC title game. No surprise. They were one of the preseason favorites.

Carolina, on the other hand, was 1-15 two seasons ago when Brady and the Pats were winning the title. Their final loss of that season, in fact, was a 38-6 thumping by New England.

Fox took over last season and the Panthers finished 7-9, then won the NFC South at 11-5 this season. They won three playoff games to get here, the last two on the road — a double overtime in St. Louis and in Philadelphia to win the NFC championship.

"The landscape in the NFL being the way it is, you can go from the outhouse to the penthouse pretty quickly," Fox said. "You just have to make sure you slam the outhouse door behind you."

The question is whether they will get to the penthouse or simply stop at a luxury suite in 2-year-old Reliant Stadium, where the game will be played.

The contrast starts at quarterback.

Brady doesn't scramble like Elway or gamble like Brett Favre. By NFL standards, his arm is just average and he sometimes seems embarrassed to be considered a celebrity.

"He's a star who doesn't want to be a star," Patriots owner Robert Kraft said.

But he dinks and dunks the opposition to death — quick outs on first down that set up second down and short. It's New England's version of the running game it lacked until Antowain Smith started coming on late in the season.

Then, with the defense creeping up, he goes over the top (as he did in the playoff win over Tennessee), hitting Bethel Johnson in stride for a 41-yard touchdown.

Delhomme had thrown just 86 passes in six seasons when he joined the Panthers.

But he has been extremely efficient since taking over from Rodney Peete in the second half of the season-opener against Jacksonville and rallying the Panthers from a 17-0 deficit to a 24-23 victory. Overall, he led the team to seven victories in the last quarter or overtime.

Still, if Delhomme is the main man for Carolina on Sunday, the Panthers will lose; they must move the ball on the ground behind Stephen Davis, foolishly released by Washington and quickly snapped up by Carolina.

Davis, who rushed for 1,444 yards, has been one of the NFL's top power backs for a half-decade — an inside runner with the speed to break a big play. His backup, DeShaun Foster, could start for many NFL teams and provides outside speed.

"Running is the strength of their team. Stopping the run is one of the many strengths of our team," New England linebacker Ted Bruschi said. "It is going to be strength versus strength."

Concentrate on the word "many" in Bruschi's comment.

New England is successful because it may be the only team without a discernible weakness in an era when the salary cap leaves most teams so thin that any injury can lead to a serious collapse. The Patriots had plenty of injuries this season, but they're still 16-2 because they had enough cap room to sign decent backups who stepped right in with no falloff.

If the offense is efficient because Brady is efficient, the defense is even more complex than it was two years ago, when it shut down the Rams and their "Greatest Show on Turf."

Designed and perfected by Belichick, it has succeeded in confusing co-MVPs Peyton Manning of the Colts and Steve McNair of Tennessee in two playoff wins. Manning, who had thrown eight touchdown passes without an interception in his previous two playoff games, was picked off four times in the AFC title game.

Only 350-pound-plus run-stuffer Ted Washington is sure to be a down lineman — even All-Pro tackle Richard Seymour sometimes drops into pass coverage. The linebackers are all multiskilled — Bruschi, Willie McGinest and Mike Vrabel all have been linemen at different times in their careers.

So if the Patriots had Manning throwing off his back foot — "happy feet" is the term applied to a harried QB — what will they do to the inexperienced Delhomme?

Well, Carolina also has a matchup advantage on defense.

The Panthers' front four of Jenkins, Julius Peppers, Brentson Buckner and Mike Rucker may be the best in the NFL and backup Al Wallace could be a starter elsewhere.

Hajj again marred by tragedy

By RAWYA RAGEH
ASSOCIATED PRESS

MINA, Saudi Arabia (AP) — At least 244 people were trampled to death and hundreds more hurt yesterday under the crush of worshippers in one of the deadliest disasters during the annual Muslim pilgrimage to Saudi Arabia.

The stampede occurred during the stoning of the devil, an emotional and notoriously perilous hajj ritual. Pilgrims frantically throw rocks, shout insults or hurl their shoes at three stone pillars — acts that are supposed to demonstrate their deep disdain for Satan.

Safety measures were in place at the site — one where fatal stampedes have been frequent — but "caution isn't stronger than fate," said Saudi Hajj Minister Iyad Madani. "All precautions were taken to prevent such an incident, but this is God's will."

The stampede broke out on one of two ramps leading to the 50-foot stone pillars. Tens of thousands of people were on the upper-most ramp, which is about the width of a five-lane highway.

Authorities said a few pilgrims fell, causing panic as pressure built up in the crowd behind.

Brig. Mansour al-Turki of the Saudi General Security Forces said about 10,000 general security officers were on duty in the area at the time.

Their intervention "resulted in containing the pushing toward the pillar to prevent more pilgrims from falling," an unidentified Saudi Interior Ministry official said, the state-run Saudi Press Agency reported.

The same area was the scene of similar deadly incidents in 1998,

Patriots win second trophy in three years

By DAVE GOLDBERG

HOUSTON (AP) — Houston, we have a champion. And once again, the New England Patriots have Adam Vinatieri's foot to thank for a Super Bowl victory.

Vinatierl gave New England its second NFL championship in three seasons with a 41-yard field goal with four seconds left for a thrilling 32-29 victory over the Carolina Panthers on Sunday night.

Vinatieri earlier missed a field goal and had another one blocked. But as he did in 2002 when he kicked the winning field goal to beat St. Louis on the final play of the Super Bowl, he proved he is perhaps the NFL's best clutch kicker.

For a contest that was scoreless for a record 27 minutes, this game was one of the all-time offensive shows between two of the NFL's best defenses.

There were 37 points scored in the fourth quarter alone and Tom Brady, who led New England on its winning drive, was 32-of-48 for 354 yards and three touchdowns.

Brady was voted the game's MVP for the second time in three seasons, although he did throw an interception that prevented New England from winning more easily.

"There have been some heart attacks, but they've come out on top," said coach Bill Belichick, whose team won its 15th straight game.

Carolina had tied the game at 29 with its third fourth-quarter TD on a 12-yard pass from Jake Delhomme to Ricky Proehl with 1:08 left. Then John Kasay kicked the ball out of bounds to give New England field position at its own 40.

Brady moved the Patriots 37 yards in six plays, hitting Deion Branch to set up Vinatieri's winning kick.

"I looked up and it was going right down the middle," he said.

The kick prevented the Super Bowl from going into overtime for the first time ever.

The Patriots led 14-10 at the half, and after a scoreless third quarter, they made it 21-10 on the second play of the fourth on a two-yard run by Antowain Smith. It capped an eight-play, 71-yard drive featuring a 33-yard pass from Brady to tight end Daniel Graham.

Carolina wasn't about to give up, though, scoring on DeShaun Foster's 33-yard run on a six-play, 81-yard drive. But the 2-point conversion pass was behind Muhsin Muhammad and it was 21-16. The decision to go for 2 would come back to haunt coach John Fox.

The Patriots seemed ready to put the game away when they got the ball back, but Brady made a rare mistake — throwing an off-balance pass that Reggie Howard intercepted in the end zone.

Following the Patriots' win, a gathering turned raucous when a crowd in the Southwest Living Area threw bottles, lit fires and set off fireworks before scattering around 11:30 p.m.

Police disperse Super Bowl celebration

By ERIKA LOVLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A large disturbance took place in Southwest Residential Area on the University of Massachusetts campus following the New England Patriots' Super Bowl victory over the Carolina Panthers last night, resulting in at least two arrests.

Around 10:40 p.m., several hundred students filled the Southwest quad in celebration, chanting "Yankees suck" and "Go Patriots." People in the crowd threw rolls of toilet paper, plastic bottles, and snow.

A smoke canister and several fireworks were set off at around 10:50 p.m. in the crowd, with sparks showering down on several people. Several students crowd surfed, and at least four girls exposed their chests. A small fire was started using a poster for fuel, and bottles, cans and other debris dropped from the windows in George Washington Tower and other dormitories.

Police in riot gear fired rounds of pepperball into the crowd about 10 minutes after UMass police gave a dispersal order over loudspeaker at 11:05 p.m.

"If you are out here when we give the dispersal order, you are putting yourself in harm's way," said Barbara O'Connor, UMass police chief.

At least three police horses, five police dogs, and 30 officers in riot gear lined up along the right side of Washington Tower. The crowd was nearly clear by 11:30 p.m., with only two small groups of people remaining.

UMPD was unavailable for comment. No official arrest numbers or injury reports were available at press time.

The last similar disturbance on the UMass campus took place on October 17, 2003, after the Boston Red Sox lost Game 7 of the American League Championship Series. It ended in 15 arrests and damage to campus building windows and cars as a crowd of 100 ran up Massachusetts Avenue.

When the Patriots won the Super Bowl in 2002, an estimated 3,000 to 4,000 people met in Southwest to celebrate. According to Collegian archives, the gathering quickly turned rowdy, with several fires set, fireworks discharged and cans and bottles thrown at UMPD.

Several people broke into Berkshire Dining Commons, and O'Connor told the Collegian that injury numbers were difficult to determine because so many people did not report their injuries. She called them the "walking wounded."

Suicide bombers kill more than 50 in northern Iraq

By SCHEHEREZADE FARAMARZI
ASSOCIATED PRESS

IRBIL, Iraq (AP) — Two suicide bombers with explosives wired to their bodies struck the offices of the country's two main Kurdish parties in nearly simultaneous attacks yesterday, killing at least 56 people and wounding more than 235 in the deadliest assault in Iraq in six months.

The attacks struck in the Kurdish heartland and took a heavy toll among senior leaders of Iraq's most pro-American ethnic group.

Elsewhere, an American soldier was killed and 12 were wounded in a rocket attack on a logistics base in Balad, 50 miles north of Baghdad, the U.S. command said. The death raised to 523 the number of U.S. service members who have died since the Iraq conflict began in March.

The Irbil attackers slipped into the offices of the Kurdistan Democratic Party and the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan along with hundreds of well-wishers gathering for the Muslim holiday of Eid al-Adha, or the Feast of Sacrifice.

Leaders of both parties, whose militias fought alongside U.S. soldiers during the invasion of Iraq last year, were receiving hundreds of visitors to mark the start of the four-day holiday when the blasts went off.

Guards said they did not search people because of the tradition of receiving guests during the holiday. Neither party's top leader — Jalal Talabani of the PUK and Massoud Barzani of the KDP — was in Irbil when the attacks occurred.

Although Iraq has suffered numerous suicide bombings in recent months, the attack Sunday marked the first time perpetrators have worn explosives rather than using vehicles.

Sunday's blasts came a day after a car bomb outside a police station in the northern city of Mosul killed at least nine people. Hours later, a mortar attack hit a Baghdad neighborhood, killing five people and wounding four.

U.S. officials said foreign militants or Ansar al-Islam, an al-Qaida-linked Islamic militant group based in the north that has frequently clashed with the Kurds, may have carried out the attacks. There was no immediate claim of responsibility.

"We have no proof at this point (about who is responsible). It could be Ansar al-Islam. It could be al-Qaida. It could be any of a number of foreign terrorist groups operating in Iraq," said U.S. Brig. Gen. Mark Kimmitt, coalition deputy chief of staff for operations.

U.S. administrator L. Paul Bremer pledged to work with Iraqi security forces to capture those behind Sunday's bombings. The attackers "are seeking to halt Iraq's progress on the path to sovereignty and democracy," Bremer said in a statement.

No matter who was behind them, the blasts may heighten tensions between the Kurds and Sunni Arabs. As U.S. and Iraqi leaders try to map out the country's new form of government, some Arabs have sharply opposed Kurdish demands to retain or even expand their self-rule region in the north.

Hours after the attack, a mangled head believed to be that of one bomber lay on the floor of the KDP office. Blood and bits of flesh were spattered on the walls and ceilings. The attack on the PUK office, about 8 miles away, took place at about the same time.

The U.S. command in Baghdad put the casualty toll at 56 dead and more than 200 injured. Irbil city morgue director Tawana Kareem told the AP that 57 bodies were brought to the morgue and "figures are increasing." At least 235 people were admitted to the city's three hospitals with injuries, hospital officials said.

Officials said the death toll may be far higher, with some bodies buried in the rubble or taken away by relatives.

244 trampled at Hajj pilgrimage site

2001 and last year.

Sunday's tragedy marked the worst disaster at the annual hajj since 1997, when 340 pilgrims died in a fire at their tent city in Mina, near the holy city of Mecca.

Most of the dead were pilgrims from inside the Saudi kingdom who may not have been authorized to participate, Madani said. It was unclear how many foreign pilgrims died, but Egypt's Middle East News Agency reported that 13 Egyptians were among the dead.

Madani also said 272 pilgrims had died of natural causes during the hajj. Many participants are elderly, and Muslims believe that if a person dies while performing the pilgrimage they will go directly to heaven.

About 2 million Muslims are participating in this year's pilgrimage. To control the crowd, Saudi authorities set quotas for pilgrims from each country, and also require its citizens and residents to register upon arrival.

Many resident foreigners, especially those from the Indian subcontinent, cannot afford to pay the cost of an authorized pilgrimage, around $530, and perform the pilgrimage independently, despite recent laws requiring citizens and residents to join registered pilgrimage campaigns.

The chaos came after a sleepless night of prayer at the climax of the hajj, when pilgrims from around the world listened to Saudi Arabia's top cleric at the Namira Mosque.

On Sunday morning, they prayed at dawn then gathered pebbles to throw at the pillars. Each participant throws seven times, chanting "bismillah" ("in the name of God") and "Allahu Akbar" ("God is Great").

Calling America "the greatest Satan," Egyptian pilgrim Youssef Omar threw pebbles at one pillar on which someone had scrawled "USA."

After the 1998 hajj, when about 180 pilgrims were trampled to death, religious authorities issued an edict extending the amount of time in which pilgrims could complete the ritual, hoping to spread out the crowd.

A giant ramp leading to the pillars fills with pilgrims waiting to throw their pebbles, and Saudi authorities instruct pilgrims in several languages when and where to pass.

Still, 14 pilgrims were trampled to death during the same ritual last year and 35 died in a 2001 stampede.

Bush ups anti-terrorism budget

By Martin Crutsinger
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush is sending Congress a $2.4 trillion budget that emphasizes the major themes of his re-election campaign — bolstering the military to fight terrorism, strengthening homeland security and making his sweeping tax cuts permanent.

But the spending plan released Monday, covering the budget year beginning Oct. 1, is constrained by deficits projected to top a half-trillion dollars this year.

Bush's blueprint calls for spending $2.399 trillion and collecting $2.036 trillion in revenue, leaving a deficit of $363 billion for 2005, according to Republican officials who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The president want to boost defense spending by 7 percent, increase spending on homeland security by 10 percent and bolster counterterrorism activities with an 11 percent increase for the FBI.

"We will devote the resources necessary to win the war on terror and protect our homeland," Bush said in his weekend radio address. "America will not let down its guard."

For the current budget year, Bush projects the deficit will reach $521 billion, a record in dollar terms. It is a figure he proposes to cut to $237 billion in 2009.

Romney: Turnpike is patronage haven

By Martin Finucane
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON (AP) — Republican Gov. Mitt Romney has stepped up the rhetoric in his assault on the Massachusetts Turnpike Authority, calling it a "rogue agency" that is a haven for political hacks.

"I believe the Turnpike Authority is overwhelmed with patronage. I believe it has excessive employment, excessive compensation in some places, that it's a haven for political friends and hacks to find a future. And I think that's one reason why it ought to be folded into the highway department," Romney said in an interview on "Keller at Large" to be broadcast Sunday morning on WLVI-TV.

Romney has proposed eliminating the independent agency, which manages the Massachusetts Turnpike and the Big Dig, and merging it with the Massachusetts Highway Department, saying it could generate savings of $20 million a year, with a one-time savings of $190 million.

The governor was "wrong on all points," said Jordan Levy, vice chairman of the authority.

He said Romney's numbers "don't add up" and "when you can't win on the numbers you have to go somewhere else to raise your argument. So you get into sound bites, smear tactics, innuendoes and personal attacks."

Levy said there might be some patronage at the agency, but it was not a big problem and "the people over there are competent and they're doing their job."

Romney proposed last year to merge the turnpike and the highway department. He renewed that proposal in January in a State of the State speech that included some thinly veiled shots at Turnpike Authority Chairman Matthew Amorello.

Romney, speaking with interviewer Jon Keller, noted the agency's decision last year to sell land in Boston's Allston section, a move opposed by both the state and the city. The agency operated "entirely in their own sphere," he said, adding it was a "rogue agency doing whatever it wants."

EDITORIAL OPINION

Smith College faces extreme cutbacks

With Smith College President Carol Christ's proposal to eliminate 54 non-academic jobs, close seven dining halls, and cut 25 faculty positions through retirements over the next five years, the college has addressed something that the University of Massachusetts has dealt with for several years now: money trouble.

Christ released her proposal in an open letter to the Smith College community late last week. In it, she said several factors have led to the proposed cuts — all of which feel familiar to us, UMass students. Plainly, Smith College faces a budget shortfall, and Christ is looking to address monetary concerns early on before they grow out of hand.

That shortfall, according to Christ's letter, exists thanks to three factors, all of which can be traced directly to a backlash that comes from our nation's ailing economy. Those factors are shrinking endowment income, fewer monetary gifts, and an increase in financial aid need for Smith's student body.

In response, Christ is doing the most fiscally responsible thing possible: cutting luxuries from a budget and lifestyle at Smith College that are comfortable, but not essential to the success of the college or its students. Certainly the loss of 54 non-academic jobs is regrettable for employees who potentially face the chopping block. They're not easy decisions to make for the college or for workers to accept.

Unfortunately, some of them may be essential. Smith College has long touted their eating choices for students as among the best, as they well should have. UMass students would have a hard time fathoming dining services that include 20 kitchens and 26 dining rooms for only 2,500 undergraduate students, but that is what the Smith student body has become accustomed to.

Frankly, having prepared food for students in nearly every dormitory building is a wonderful thing to have, but is it really essential to the survival of the college? If something is going to give, would it not make more sense for it to be dining options that can be considered luxurious even when compared to the choices other local high-end colleges, including Hampshire College, Amherst College and Mount Holyoke College?

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian thinks so. We at The Collegian — students in public higher education who are infinitely prepared to improvise basic luxuries and comforts associated with our own academic environment when faced with a budget crunch — believe that Smith College students and their educations will be OK. Comforts are a wonderful thing to have, but one can walk away from a institution of higher education without many of them and yet still receive a top-notch education.

The Collegian also admires Smith's method of floating the proposal, yet leaving the final decision unmade so as to discuss other potential options. In doing so, the college has opened a dialogue that could prove invaluable in determining what other choices there are for balancing the budget, and what the best option may be.

Smith's shortfall — estimated by the college $3 million for 2004-2005 and $7 million by 2006-2007, according to Christ's letter — is not going away. By opening a dialogue early, though, and proposing a plan that targets luxuries and comforts that many other students in higher education (even private higher education) have succeeded without, the college shows wisdom and strong judgment that should preserve the academics of its own students for years to come.

Less is more: learning to simplify

Erika Lovley

As the old saying goes, variety is supposedly the spice of life. But add a little too much variety and life might get a little too spicy.

This is the hard lesson that many Americans are learning. Modern life in this country has far too many choices. We are a culture raised on instant gratification, dependent on having every confidence available exactly when, where and how we please.

For instance, what was once a simple trip to the grocery store has now become a daylong event. Try to choose a box of macaroni and cheese. There is Easy Mac, Complicated Mac, cheddar, American, and Meaty Mac, boxed or bowled Mac, Diet Mac and five different noodle shapes to choose from. These are the permutations available through only one of the multitudes of macaroni brand names.

Decisions, decisions. Through the development of modern technology, options that are supposed to make living easier are turning the simple life into an old memory. A study run in Parade Magazine reports that Americans' stress levels are on the rise compared to levels from the turn of the 20th century. Although the modern world is more convenient than it was 100 years ago, it has also become more distracting and hectic.

The problem is that it's impossible to escape. The media, an information source that thrives on accuracy, clarity and audience comprehension, has become anything but. Television news broadcasts have gone from a single anchor broadcasting behind his desk to a three-ring circus. At any given time, CNN runs news, stocks, weather, election poll updates, and up-to-the-nanosecond sports scores across its screen with flashing lights, undeniably confusing and losing most of its bewildered audience in the process.

Choices are developing in areas where there were previously none. We have the option to vacation anywhere on the planet, from the African safari to a deserted Pacific Isle. Plastic surgery and exercise allows us to formulate the "ideal" appearance. We can choose to be gay, straight, or bi-sexual. In order to borrow sugar from the neighbors, one can send a message by phone, email, voice mail, instant messaging or fax.

We should all learn that we cannot expect perfection - even with endless selections.

According to psychologist David G. Myers and political scientist Robert E. Lane, our well-being has actually been decreased by too many options. Although the last 30 years of American history have been full and rich, 14 million more people today are less than the "very happy" that they were 30 years ago. Depression is also on the rise. According to ABC and Journal of the American Medical Association, one in six Americans will experience depression in their lifetime, and 33 million Americans suffer from the disease right now.

Myers notes that the more unstructured and open our lives become, the more lost and overwhelmed we become. We should all learn that we cannot expect perfection — even with endless selections. However, it is something we are all guilty of. How many of us have searched for the perfect boyfriend or girlfriend, only to become disappointed and depressed when realizing this person can never exist? How many times have we walked through the dining commons, struggling with choices of french fries and hamburgers, to chicken and fajitas, and wound up eating everything, unable to concoct the perfect meal?

According to psychologist Barry Schwartz, people who suffer from such symptoms as "maximizers" are never able to settle for the second best option. While striving for perfection is something society encourages, it may not be the healthiest goal. Schwartz says maximizers are less likely to be satisfied, less optimistic and more likely to be depressed.

Although the outlook on life appears to have destined everyone to the confines of a mental hospital, Schwartz assures there is an easy solution to the maximizer symptoms — simplify life. Formulate a plan and stick with it. For instance, when shopping for shoes, know the brand and color you want ahead of time. Ignore the new gizmos, pumps, shock absorbers and flashing lights. Better yet, choose exactly the same pair you just wore out. What worked before will work again. In the DC, choose the first appetizing food choice you see, grab it and sit down. Don't worry about missing the meatball grinders on the other side. Knowing the DC, they'll still be there tomorrow.

Adventures in babysitting

Morris Singer

You may not know it, but the University of Massachusetts employs a number of full-time babysitters whose responsibility it is to watch the students. These babysitters, or Resident Ass-istants, are so much a part of University life, that their legitimacy is hardly ever questioned. But I urge everyone to think about what it is these people are really doing on our campus.

The name may be misleading: Resident Assistant. When it comes down to it, who do they really assist anyway? It is my assertion that these babysitters assist only the University staff when it comes time to put the image of the academic institution over the rights and comfort of the students.

Let's look at a purely hypothetical picture. I should note that any similarities to actual people are purely coincidental.

Let's say a hypothetical RA, who goes by the nickname Nashville, wants to do the absolute best job he can for the University. So, this, as his actions demonstrate, would mean assisting the University whenever it needs help, but putting the needs of his residents second.

So when one of his residents comes to him to ask him about a heating problem in his room, Nashville responds that there is nothing that can be done. He simply shrugs off the heating problem that is bringing the temperature of the resident's room to over 90 degrees in the middle of September. Yet, an independent inquiry on behalf of the student results in a work order and a solution to the problem. So Nashville, who sat in his room and did nothing when the student was uncomfortable, was, as the outcome suggested, simply too lazy to pursue this task. It just wasn't important to "assist" the student in his request.

He coaches her on what to say, how to say it, how to act, all the while sitting outside the door of the student, who has only some friends inside and is about to go out for the evening.

But Nashville is all but drastically over-zealous when it comes time to act like he is doing his job. Falsely accusing his resident of under-age possession of alcohol, he files a witness report with the Resident Director using unsubstantiated and immaterial evidence as his only proof.

When the evidence is found to be inadequate, Nashville's pride is hurt.

So he sits around, waiting — waiting to get the bothersome student in trouble for something.

But he waits, because his student is not the kind to cause trouble. Months pass. Vacation comes and goes, but nothing happens. Nashville, the babysitter, gets impatient. So one night, he summons a new RA, just learning what to do. I imagine the new RA is very nervous about doing well in her new job as University babysitter as well, so she complies with what he asks.

Nashville sits outside the student's door, saying he smells smoke. The new RA doesn't know what to do. It would be wrong to falsely accuse someone of a violation of University policy. But Nashville explains to her exactly what he wants. He coaches her on what to say, how to say it, how to act, all the while sitting outside the door of the student, who has only some friends inside and is about to go out for the evening.

Finally she gets up the courage to knock. I can only imagine her desire to impress the other RA, who has had the position for over a year. The student opens the door a crack, to reveal that there is no smoke in the room. But the accusations continue, and there is not even an opportunity to talk.

Nashville sits back and provides the push the female babysitter needs to follow through with the accusation. When the interaction is completed, I am sure Nashville thanks her for her efforts. After all, its not every day an RA will falsely accuse someone to impress a fellow babysitter.

So Nashville the babysitter gets his revenge. How proud he must be. He has proved his babysitting skills in the most artful of ways. And now it is the student's word against his.

Excuses, excuses

Mark Ostroff

Question: What do George W. Bush and Lee Harvey Oswald have in common?

Answer: "It wasn't me! It was the CIA!"

As you probably already know, the real situation is nothing to joke about. Countless debates, thousands of bodies, and tens of billions of dollars later, America has been left with nothing to answer for the ugliest shift in U.S. foreign policy history.

Three hundred million dollars spent on an American-led weapons hunt that turned up "nada." All those stockpiles that even Rumsfeld claimed were "in the area around Tikrit and Baghdad and east, west, south and north," never turned up. When it was all over, David Kay, the Bush administration's chief inspector, revealed that it was nearly impossible for Iraq to possess such weapons after the Gulf War. As expected, Kay has stepped down.

Remember: As long as you invoke 9/11, you can get away with just about anything.

In a last, and seemingly desperate, attempt to put a spin on this so-called "imminent threat," the President's State of the Union address coined the term "weapons of mass destruction-related program activities," or in Bushian: equipment that had been buried in the sand since the Gulf War. This alone clearly shows the stretch that was needed in justifying what we went to war over, making it all seem like a sick joke.

When questioned earlier this month by Diane Sawyer on the WMD myth, "what's the difference?" was the only answer Bush could come up with, without the help of a teleprompter.

But now, after a State of the Union address that Gallup surveyed as one of the worst in 12 years, the White House has regrouped with fresh excuses.

They now have all but abandoned the WMD claim, that is, with the exception of Vice President Dick Cheney. Even while Bush was proclaiming no relationship between Saddam and Al-Qaeda, Cheney was in the other wing of the White House proclaiming just the opposite.

Like the Saddam-Osama link, the WMD claim is still going strong in the mind of Dick Cheney. So much, that it has almost become a disturbing neurosis. The day before David Kay's stepping down, Cheney was carrying on about "conclusive evidence" of WMDs in Iraq, according to The New York Times.

Meanwhile, Bush has stepped in with sort of ambiguous-like-implicit-factual-opinionations of facts about Saddam that are supposed to make people think that it was a good idea to go to war. After being asked a specific question about WMDs, Bush responded to CNN reporters, "We know that he defied the United Nations year after year after year. And given the offense of Sept. 11, we know we could not trust the good intentions of Saddam Hussein because he didn't have any."

Remember: As long as you invoke 9/11, you can get away with just about anything.

And then, a deflection of blame in this mess: The golden goose here is the fact that chief inspector David Kay refuses to implicate Bush in the intelligence failures of Iraq's capabilities. Apparently, this was all the Central Intelligence Agency's fault. As you will soon see, 9/11 will not be the only thing used ad-nauseum, but this new development will as well.

You would think that, like 9/11, an investigation into the matter should be pursued. In fact, it's something that any decent American should come to expect from their president. Even Sen. John McCain (R-AZ) commented to CBS, "I am absolutely convinced that [an investigation] is necessary, because this is a very serious issue and we need to not only know what happened, but know what steps are necessary to prevent the United States from ever being misinformed again."

But just like 9/11, the Bush administration is, at least for now, refusing an investigation into the matter. Just like the stonewalled 9/11 commission, the administration is most likely buying their time once again to sweep the ugly parts under the rug.

And again like 9/11, a non-partisan investigation into alleged "intelligence failures," may be more than enough to implicate the Bush Administration. It certainly wouldn't help their re-election bid.

It's admittedly possible to have faulty intelligence. But when your Secretary of State cites "evidence" that embarrassingly turns out to be magazine clippings and a plagiarized, 10-year-old, college dissertation, rational people see this as a red flag to consider before sending Americans off to die in the Middle East.

But hey, what's the difference? ... Right?

Reality TV pioneer and Northampton native dies at 57

LOS ANGELES (AP) – Producer Mary-Ellis Bunim, who brought television into the age of reality with "The Real World" and whose latest hit series was "The Simple Life," has died at age 57.

Bunim died Thursday after a long battle with breast cancer, MTV announced Friday.

She and business partner Jonathan Murray, who kicked off the reality trend in 1992 with MTV's "The Real World," were among the genre's most prolific producers.

Their series included "Road Rules," "The Love Cruise," "Making the Band," "Starting Over" and, most recently, Fox's "The Simple Life" with party girl and headline-maker Paris Hilton.

Bunim was "an extraordinary talent who pioneered an entire genre of television," Fox's entertainment president, Gail Berman said in a statement Friday.

Bunim, Murray and other producers upended the TV order as reality shows soared in popularity, eventually wresting chunks of broadcast and cable schedules away from traditional scripted series.
